wife. After tea the chair was taken by Mr. E. B. Broadrick, in the unavoidable absence of Ald. J. Kerfoot, J.P., the chapel warden, who was kept away by the serious illness of his wife. The death of Mrs. Brooks also caused the absence of other old members of the congregation. There was a large attendance, including several ministers of other denominations. The chairman offered a very hearty welcome to Mr. and Mrs. Evans, and recalled the old memories of the chapel, speaking gratefully of what he had himself learnt from Robert Brook Aspland, and the later ministries of Mr. Gordon, Page Hopps, Wicksteed, and Hamilton Vance, and lastly, for nearly twenty-one years, Mr. Taylor. He was glad to know that Mr. Evans was devoted to school work, and he would find plenty to do. Lieut.-Colonel Pollitt cordially seconded the resolution of welcome, and Mr. Evans, in gratefully acknowledging it, said that it was with diffidence that he came to them in succession to such a line of eminent ministers, and they must be prepared for disappointments, but he should throw himself into the work, and he appealed to them to realise the serious duty of the support of public worship, and to co-operate heartily in the work. Though he was personally a strong Unitarian, they would not get from him any rabid, exclusive teaching of Unitarianism. With God's help he hoped to give them something better, something more comprehensive, and something truer, too. That was why he was glad to see on the platform representatives of other churches. It would be a pleasure in his life to co-operate with any man in any good work in Dukinfield. That, of course, had been a tradition in their church for two hundred years—a free church, a free platform, and a free expression of thought and conviction; therefore they ought to take a wider outlook of things. He was sure they would all agree with him in that respect. He thanked them very warmly for that welcome. The Rev. H. E. Dowson then gave to Mr. Evans the right hand of fellowship on behalf of the ministers of the district. He spoke of the former ministers he had known, and some of the old members of the congregation of the old Puritan stock, and congratulated Mr. Evans on the opportunity he would have there. Principal Gordon, whose father was formerly minister of the old chapel, the Rev. Ambrose Bennett, and others also spoke, the speeches being interspersed with music, and at the end came the evening hymn, and Principal Gordon pronounced the Benediction.

Ipswich.—The Social Guild in connection with Friar's-street Unitarian Chapel, held the third and closing social for the winter season on Thursday evening, March 29. It was well attended by members and visitors. The programme consisted of music, recitations, and games. The past season has been very successful, the weekly meetings being well attended, and a series of capital lantern lectures, musical evenings, &c., have been much appreciated by members and visitors. Amongst all good things it is difficult to particularise, but we may mention Rev. L. Tavenor on "Geneva" and on "Pompeii," Mr. R. Pearse, M.P., on "My Voyage Round the World," and Mr. S. A. Notcutt on "Radium." The object of the guild is to develop the social and religious life of the church. It has certainly created very friendly relations with the town people. By request, Mr. Tavenor has lectured in the Town Art Gallery on "The Origin of Art," "The Story of Italian Art," and "The Art Treasures of Florence."

Leeds: Hunslet (Farewell Presentation).—On Saturday last the Rev. John Fox brought his twenty years' ministry to a close, and took leave of the congregation, at the same time terminating his long career in the regular ministry. Tea was provided, and afterwards a crowded meeting was held in the schoolroom. Many interesting speeches were delivered, and the utmost cordiality and good feeling prevailed. During the evening opportunity was taken to present a solid silver tea and coffee service to Mr. and Mrs. Fox, bearing the following inscription:—"Presented to mark the respect and affection of the Hunslet Unitarian congregation for the Rev. John Fox and Mrs. Fox, on the close of a pastorate of twenty years." Miss Fox received a silver photo frame from the members of her class in the Sunday-school.

London: Deptford.—The social gatherings held every Monday evening during the past six months have proved most successful, and have given pleasure to many poor and weary residents in this neighbourhood. On Tuesday evening, at the close of the season, the Rev. A. J. and Mrs. Marchant held an "At Home" to the friends who have assisted during the season, and an enjoyable evening was spent by a large number of visitors, including the Rev. Stanley and Mrs. Hayward, of the Greenwich-road Congregational Church. An aggregate attendance during the season of upwards of 3,000 persons was reported, and evidence of the sympathy of other denominations with this effort was shown in the fact that concerts had been given by the choirs of two established churches and the Greenwich-road Congregational Church.

Torquay.—The winter session of lectures, &c., was brought to a close on March 26, with a high-class concert which was largely attended. The whole series of meetings form an attractive feature in the work of the town.

Wimbledon.—The London District Unitarian Society decided early in the year to hold a series of five services at Wimbledon, in order to see whether there might not be some possibility of establishing a permanent congregation in that populous district. The Worples Hall was secured for the purpose, and the Revs. W. G. Tarrant, E. Savell Hicks, H. W. Perris, F. W. Stanley, and W. Copeland Bowie, each took a Sunday. The results were very satisfactory; the congregation ranged from 130 to 60, in spite of several of the evenings being exceedingly rough and stormy. On the final Sunday Mr. Bowie invited those who had been interested in the series, and were desirous of making a move in the direction of the establishment of a church at Wimbledon, to remain behind after the service. Some 55 of those present stayed to discuss the matter, and keen interest was displayed. The committee of the L.D.U.S. have therefore decided to go on with the movement. A further series of services is being arranged, commencing on May 6. The local arrangements have been in the hands of Mr. Chas. Fenton and the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards, to whose energy and devotion the success of the series has been largely due.

IT is sometimes said that Unitarian Christianity is cold and critical, greatly lacking on the devotional side of religion. Perhaps the knowledge that the Hymns in this little book—with the exception of three—are by Unitarian writers may help to remove this impression.

The selection has been made for use at special services held in public halls, for occasional missionary services in churches, and for pioneer movements in places where there is no organised church.

Nearly all the Hymns are taken from the recently published Revised edition of the Essex Hall Hymnal, an excellent and representative collection of 534 Hymns for the Church and the Home.

The official Report of the National Conference Meetings at Oxford, April 17–20, will be published in "The Inquirer" in two enlarged numbers, April 21 and 28. The Report will not be issued separately in book form. Orders for extra copies of these two Conference numbers should be sent in at once.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

EARLY this week we had perfect Easter weather. May it last over the holiday, and, if that is not too much to hope, over the National Conference days at Oxford.

THERE is every prospect of thoroughly good meetings for this Ninth Triennial Conference of our Churches. "The National Conference of the members and friends of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Free Christian, Presbyterian, and other Non-Subscribing or Kindred Congregations" is the full title, and we are heartily glad that among the friends at this Oxford meeting are to be three readers of papers who do not belong to the communion of our churches, but are so far in sympathy with the principle of spiritual freedom on which they are founded as to be willing to take part in the proceedings.

THE fascination of Oxford itself, and the special interest of Manchester College, will be powerful contributors to the success of the meetings, but now, as always, the greatest thing of all is the gathering together of friends, the sense of happy fellowship in loyalty to a common ideal, and devotion to a common work. To this, of course, is added the stimulus and serious interest of the papers to be read and discussed, and these promise to be of the highest quality. That the first place is given to questions of social amelioration shows a true discernment, on the part of those who arranged the programme, of the most urgent need of the present day, if the vitality of religion is to be maintained in touch with the actual life of the people.

THE following brief notes may serve as a reminder of the week's proceedings. The meetings are in the Municipal Buildings except when otherwise stated:—

THE meeting to be held on the Friday afternoon at Manchester College, Oxford, for prayer and addresses on our Domestic Missions, which has been arranged by the Rev. Dr. J. E. Odgers, the chairman of the local committee, is an extension of the service and meeting which were held at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, Liverpool, three years ago. That, though more general in its range, was confined to ministers, this will be freely open to all attending the Conference, and will, it is hoped, stimulate interest in institutions which for more than 70 years have been exercising an influence which, though necessarily to a large extent unseen, has been none the less real and thoroughly beneficent.

THE REV. F. K. FREESTON, President of the National Conference Guilds' Union, wishes to call attention to the fact that the United Guilds' service at Manchester College will begin at 6.30 on Easter Monday, as notified in the Conference Handbook correctly, and not at 6, as erroneously appears on the bills.

IN the interest of Irish visitors to the Conference at Oxford, the Rev. A. O. Ashworth writes of further concessions secured from the steamship companies. "Visitors from Ireland will be permitted to delay their arrival in Belfast (on return) to Sunday morning, 22nd inst., by all routes named in my letter dated 31st ult. The 1½ single fare tickets are available by Heysham route, leaving Belfast 9 p.m., reaching Oxford 12.48 mid-day following, and leaving Oxford 2.40 p.m., reaching Belfast 5.30 a.m.—at choice, Saturday or Sunday morning. I did not previously name this route as it involves change of stations at Birmingham (10 minutes' walk between)." Mr. Ashworth recommends the Fleetwood route.

THE April Review of Reviews has a portrait of the late Susan B. Anthony, a pioneer of Woman Suffrage in America, who died on March 13. The Rev. W. C. Gannett, of Rochester, N.Y., of whose church she was a member, conducted the memorial service. Miss Anthony was born Feb. 15, 1820, at Adams, Mass., but six years later her father settled as a cotton-spinner in Battenville, N.Y. She became a teacher, and in 1852 took charge of a school at Rochester. Early devoted to the cause of Temperance and of Abolition, she was soon drawn into the Woman's Suffrage Movement, and to it devoted fifty years of strenuous service. Only in the closing year of the last century did she withdraw from active work, when she resigned the presidency of the National Woman's Suffrage Association.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

A DRAWING-ROOM meeting in the interests of this Society was held on Friday afternoon, April 6, through the kindness of Mrs. Hahnmann Epps, at 95, Upper Tulse-hill, S.W. The president, Mr. P. M. Martineau, took the chair, and an address on the history and work of the Mission was given by Miss Anna Sharpe.

The PRESIDENT, in his opening address, pleaded for more subscribers, and urged that young people should be interested in the work, and enrol their names. A subscription of 5s. secured membership in the Society, and as time went on they could increase their subscriptions. But there was something even more important than money, and as urgently required, and that was personal service in the work of the missions. If they would take a share in that work, he assured them that they would find their way to the heart of the poor, they would make true friends, and it would be a gain to their own lives.

MISS ANNA SHARPE, in the course of her address, said that it was now eighty years since Dr. Tuckerman had taken up his work in Boston, Mass., as Minister at Large, and had shown how much could be done by one devoted man to help the neglected poor of a great city; she told of the growth of the work in America, and how the report of it led to similar undertakings in this country, and quoted what Dr. Martineau said of a visit Dr. Tuckerman and a friend paid to Liverpool in 1834: "Their benevolent and devout enthusiasm came upon us like the angel descending to stir the sleeping waters, and their recital of what was being done to uplift and evangelise the neglected classes in Boston fell as a convicting and converting word, and yet a word of hope and zeal upon our conscience." Already, in 1831, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, at the urgency of the Rev. W. J. Fox, had moved in the matter, and next year the first Domestic Missionary, Mr. Philp, was appointed in London, and a weavers' shed was taken in Spicer-street, Spitalfields. Out of this grew the mission at which Mr. Corkran worked for many years, and a second mission under Mr. Vidler was also established. Then in 1835 the Domestic Mission Society was founded, on an entirely unsectarian basis, to take charge of the work, while other missions, in the country, such as that in Liverpool (founded 1836) were also established. Miss Sharpe described the varied work carried on at the missions, taking as an instance the growth of the Rhyl-street Mission, established in 1882, and quoted what Dr. Martineau had said of such work in 1891: "I have always looked on the ministers of the Domestic Mission Society as devoted to the most Christ-like work which can engage the zeal of good men in our time—a work of wise compassion for unnoticed suffering, of exposure of lurking wrongs, of redemption from ruinous sins, of guardianship over the threatened germs of goodness and catholic fellowship with all labours akin to their own." She described what opportunities were opened to the visitors for the Provident Bank, and in other kinds of work, in the schools, the evening classes, &c., and noted how more helpers were wanted everywhere as well as more money—at their three Missions, George's Row, where the Rev. F. Summers was missionary; Rhyl-street, under Dr. Read; and Bell-street, under the Rev. S. H. Street; as also at the Mansford-street, Blackfriars, and Limehouse Missions, which were separately maintained.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS then gave a brief address. He referred to the way in which Dr. Tuckerman had been first led to that work, when his health had given way, and he was no longer able to preach; through that home visiting he found there was still a very real ministry open to him, a ministry of all others most like that of Jesus himself. And that example remained as a reminder to them all that they were called to such ministry, that it was a work in which they all could have part, so to preach the Gospel to the poor. It was a trust laid upon their churches which were established in more fortunate neighbourhoods so to hold out the hand of sympathy and brotherly helpfulness to their poorer neighbours. And for those who could not take any part in the actual work there was the opportunity of giving the necessary means for its maintenance. When they felt keenly the grievous sufferings of the poor, and the wretched conditions in which they were compelled to live, they must remember that that very pain was God's appeal to them to be doing something to help. There was no other way by which the Divine purpose could be fulfilled but by the faithful efforts of those who felt the need. Those who threw themselves into the work among the people would not despair. It was those who felt the misery, but stopped short at feeling and did nothing, who lost faith. The work brought abundant blessing to those who were devoted to it, and firmer confidence in the Divine goodness.

The Rev. F. SUMMERS, of George's Row Mission, gave some touching instances of the way in which the missionaries are able to help the poor, and appealed for confidence in their work.

Mr. PHILIP ROSCOE, the treasurer, made a statement as to the position of the funds of the Society, saying that while their income was £1,000 they were spending about £1,500, and that they had lost from £30 to £40 of annual subscriptions through the death of old members. It was essential that they should secure more support.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON and the Rev. F. W. STANLEY both enforced the appeals which had been made, expressing confidence in the large amount of quiet, unobtrusive work that was being done. Mr. Stanley pointed out that even in such a district as his, about the Effra-road Chapel, they found a population very similar to that among which their missionaries were working.

Mrs. EVELEGH proposed, and Miss ANNA SHARPE seconded, a very cordial vote of thanks to Mrs. Epps for her kindness in holding that meeting, and to Mr. Harrison, for all that he had done to secure its success.

Mr. HARRISON acknowledged the vote on behalf of Mrs. Epps and himself, and moved a vote of thanks to the President, after which the company adjourned to the dining-room for tea.

The annual meeting of the Domestic Mission Society is to be held at Wandsworth on Tuesday evening, May 8, when the chair is to be taken by Mr. H. B. Lawford, and the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter will be among the speakers. Subsequently, a third drawing-room meeting is to be held at Hampstead.

HONOUR TO MR. JOHN HARRISON.

ON Palm Sunday, Tréport, on the coast of Normandy north of Dieppe, was en fête, and many of us would gladly have been there, for on that occasion the order of the Legion of Honour was conferred upon our friend, Mr. John Harrison, a well-deserved recognition by the Government of services rendered to the French nation, by the creation and development of the port. Thirty-one years ago, when Mr. Harrison first went there with one of his boats, Tréport had no commerce, and was merely a harbour of mud and shingle banks. Now it has a large dock, quays, and cranes, provided by the authorities to accommodate six regular lines of steamers running to various ports in the United Kingdom.

The Cross of the order was publicly presented to Mr. Harrison by the President of the Council General of the department Seine Inférieure, and we are indebted to a friend, who was present, for the following impression of the scene. Looking over the port in its present condition of prosperity, he says:—

"What is it that strikes the observer more than anything else? The dominant colour seems to be red enclosed in lines of white. True! And it is this same combination—this harmony in red and white—which has, step by step, in prosperity and in times of difficulty and adversity, led up to the public recognition which is but the natural reward such untiring perseverance justly deserves. The formal decoration of 'the benefactor of the town,' as he was so aptly described, with the Cross of the Legion of Honour took place in the theatre of the Casino in the afternoon of Sunday. After the President of the department of the Seine Inférieure had formally made the investiture the band played 'God save the King.' This was immediately followed by 'La Marseillaise.' The national airs were received by the assembled multitude standing, and in respectful silence. One felt then that the true union of hand and heart between the two nations was a reality. The next impulse was to give free vent to one's emotions, and join in one overpowering chorus: Vive l'entente cordiale—vive la République Française—vive le Service Maritime—vive John Harrison."²

Mr. Harrison, it will be remembered, was, some five years ago, created a Knight of the Order of Leopold by the King of the Belgians, for services rendered to the Belgian poor in this country. We congratulate him very warmly on this new honour.

THE Christian Register, of March 22, records the death in the Boston Homœopathic Hospital, Boston, on March 10, of the Rev. William Brunton, who was a native of Sheffield and a student of the Home Missionary Board in Manchester, from which he entered the ministry in 1869. After settlements at Middlesbrough and Colyton he went to America, where he had several settlements, and also went through the Harvard Divinity School. His final charge was at Fairhaven, Mass., from which he retired about a year ago, after a pastorate of over eight years, amid expressions of high appreciation.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

MR. BIRRELL'S Bill, so far as he expounded it in the House of Commons on Monday afternoon, has very little to do with education. The reforms introduced into the administration of the elementary school system by the Act of the late Government are left as they stood; they are not developed; on the other hand, they are not materially modified. Mr. Birrell expressed his own preference for ad hoc authorities, but he does not propose to enter into conflict with the County and other Councils on this point, although the Bill is to contain a clause providing for some as yet undefined measure of devolution. With regard to secondary education, nothing apparently is to be done beyond the abolition of the twopenny limit. The very important subject of the training colleges is not dealt with at all. We are to struggle on with the present ludicrously defective arrangements for the supply and the teaching of the teachers of the children. Mr. Birrell was only able to explain one of the five parts of his Bill, and, in the opinion of its author, some of the unexplained clauses will be found to contain valuable educational improvements. Be this as it may, the centre of gravity of the Bill does not rest in its educational value.

That, perhaps, was inevitable, inasmuch as the country has evinced only the most languid interest in education, while those who claim to express public opinions are passionately in earnest over the "religious difficulty." In respect of its settlement of the sectarian controversy, the Bill will stand or fall. The denominational schools are to disappear. All schools are in future and during school hours to conform to one type. They are all to be what are technically known as provided schools. This is the outstanding feature of the Bill. Here, at least, we approach finality. This is the inevitable third stage in a vexed and troubled evolution. First, all schools were voluntary. Then the voluntary and the Board schools competed side by side. Now, at length, all, or almost all, the schools of the people are to be in the fullest sense public schools.

During the hours of compulsory attendance all schools which are maintained either from the rates or from Imperial grants are to be under the complete control of the local authority.

There are to be no religious tests for teachers. In every school the local education authority may arrange for the giving of simple Bible teaching, undenominational religion, or "local authorityism," to select some only of the descriptions given to it by friends and foes. This teaching will be imparted by the ordinary school teaching staff, and will be paid for out of the national funds. Lord Cecil describes this as the endowment of undenominationalism. Religious instruction is recognised as a proper function of the civil service of the country.

In addition to the teaching of undenominational religion, there may be in a certain class of schools further instruction of a more definite kind. That is to say, specific as opposed to indefinite religion may be taught on two days in the week, but not by the school teachers and not at the public expense.

Yet a further complication is introduced. In large urban areas definite dogma may be taught by the regular school teachers in some of the existing denominational schools. In those schools, viz., in which four-fifths of the parents express a desire for it. We cannot imagine that this four-fifths will survive the committee stage. The clause looks like a bold bid for the support of the Jews and the Roman Catholics. In many of the schools belonging to these bodies there is an overwhelming majority of Jewish or Catholic scholars. So far, however, as it was intended hereby to conciliate Catholic opinion, it does not seem to be very successful, as the papers on the morrow of the introduction of the Bill contain bitter protests from some of the leaders of Catholic thought.

The apparent simplicity of the Bill appears then to mask a considerable confusion. We have, first, some schools in which definite religious teaching may be given by the school staff; other schools in which it must be given, if at all, by persons who are not the school teachers. Lastly, in these schools, and in all other schools, undenominational teaching may be given by the public teachers and at the public cost.

Religious teaching of every kind, whether the publicly endowed or the privately financed teaching, is to be outside of school hours. In other words, that is to be rendered clear and explicit which, as Mr. Birrell assures us, is even now the law of the land. There is to be no compulsion to attend during the time of religious instruction. Under the old system the child withdrawn from the Bible lesson, or from learning the Catechism, was set to some other task in the schoolhouse. He became a singular object of obloquy to his fellows. Under the new scheme he will remain outside the school, it may be at play, and he is likely to become, according to Mr. Birrell, an object of envy. And here the Minister of Education hints a suspicion of the results of his Bill. Children are likely to remain away in increasing numbers.

The provisions of the Bill, so far as a first impression is worth anything, are not calculated to secure the permanence of religious instruction. Nor are they calculated to allay contention. Mr. Birrell, at the commencement of his brilliant speech, made reference to the needs of seven millions of children, and expressed the wish that he had been faced by an audience anxious to solve the mighty issues which involve their "breed and bearing, health and happiness." At the close he informed his hearers how he had resorted last Saturday to Battersea Park to think out his oration. The children were all around him, they were importunate to know the time, and they worried him at first, until he came at length to feel how fitting it was to have the children round the Minister who ought to introduce a children's Bill. But, for all that, it is not a children's Bill. The country is doomed to a further campaign of religious antagonisms. The Liberal policy is naturally scorned by the Conservative Opposition. The Tory Press is at once angry and jubilant. It is felt that, whatever else happens, the members of the Opposition will be invigorated by having something to fight. The Standard goes so far as to announce that the Bill can never pass, and is not intended to be carried into law. Such an announcement is part of the ordinary armoury of party warfare. But opposition is not by any means confined to the Conservatives. The first speaker from the Liberal benches was Mr. Masterman, member for West Ham, and his speech was a distinctly hostile one. He was followed by Mr. Ramsay MacDonald who demanded that the national funds should only be used for secular education. Mr. Birrell was confronted by a situation of enormous difficulty. Almost a miracle of statesmanship was required, and the miracle has not been worked.

One of the boldest and most ingenious provisions of the Bill is the proposed constitution of a Welsh Educational Council independent of Whitehall. This is naturally popular with Welsh members, and may be regarded as an instalment of the policy of "Home Rule all round."

A QUIET EVENING FOR WOMEN.

THE hearts and minds of many Unitarians are much exercised at the present time as to the purport and direction of the message they are called upon to deliver to the world. Some would seem inclined to borrow the big drum and beat up a revival, trusting that the word we have to speak may make its way through such an overpowering accompaniment. Others suggest that there is no longer any need for us to hold ourselves aloof, as the whole band is now marching forward to our own music. But, however we may differ as to the methods and means of progress, we are all of us sure that we must face forward, and move on to the goal that lies ahead of us.

In the meantime, while seeking some fuller development of our spiritual energy more in harmony with the needs of the age, much quiet, steady work is being done in many of our churches, and feelers are being thrown out experimentally here and there to find a fruitful soil in which to put out into fresh, vigorous growth. Such an experiment in quiet helpfulness has been tried during the last two years at the old "Great Meeting" in Leicester; and thus far it is being carried on, with interesting and useful results, by the women of the congregation for the benefit of the women of the surrounding neighbourhood.

It was recognised by a member of the congregation—Miss Edith Gittins, the leading spirit of this new movement—that the usual time for the Sunday evening service, 6.30 to 8 o'clock, is an inconvenient one for many working women, owing to the pressure of home duties; and yet more strongly recognised that, for the house-mother, tired with the never-ending round of domestic duties (to which, unfortunately, is often added industrial work), an hour set apart on one evening in the week for quiet rest and prayer would be a boon. As the result of discussion on this matter, an invitation card was drawn up, setting out the proposition for a short week-night service for women; and a number of friends of the new movement undertook to visit each house in the neighbouring streets, and to cordially invite the women to attend a short, bright service of prayer and song at the Great Meeting Church, from 8 to 9, on a certain Monday evening in February, 1904. At this first gathering, attended by about 200 women, after half an hour had been devoted to hymn-singing and prayer, an address was given explaining the full scheme of the proposed association. Membership was invited, and the Great Meeting Women's Friendly Society came into being. By the close of the first session, at the end of the following June, there was a membership of nearly 300 women, with a weekly attendance varying from 150 to 250, according to weather and circumstance. There was a good nucleus to start with of previous attendants at the chapel, the mission, or the mothers' meeting, which helped to supply the necessary enthusiasm; but there were many outsiders—brought at first, perhaps, by curiosity or love of novelty—who stayed on afterwards through interest and attachment.

The weekly payment of 1d., which constitutes full membership, is returned to each member twice yearly in the form of material or literature, according to the wish of each recipient. The independent flavour which is so valuable in such a society is preserved by a monthly collection, during the service, which goes towards defraying the necessary expenses incurred in holding these meetings. Such expenses have included a contribution towards the lighting and heating of the chapel; the construction of a platform for the use of those conducting the service (for it may be said that none of the ladies have shown any desire to mount the pulpit and fill the minister's place); the preparation and publication of a special hymn-book for the Society's use, in which are incorporated 250 of the best—and the best-loved—hymns of praise and aspiration, to be sung to well-known singable tunes, carefully pitched to suit all voices, so that the oldest, with the youngest, may join in heartily without strain.

There is abundant opportunity for all workers in the active organisation needed for the conduct of the services week by week, opportunity for each one to lend a hand according to her ability. Registrars undertake the keeping and making up of the membership cards, the collection of the pennies, and of the money for the coal club, and the admission of the congregation each evening. A group of bright girls from the choir lead the singing well. The "business heads" undertake the purchase of material, and preparation of the parcels for the half-yearly return of the membership pence. Skilful needlewomen make up the garments needed for the "maternity outfit," which is to be sent out for the use of any mother connected with the Society who may stand in need of it. Others have offered embroideries to beautify the reading desk and the banner which tells of the Great Meeting Women's Friendly Society's work. Visitors engage to see members who are absent through sickness or sorrow. For each service are required a chairman, an organist, a singer (or instrumentalist or reciter), a reader, one to offer prayer, and one to give a short address of about fifteen minutes. Pleasant variety is sought from week to week by the frequent change of the workers taking active part in the service; and herein lies one of the most pleasing features of the work, in the kindly co-operation of friends from outside churches. Our own talents, as well as numbers, might soon give out, or at least become monotonous, if not supplemented, as they are, generously by outside singers and speakers; and these last, in the happy spirit of comradeship which pervades such work in common, leave their churches and separate doctrines behind them, and bring their broad human sympathies for the refreshment of their hearers. There is no set form of address prescribed; in fact, some of us may think that "address" is a formal term to apply to the very informal words we offer. The subjects are various enough, ranging from the Vision of the Holy Grail to the home of the honey-bee; from an episode in early Hebrew history to the blooming of the primrose and the song of the thrush on a bright spring morning; from the havoc wrought by intemperance to the fine simplicity of St. Francis of Assisi; with many a word on the joys and sorrows of daily life in the home, in between. We recognise that we are not taking part in a Sunday service, and the congregation are left free to express their pleasure over a song or a sentiment that appeals to them by applause. Once or twice in the year the service is prefaced by a twopenny tea in the school-room (and a very good tea, too!), paid for by all members but the few whose means are known to be unequal to the additional outlay. The service which follows is perhaps even better attended and heartier than usual after such a friendly gathering. When the platform and the pews have been mingled in social intercourse, the welcome extended by each to the other later on in the evening contains an added touch of sympathy and interest. To many of the women we know, not only by their constant attendance, but through their own words, this quiet Monday evening hour is one of real rest, refreshment, and encouragement. It is but a simple matter, without any emotional or dramatic effort to catch the throng. Its appeal is made to those women whose daily round of domestic duties is apt to get monotonous, possibly even through its very dead-level of sobriety. It serves to remind them from time to time of ideals to which they may still look forward, of sympathies that they can still keep warm, of the bond of human sisterhood on which they can still rely; and, above all, of the continued presence of the one Father of us all to whom we gladly offer our prayers, and songs of praise and thanksgiving, and supplication. It gives them pleasant thoughts to carry with them in their daily work, and something pleasurable to look forward to as the weeks pass by. And who can say what influence for good may be exercised by such a weekly gathering in widening the tone of thought in many homes, as well as in brightening the lives of the busy workers.

LITERATURE.

DR. CROTHERS ON IMMORTALITY.*

WE called attention a fortnight ago to the delightful essays by Dr. Crothers in the two volumes, "The Gentle Reader" and "The Pardoner's Wallet." There is also a volume of his sermons, published by the American Unitarian Association, "The Understanding Heart," and here also we have the Ingersoll Lecture, which he gave last year, printed at the Riverside Press, and published as a little book with the luxury of large type and pleasant margins. The lecture is worthy of all the distinction such a form can give it; it is the utterance of an idealist who sees far into the meaning of things; of a strenuous nature, one who understands that faith, which comes of self-control, rests not on the weakness, but on the strength of human nature;—"the faith not of mere visionaries, but of those who have learned by doing."

Dr. Crothers describes how a man, who has lived in a narrow world, becomes aware of the Infinite, which is all about him, in Time and Space and Force, and then shows how the first sense of his own insignificance merges into the thought that he is yet akin to something greater than himself.

"Then begins the ideal life. It is a spiritual quest, the spirit of man seeking that which shall satisfy it. It is the struggle for existence lifted to a higher level. It is the struggle to find that which shall sustain what is most distinctly human—to find food for reason, and conscience, and the finer affections. It is a struggle against the limitations which at first seemed to shut out all hope. . . . The human strife is not a rebellion against eternal law, it is the co-operation with an eternal power. The soul is not entrapped, but harnessed to fulfil a mighty task."

For the true answer to this question of the Endless Life, says Dr. Crothers, we seek the witness of the broadly, sanely, sensitively human. "What does the man himself, when he is at his best, think about it? What is the attitude of the man most man, with tenderest human needs?" It is not a question of mere duration, but of realising to the full the meaning of personal existence. We should still be loyal to duty, though we had no expectation of the future.

"The well-disciplined soul does not claim immortality as a reward for services done here. Duty is an obligation to be fulfilled, it does not involve an obligation toward us. Having done our part, we may not linger asking for further payment. Nor can we childishly refuse to recognise the sanction of moral law here, or the possibilities of noble living, until we are assured of continued existence. The ethical idealist takes the nobler alternative:

'Is there no other life, pitch this one high.'
In saying this we proclaim our moral independence. Allegiance to ideal righteousness is not contingent on what may or may not happen to us."

* "The Endless Life." By Samuel McChord Crothers. The Ingersoll Lecture, 1905. (Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston and New York. 75 cents, net.)

But then as we give ourselves up to that true life, comes the conviction that this intends eternity. Especially is this brought home to us with deep assurance when we see the ending here of a noble life. The spiritual realities are felt to be supreme, and of supreme consequence. The good man goes forth not knowing whither he goes. "It is not the weakness of selfishness, it is the soldierly spirit that makes him at the utmost verge of the earthly life long for new opportunity. He asks for no reward for things done, only the wages of going on."

The things which most bear for us the impress of the Eternal, wisdom, love, duty, joyous and free service, are personal qualities of living beings, and where these appear in the great order of the Universe, we feel that the Divine purpose is most clearly manifest. It appears quite unreasonable to suppose that of these death can make an end. When we speak thus of the permanent nature of personality, "is it," Dr. Crothers asks, "only the material Universe talking in its sleep?" On the contrary, it is the supreme reality.

"The talk of Thee and Me becomes the talk of relations of justice, mercy, and love. It reveals a universal order. It reaches into prayer and worship. The language is still personal: 'I in thee, thou in me.' It reveals an all-comprehensive unity. This is that of which—when the clouds are off our souls—we dare assert immortality."

Thus we furnish to our readers a glimpse of the meaning of this lecture, enough to make them eager to procure the book itself, and to make them glad, as we are, that Dr. Crothers is to be this year our Essex Hall lecturer.

AN INDIAN SINGER.*

"I SING just as the birds do," wrote the authoress of these attractive verses to Mr. Arthur Symons, who persuaded her that they ought to be published. "I am not a poet really. I have the vision and the desire, but not the voice. If I could write just one poem full of beauty and the spirit of greatness, I should be exultantly silent for ever; but I sing just as the birds do, and my songs are as ephemeral." Some of the verses were written when she was only seventeen, when she was in London in 1896; others after her return to India, and were sent from there in 1904, when she was twenty-five. Among these are four little verses to her four children. This to the eldest, Jaya Surya, actat. 4:—

Golden sun of victory, born
In my life's unclouded morn,
In my lambent sky of love,
May your glowing glory prove
Sacred to your consecration,
To my art and to my nation.
Sun of victory, may you be
Sun of song and liberty.

And this to the youngest, Lilamani, actat. 1:—

Limpid jewel of delight,
Severed from the tender night
Of your sheltering mother-mine,
Leap and sparkle, dance and shine,

* "The Golden Threshold," by Sarojini Naidu. With an Introduction by Arthur Symons. (W. Heinemann. 3s. 6d.).

Blithely and securely set
In love's magic coronet.
Living jewel, may you be Laughter-bound and sorrow-free.

These and other of the verses, as Mr. Symons says in his introduction, "hint, in a sort of delicately evasive way, at a rare temperament, the temperament of a woman of the East, finding expression through a Western language, and under partly Western influences. They do not express the whole of that temperament; but they express, I think, its essence, and there is an Eastern magic in them."

Here are the opening verses in a section of Folk Songs, on "Palanquin-Bearers":—

Lightly, O lightly, we bear her along,
She sways like a flower in the wind of our song;
She skims like a bird on the foam of a stream,
She floats like a laugh from the lips of a dream

Gaily, O gaily, we glide and we sing,
We bear her along like a pearl on a string.

Softly, O softly, we bear her along,
She hangs like a star in the dew of our song;

She springs like a beam on the brow of the tide,

She falls like a tear from the eyes of a bride,
Lightly, O lightly, we glide and we sing,
We bear her along like a pearl on a string.

And these are the concluding verses of the last poem in the book, "To a Buddha seated on a Lotus":—

With futile hands we seek to gain
Our inaccessible desire,
Diviner summits to attain,
With faith that sinks and feet that tire,
But nought shall conquer or control
The heavenward hunger of our soul.

The end, elusive and afar.
Still lures us with its beckoning flight,
And all our mortal moments are
A session of the Infinite.
How shall we reach the great unknown
Nirvana of thy Lotus-throne?

Sarojini, the daughter of Dr. A. Chattopādhyāy, founder of the Nizam College, Hyderabad, was born February 13, 1879. She received a scientific training, but had always a passion for poetry, and wrote a great deal. From 1895 to 1898 she was in England (with an interval of travel in Italy) having been sent from home on account of the strong opposition to her marriage with Dr. Naidu, who was not a Brahmin. She studied both at King's College, London, and at Girton; but her health broke down. In Sept., 1898, she returned to Hyderabad, and in the following December she and Dr. Naidu defied all the obstacles of caste and were married. She found in her marriage a great happiness, and indeed the poems in this book bear witness not only to her passion for beauty, but also to the heights and depths of rapture and of pain, of which she is capable. Perhaps some day she will write a great poem. She herself speaks very modestly of the "poor casual little poems" here collected together; but not only friends who knew the writer when she was in this country but many others, who hear the genuine music in these verses, will be glad that the book has been published.

SHORT NOTICES.

Hymns of the Liberal Faith: The new edition of this little book, which was first issued ten years ago, for use at special services in public halls, &c., is greatly improved. There are 59 hymns, and in the musical edition, now first published, there are 17 popular tunes, which are quite sufficient for practical use under the special circumstances. For "Abide with me," however, "Ellers" is given as the tune, because of the copyright difficulty, so that where possible an "Ancient and Modern," or other tune book which has the real tune, should also be provided where that hymn is to be used. For the rest the hymns are so arranged that most of the hymns are on the same page as a practicable tune. (British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Hall. Edition with music, paper covers, 3d. net, cloth, 6d. net. Words only; paper cover, 1d.; cloth, 2d. net.)

What do Unitarians Believe and Teach? is a bound volume under a common title of a re-issue of twelve admirable tracts, by as many well-known authors. First comes Dr. Brooke Herford's "Brief Statement of Unitarianism," then Mr. Armstrong's "Unitarian Christianity Explained," and at the end Dr. M. J. Savage's "Our Unitarian Gospel." Five others are from America, including Gannett's "Incarnation" and Chadwick's "Immortal Hope." Bowie, Street, Harwood, and Walters are the other English contributors. The book should be widely circulated. It is well printed, and in size very handy for reading. (British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Hall. 2s. net.)

Ancient Tyre and Modern England, by Philo-Anglicanus, is a volume which contains much information about these two great powers, and dwells on the more or less obvious historical parallels between them. All this can be appreciated even by readers who do not hold the particular theory of prophecy which the author seeks to apply. Among the judgments on Tyre which, according to this writer, may have an "antitypical application" to England we notice the following:—"Pestilence. . . Spiritually this denotes heresy in the Church and sectarian strife. The so-called Higher Criticism of the Holy Scriptures is undermining the faith of the unstable, Unitarianism is spreading. . . . These things, like a spiritual pestilence, destroy the life of the soul and spirit!" (Elliot Stock. 7s. 6d. net.)

Among other books received are the following:—

The Life Superlative. By Stopford A. Brooke. Selections from Sermons, edited by S. J. R. (Sir Isaac Pitman & Sons. 6s.)

Reform in Sunday School Teaching. By A. S. Peake, M.A., B.D. (James Clarke & Co. 1s. 6d. net.)

How to Teach the Bible: Suggestions as to the best way of teaching the Bible in view of modern knowledge of the Bible and of the child mind. By the Rev. A. F. Mitchell, M.A. Second and revised edition. (Williams & Norgate. 2s. 6d. net.)

OBITUARY.

MRS. CASH.

WE could only write a few words last week, recording with heart-felt sorrow the altogether unexpected death of Mrs. Cash at Milan, on Tuesday, April 3. Her two step-daughters, Mrs. Pridmore and Mrs. Carne Hill, and her niece, Miss Sibree, who had been her companion for some years, were with her at the time. Her Italian party, among whom were the Revs. Henry Gow, E. I. Fripp, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, Priestley Prime and Gordon Cooper, were at Florence, for she had sent them on, hoping in a few days to be able to follow. Mrs. Cash was not well when she left England, but hoped the change would do her good. She travelled by easy stages to Como, where she was joined by some of her party, and thence to Milan. It was only at Milan, and for not more than a week, that she was seriously ill. Happily she suffered no grievous pain, and the end was quite peaceful.

Sarah Kelsall was born in 1836 at Leeds, where she lived until her marriage to Mr. Joseph Cash, of Coventry, in 1866. Bird Grove, the historic house where George Eliot lived, was her home in Coventry until after her husband's death, some twenty-four years ago, when she settled at Hampstead.

Herself childless, there were yet many who knew the wealth and tenderness of her mother heart, and now rise up and call her blessed. It is impossible to tell of all that she did, and all that she was to her friends of every condition. For more than twenty years she had every winter given those Health Lectures to Women at the Rhyl-street Mission, Kentish Town, to which we referred last week; and she was practically the founder, and the most generous supporter, as she remained to the last one of the hon. secretaries of the Hampstead Nursing Association, for providing trained nurses for the sick poor at their own homes. The twenty-first annual report for last year records that there were 660 cases nursed. Mrs. Cash was a life governor of the National Benevolent; and her private benevolence was extended also to a large number of unsuccessful candidates. She maintained four children at the National Refuges for homeless and destitute children, and had a bed at the Paralytic Hospital, Queen's-square, at Mount Vernon Consumptive Hospital, and at Friedenheim, the Home of Peace for the dying, in Avenue-road. She provided pensions through the Charity Organisation Society, and in many other ways, of which there can be no record, out of her ample means, with truly wise and generous benevolence, she had the happiness, in all simplicity, of doing good.

Of late years one of the most beautiful things she did was, after the winter's work, to arrange those Italian parties of which we spoke last week. She had been herself a great traveller; and had, in fact, been round the world. With the keenest interest in history and art, and a great delight in all natural beauty, she had also, with overflowing human sympathies, a shrewd intelligence and a fund of humour which made her an ideal traveller. But what set those Italian holidays of hers apart was the abundant generosity with which she shared them with others. For ten years at least she went every spring to Italy, and invited a party to join her there, among whom were always a number of those who otherwise could by no means have enjoyed such a holiday. Not a few of our ministers have very grateful memories of what Mrs. Cash thus gave to them; not merely in the refreshment of a most delightful holiday, but in the quickening of deeper interests through insight into the wonderful world of Art, which only Italy can give.

Some of those whom she thus invited were strangers to her until she welcomed them to Italy, but then they quickly learned that there was offered to them a rare privilege of friendship. They will always cherish the remembrance of the beautiful grace with which she made her gifts, and found the purest pleasure in securing the happiness of others.

What was felt for her, the memorial address, which will be included in this notice, to some extent expresses, and one little memorial of last year's party we must be allowed to add here, in these lines, written at Vallombrosa, April, 1905, by the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, in a copy of his "Hortulus Pastoris," which he gave to Mrs. Cash:—

"Take, Madam, for my poor heart's sake,
That never dreamed of golden gifts
Of Venice, Florence, Vallombrosa, take
The love that my full heart uplifts.

And may this earthen vessel, this

My book chancing to meet your eyes,
Recall, for those famed spots, my bliss
Through you, generous, gentle, wise."

This year, the drive through the country south of Pisa, which had been planned, had to be abandoned on account of Mrs. Cash's illness, and her friends were summoned from Florence, as we have stated, to pay the last reverent tribute at her grave.

The funeral service, at the cemetery in Milan, on Thursday, April 5, was conducted by the Revs. Henry Gow and J. M. Lloyd Thomas, the other ministers of the party being also present. In the course of the service Mr. Gow spoke as follows:—

"We would bring to-day not the tribute of praise, but the tribute of love and grief. She whose body we commit to the earth was very simple and reticent and true. We also would be simple and reticent and true in our grief. I cannot try to express all we feel in many words. Very tenderly and lovingly we think of her, and all she did, and all she was, with thoughts too deep for words.

"We remember her as one with no touch of age or weariness in her spirit. We remember her joy in life, her quick and eager response to whatever was beautiful, her generous sympathy, her loyal and devoted friendship. There are very many who think of her as one of the truest, wisest, most deep-seeing, and understanding friends whom they have known. There was a wonderful power in her of being friends with young and old, with rich and poor, with the wise and with the ignorant. She appealed to what was best in men and women; she made them feel that they were understood.

"We remember her life as full of little, nameless, unremembered acts of kindness and of love. She did not let her left hand know what her right hand did so kindly and so well.

"We remember her for her serenity and peace. It was the serenity and peace of a great strength and a great love. Age had taken nothing from her enthusiasm, her joy, her trust in humanity, her confidence in God; it had rather deepened and purified all her joy and all her faith. There was the peace that passeth understanding in her heart, and it was felt by us all as we looked into her face and heard her voice.

"There is nothing unfitting that her grave should be in this land, far off from her own country and her most accustomed haunts. We leave her body in this land she loved so much; a land which it was her joy to help many others to know and love; a land to whose beauty her whole soul responded in reverent delight. And while we leave her body here, we feel that the spirit is with God who gave it, and that there are no far-off foreign lands with Him.

"It is with no hopeless sorrow, with no sense of lasting separation, that those who loved her would now say for a little time farewell. It is rather with a deep and reverent love and hope, with joy and thankfulness for the beauty of her life, and for the great peace of her death. She died amongst her friends, doing the kindnesses that she loved to do; rejoicing in the happiness which she knew so well how to give."

Preaching at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead, on Sunday morning, Mr. Gow spoke in similar terms of Mrs. Cash, and concluded as follows:—

"As we think of her we remember the words of Stevenson: 'When the Greeks made their fine saying that those whom the gods love die young, I cannot help believing that they had this sort of death also in their eyes. For surely at whatever age it overtakes a man this is to die young. Death has not been suffered to take so much as an illusion from the heart. In the last fit of life, tiptoe on the highest point of being, he passes at a bound on to the other side. The noise of the mallet and chisel is scarcely quenched, the trumpets are hardly done blowing, when trailing with him clouds of glory, this happy starved, full-blooded spirit passes into the spiritual land.'"

Mrs. Cash had been brought up in the Congregational connection, but on her settlement in London was drawn to Bedford Chapel by the preaching of the Rev. Stopford Brooke. Subsequently she became a warm friend of Dr. Brooke Herford's, and after the closing of Bedford Chapel joined the Rosslyn Hill congregation at Hampstead.

GEORGE CARSLAKE THOMPSON.

We published last week a memorial notice of Mr. Carslake Thompson. The following is the tribute of his minister at the West Grove Church, Cardiff:—

THE church at Cardiff and Unitarianism throughout South Wales are stricken with irreparable loss. While our city and the Principality recognised in Mr. Thompson a distinguished citizen, philanthropist, and man of wide culture, it was his religious faith, his church and his denomination that took the first place among his public interests. President of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society during 1894-6, and President of the West Grove Congregation for some years up to the time of his death, he was most minutely and punctually attentive to the business affairs, small and great, connected with our congregation. He spared neither himself nor his leisure, and his regular and unflinching presence wherever duty called was a great source of encouragement to ministers and other workers who are too accustomed to see scant attention paid by public men to religious services and "denominational" business. He brought both a generous heart and a keen, critical intellect to bear upon the discussion of our various activities; the Oxford Conference will be the poorer for the lack of his sane and vigorous contribution to its debates. Mr. Thompson was probably averse by nature to public manifestations of his religious sympathies, but if so he overcame his own disposition enough to deliver a sermon whenever required to do so, especially at the smaller churches, and then his hearers felt the power of a thoroughly rationalised presentation of their faith. His own faith was very strong and settled, and associated with it was an absolute devotion to principle and a fearlessness of results, which made him a very tower of strength to those who worked with him. In season and out of season he faithfully attended our Sunday and other gatherings. Smallness of numbers at lectures and other efforts never discouraged him. Every member of our congregation has lost a friend and example.

MISS TESCHEMACHER.

THE current number of the Indian Magazine and Review, in a memorial notice of Miss Teschemacher, who was honorary assistant secretary of the National Indian Association, speaks of her in the following terms:—"She was a devoted friend of Miss Manning, and was associated with her in her work almost from the beginning of her connection with the association. In 1889 her name began to appear on the pages of the Magazine as honorary assistant secretary; but she had long before that date been giving generously of her time to the work of the association in a quiet, unobtrusive manner, taking upon herself the burden of much of the clerical work.

"Miss Caroline Teschemacher was born at Camberwell in 1837. She was the only daughter of Edward Frederick Teschemacher, founder of the firm of Teschemacher & Smith, analytical chemists. Her mother was the eldest daughter of Richard Phillips, F.R.S., Editor of the British Pharmacopœia, and an intimate friend of Michael Faraday. Miss Teschemacher was a zealous Unitarian, and for over forty years a Sunday School teacher in the school which was formerly supervised by Dr. Martineau when he was minister of Little Portland-street Chapel. She took an active part in other good works connected with the religious body to which she belonged, and her co-operation in these will be much missed. She died on Sunday, March 18, after an illness of only a few days."

At the meeting of the Council of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of which she was a member (reported in these columns a fortnight ago), a fitting tribute was also paid to Miss Teschemacher's memory. She was one of the original members of the Central Postal Mission.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

It was a very stormy night at sea. Immense waves rose high above the awful hollows, and followed each other with a tremendous sweep and roar. The sky was black with clouds, and the wind howled in great gusts. A ship was tossing on the waters—down in the hollows and then rising on the waves; but they beat against her sorely, and the good ship creaked and groaned with the strain. All was blackness except for the ship-lights, and at times a sparkle of phosphor on the crests of the waves. On board the ship there was silence, except when the captain gave his orders to the steersman. All knew that they were in danger, for they had been driven out of their course; and there was heard at times, when there came a lull in the roar of the wind and the waves, a sound of breakers, as if there were rocks not far away. They strained their eyes through the black darkness in search of a light, for they believed that by this time they ought to see one, if they were not very much out of their reckoning.

At length, in the far distance, for a moment they thought they saw a light, but again their vessel swirled down into the hollow, and the waves towered high, and when they rose again to the crest they could see nothing. And so they struggled on, and their brave hearts trembled, but hoped on.

At length, the vessel rose again, and there clear and bright, shone out a distant light; and a shout of joy rose from the anxious men as they plied their work with fresh courage, steering towards the lighthouse and now sure of their course.

It was still hours before they came abreast of the lighthouse; but at last they turned safely into the harbour beyond, where all was calm and sheltered, and their stormy voyage was over.

We are on a voyage, too, children. Sometimes all is sunny and bright; the sea is calm, and no troubles or difficulties rise up before us; but we cannot always sail on a sunny summer sea; the darkness comes, and when there is no light we must trust to those who know the way and can guide us safely.

The waves may be high, and the storm beat round us, and all be dark. We cannot see; but one thing we can always do; we can stick to our post and do our duty; working faithfully, like the sailors, and guiding our ship onwards. If we desert our post and leave our ship to drift helplessly, it will soon be swamped by the waters; but keep her head bravely to the waves, and you will come at last to see the light, and will know it to be God's light waiting to guide you. And (like the lighthouse) the light was there all the time, though you did not see it. Is it not wonderful to think that there is a light from God for each of us—to guide us right, if we will but always keep it burning?

Sometimes we think it goes out, but it is there still if we look and wish for it, and we shall see it again.

Here are some verses about this light which you may like to learn; and they will ring on in your mind, as they have done in mine, for many a year.

I have a little trembling light, which still
All tenderly I keep, and ever will.
I think it never wholly dies away,
But oft it seems as if it could not stay,
And I do strive to keep it if I may.

Sometimes the wind-gusts push it sore aside;
Then closely to my breast my light I hide,
And for it make a tent of my two hands;
And, though it scarce might on the lamp abide,

It soon recovers, and uprightly stands.

Sometimes it seems there is no flame at all;
I look quite close because it is so small:
Then all for sorrow do I weep and sigh:
But Some One seems to listen when I cry,
And the light burns up, and I know not why.

Sometimes I say—How could I live, what do Without my light? And then—Does each of you,
Dear friends—(I think)—a little light have too?
But still I fear to speak, and can but sigh.
And it may be my secret till I die.

* * * * *
* * It is this light that shows the way
To true deeds: and the martyr who adjourns

From flames to heavenly house, finds it outburns

The pile; and so, it lighting us, we may Regain our long-lost loving ones some day.

GERTRUDE MARTINEAU.

BEAUTIFUL TO BE ALIVE.

How beautiful it is to be alive!
To wake each morn as if the Maker's grace
Did us afresh from nothingness derive,
That we might sing, "How happy is our case,

How beautiful it is to be alive!"

To read in God's great Book, until we feel Love for the love that gave it; then to kneel [shrive,

Close unto Him whose truth our souls will
While every moment's joy doth more reveal
How beautiful it is to be alive!

Rather to go without what might increase
Our worldly standing, than our souls deprive

Of frequent speech with God, or than to cease [peace,

To feel, through having wasted health or
How beautiful it is to be alive!

Not to forget, when pain and grief draw nigh,

Into the ocean of time past to dive
For memories of God's mercies, or to try
To bear all sweetly, hoping still to cry,
"How beautiful it is to be alive!"

Thus ever towards man's height of nobleness

Strive still some new progression to contrive;

Till, just as any other friend's, we press
Death's hand; and, having died, feel none the less

How beautiful it is to be alive!

EASTER.

"No more strangers and sojourners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God." It is a wonderful thought to the disciple that he also has his own place in that great fellowship—with prophets and apostles, with JESUS himself, with all the great and holy ones, the remembrance of whom lifts up our hearts to God. And to each one comes the further thought of those who are especially our own in the great household, those with whom we walk upon our earthly way, and those no less who have passed before us to the Unseen. They are not really taken from us. There is one family in heaven and on earth. We may still be together in the fellowship of love and trust, and we shall follow them into the world of light.

This gathering up into one beautiful image of spiritual fellowship all that is of real worth and dear to us in our human life has a peculiarly fitting place amid the thoughts which belong to the gladness of the Easter festival. We are now separated by many centuries from those days of strong spiritual excitement, through which the first disciples passed at the time of their Master's death, the great revulsion of joy and triumphant faith which at Easter we specially commemorate. For us it is a time of calmer retrospect, as afterwards it became to them, who through years of brave and patient service, proved the power of their faith, and found what calm and abiding joy there was in the thought of the fellowship of the saints. And yet there are in our life also moments when we realise with fresh vividness what those first days must have been to the disciples, when in our own personal experience we are led through something of the same darkness as gathered about the cross. Then we watch with them in the bitterness of their grief, amid broken hopes and the desolation of their loneliness. The silence and the darkness overshadow us, and we also ask, Can it be that this is the end of all? Then comes the uprising from the deep springs of eternal life, the witness of the Spirit within to the surer faith in things unseen, the invincible conviction that it is life, and not death, which is victorious. So it comes that even in the shadow of the sorest bereavement heaven is very near in the holy quiet of that hour, and the presence of the Father, the Friend and Guardian of all living souls, is revealed. Such memories come to be interwoven with the substance of our deeper life, and through them we are able to enter more perfectly into the wider thoughts of joy and thankfulness which gather about our faith in the Unseen, and the great fellowship of the household of God.

Every year the return of Spring becomes a parable to us of the exhaustless fountain of life, of the steadfast purpose of good, and the unfailing love of the ETERNAL. We see once more uprising from the coldness and silence of winter the new commotion of gladness and eager life, the brighter, more genial days, the returning glory of the flowers, and the trees once more putting on their robe of beauty, the song of the birds thrilling with new joy. And this renewal becomes to us a parable of the eternal hope. As we renew once more our joy in the beautiful life of the earth, there comes into the heart the stirring of a deeper faith, and we remember the beauty of that heavenly life, in which here already we may have a part, but which reaches up into the Unseen, embracing all the multitudes of the children of God. We are no more strangers or sojourners, but fellow-citizens with the saints, and of the household of God. So the thought of Spring is blended with the special Easter thought, that it is life, and not death, to which we are called.

Then we rise out of the dulness of our unbelief, away from all base thoughts, which savour only of the perishable things of the earth. We see what are the things just and true, pure and lovely, which must be our life. We rise out of all despondency and littleness of thought and aspiration, and in the midst of the general gladness of new life, understand how it was with him, who had been long troubled with bitter questionings of unbelief, but then returning to a better mind, found how—

"Nature's living motion lent
The pulse of hope to discontent.

* * * * *

"So variously seemed all things wrought
I marvelled how the mind was brought To anchor by one gloomy thought;

"And wherefore rather I made choice
To commune with that barren voice,
Than him that said, Rejoice, rejoice!"

We are surrounded by mystery. Mind is more real than matter. Our souls and God are real. Of the reality of nothing else are we sure: it floats before us a fantastic shadow-world. Mind acts on mind. The Eternal Spirit blends mind with mind, soul with soul, and is moving over us all with His mystic inspiration every hour.—F. W. Robertson.

CHRIST RISEN.

THE mind of Christendom at Easter is necessarily focussed upon the resurrection of its founder. And yet how fragmentary and misty the historic testimony. So that one impressed by this account, frames an hypothesis in accordance with his slip of evidence; another starting from a different tradition arrives at a very different conclusion. Thus, one man believes that the soul of Christ after his death returned and re-animated his body. Such a view appeals to those who cling to exceptions, to a being unrelated to the human family and unique in his experience. This very ground, however, repels others whose minds are only irritated and starved by prodigies, and in whom the instinct is predominant to trace the revelation of all beings to one another and to exhibit their common experience. Hence a preference shown by such for the view that Jesus materialised himself again for a short time on several separate occasions as spirits of the departed are said commonly to do. To the Spiritualist this is as credible with respect to Jesus as with any deceased member of an English household; while the difficulty presented by the disappearance of the body from the tomb is surely not insurmountable.

Others, again, pursuing still further the path of the normal and impressed by the story as told say by Luke, hold that Jesus did not die at all on the cross, but, being wounded in no vital part, swooned from exhaustion and pain, returning to consciousness in the cool of the night after he had been laid in the cave. The merciful connivance of the military would not have been out of harmony with the circumstances of the case; while nothing could be more emphatic than the assertion of the Master to his disciples that he was standing before them in his own proper body—"Behold my hands and my feet, that it is I myself; handle me, and see, for a spirit hath not flesh and bones as ye see me have." Only, if so, whither did Jesus disappear to directly afterwards? But yet again, discarding all these attempted explanations, there are others who protest that the risen Christ was seen of them that loved him, as still he may be seen by them that love, a spirit by the spiritual eye alone: inwardly, not outwardly. The experience of the Apostle Paul would appear to give some countenance to this view. In short, we are left without conclusive evidence as to what did take place after the crucifixion. Many of us will be fairly content to rest on the probability that there happened to Jesus what would have happened to any other human being under like circumstances. The matter-of-fact history of the life, death, and resurrection of Jesus of Nazareth is a desideratum in large measure blurred, lost, irrecoverable. But there remains an impression which stands for more than itself. The resurrection of the soul of Jesus has appealed to the heart and the imagination of mankind. As an emblem of the futility of death and of the triumph of life, it stands with the rent chrysalis and the liberated wings, with the April morning jewelled with spring flowers, with goodness in a sinful world and love allaying greed and hate, for the rupture of the material by the spiritual, for the unsuspected glory of eternity issuing through the crust of time, like the living lava of a volcano bursting through the sutures of the mountain and proving to the cold outside surface of things that at the heart of the earth still throb the inextinguishable fires.

"Christ Risen" is more than either ancient fact or ancient fable. He is the historic symbol of all things risen and rising. He is Lucifer, the flame, the soul, the dawn. He is the pregnant soil; he is democracy militant and progressive. He is the mind in quest of knowledge; he is the conscience struggling out of the hell of remorse; he is the heart impassioned by love. He is Easter.

Let Jesus stand, as stand he must forever, as a bright particular star in history. "Christ Risen" belongs to a larger category—belongs to ourselves, to all men, and to the whole globe of Nature. Perforce we contemplate the rising of life and love out of the entombing earth at this season. The spring is of one piece with Christ ascending out of the grip of death. Nature is a shell whence the inhabiting spirit escapes in the recurring periods of its power to enjoy a larger liberty.

"Death is the word of a bovine day, Know you the breast of the springing To-be."

Easter, then, pointing with one hand to the Gospel story, and with the other to the open face of nature, is a charter of the supremacy of the Spirit in a material universe. The process of life is that of breathing. We borrow of the lips the word that stands for that which though unseen in itself is yet the power, passion, and beauty of things visible. Spiritus—breathing—that constant ebb and flow of force without which the body were cold clay; but with which inhabiting, the body is all things that form, colour, and feeling are capable of revealing. This word "spirit" or "breath" is the most significant word man has yet found, or is, perhaps, likely ever to find, for the immanent Power that quickens the stolid corpus of the universe. For as our own breath, it defies our handling and our mechanical measurement of line and capacity. The Spirit is mobile, it is life. It is fire, it is love. It is sound, it is speech and music. It is content to dwell in the cells of a leaf and perfect there its microscopic realm. Or it shall abide in infinite freedom in the unvalled space between the earth and the sky—resting, flowing, singing down the wind. Such by suggestion of the imagery available to us is the style and course of that Spirit which is the life of all things—moulding every detail of their transitory features and actions, and yet abiding in infinite reserve of strength and peace and love.

Thus Nature presents to us two aspects: the outer, which we call the bodily or material, and the inner, which we call God, the ætherial element, the breath of nature. To such as have been blessed with more than ordinary power of spiritual insight, this two-foldness of all things has been so evident, and the superior importance of the less obvious aspect so far removed from doubt, that life pursued for other than spiritual ends, accompanied by other than spiritual vision has seemed to them no better than imprisonment in a charnel house. But everyone who is moved by gentle affection or is proud when a good deed is done—is alive to these higher instincts in some degree. Others who have seen more deeply stand as guides and saviours to the world. Swedenborg spoke as though he stood in daily witness of the perpetual influx of the spiritual into the material creation. He alludes to the two co-existent worlds—the natural and the spiritual—counterparts of each other, and so like in less essential features as to be indistinguishable to any but the spiritual insight. He suggests how, for lack of wisdom based upon this finer apprehension we have scarcely yet touched the ultimate uses of this heaven-charged natural world—a point he illustrates in passing by remarking how the thread of a worm suffices to clothe kings and queens in purple, and the wax of a bee for the lighting of temples and palaces. We, who at present see but the grass, the trees, and one another's faces, have yet, as Behmen put it, to see the very grass and trees, and very man.

There are times when we may be forgiven for doubting the reality of the divine structure and scheme of life, when the hungry east wind blows, sealing every tender bud and sucking the colour out of earth and sky, out of the day's routine and the morrow's hope. But there ensues a season when doubt is not tolerated, for it is not possible. When some apprehension—however sensuous—of the divine reality is forced upon us by nature's irrepressible vitality, and by a deluge of loveliness that makes language ridiculous. When heaven itself streams into every open door and window, into every open heart. If, as the mystic held, ruby and sapphire glow by reason of the high qualities of the divine spirit which they crystallise, not less plainly does the earth's renaissance declare that God awakens with His morning face.

Easter, gathering up all its holy associations with nature and the Church, should indeed help one to realise that the earth he walks on is more than earth, that

"This light that strikes his eyeball is not light,

This air that smites his forehead is not air

But vision—yea, his very hand and foot
In moments when he feels he cannot die,
And knows himself no vision to himself,
Nor the high God a vision, nor that One Who rose again."

"Christ is risen." Every man's Christ, his soul, tends by the very buoyancy of the spirit to rise through matter like flame—above sin and suffering like the lark.

Death is nature's repudiation of restrictions—the authority of death is momentous in the growth and emancipation of the soul. If we but clearly grasp the fact that a man is spirit, not matter, and that his life must therefore conform to the laws of the Spirit, we shall cease to fear or rebel against death. Death is the universal function of gaining by losing—of passing from a narrower into a wider and more gracious phase of life. It is the "Siege Perilous" in which when Galahad sat he declared "If I lose myself I find myself." In that seat a man may sit not only when the breath leaves his body, but when he lets his selfish ambitions sink in the strong tide of social benevolence; when all his crafty expedencies surrender to a noble purpose; when strength and pleasure take up the burden and with it the joy of service, and sorrow forgets its personal concern in the thought of the weal of others. In these ways men are dying daily to higher life, but not to sorrow. The gospel of the Resurrection and of Easter affirm that life demands great and frequent sacrifice, but that its law is the law of love—not fear—not sorrow. When the light is taken from us and our cup is filled with gall, grieve we needs must—but not always. Grief, like the passing funeral, has to go its way, and in a moment the street of life is filled with its invulnerable children. H. M. L.

THE BETTER PART.

THE Bible will probably survive much literary effort on its behalf. Many quaint things have been said and done in the name of religion, but few things so quaint as the defence of a doctrine of the Resurrection by a flamboyant novelist in a book that floated into notoriety on the strength of so unstable a thing as an episcopal rubric. The Bible will still retain its charm, the spirit of religion will still be inspiring in its simplicity, the doctrine of the Resurrection will still have a spiritual meaning for spiritual minds, after the Lower Novelist, at grips with the Higher Critic, has done his best. And morality, too, will survive the most woeful travesty it has ever yet been subjected to. Morality in the lurid world of the sensational novel is a precarious thing. People will not try and be good unless they are assured of immortality, and that their "vile bodies" will sooner or later be raised from the dead. They are "loyalists" so long as their private interests are duly respected. They are of Satan's opinion, that the righteous do not serve God for nought. If Christ did not rise corporeally, they are seized with a tragic nightmare, under the spell of which they become the most "cream-faced," "lily-livered" things in creation. Their trustworthiness and honesty are conditional, and, according to the findings of the Higher Critic, their world remains solid or is distilled to jelly with the act of fear. The Higher Critic is rapidly becoming the Rhadamanthus of a Lower World peopled by the creatures of the flamboyant novelist. If we give up the Resurrection in their sense, we are said to give up all; i.e., there is no basis for belief in God's existence, in a future life, nor in the necessity of leading good lives. If Jesus were only a man, what guarantee have we that his good life and his beautiful teachings are not illusory? At any rate, what binding power have they upon us? Before reading what a novelist has apparently seriously thought possible, we should have been amazed at hearing this kind of argument from people who, we should have felt sure, could not be bad if they tried, and who would feel hurt if you suggested that their good deeds depended upon this belief in Christ's Resurrection, or, indeed, upon any secondary motive, such as belief in a future life, or fear of hell, or desire of heaven, or even because of belief in God. Apparently Matthew Arnold seems to have met with people who used this argument, and they seem to have been good people who thought they could be bad if they tried, and who, as soon as they became convinced that Jesus was only human, and that they had hitherto been good (or believed so) only because they believed he had risen and was God, thought they would be bad or try to be. Matthew Arnold tries to meet their peculiar case in a fine, well-known sonnet entitled "The Better Part." It is a fair retort, at any rate, upon those who think they could be bad if they tried. The case of those who could not be bad if they tried, who yet feel that we give up all in giving up the Resurrection, needs a consideration of a different kind. This is Arnold's sonnet:—

Long fed on boundless hopes, O race of man,

How angrily thou spurn'st all simpler fare!

"Christ," someone says, "was human as we are;

No judge eyes us from Heaven, our sin to scan;

We live no more, when we have done our span."

"Well, then, for Christ," thou answerest, "who can care?

From sin, which Heaven records not, why forbear?

Live we like brutes, our life without a plan!"

So answerest thou; but why not rather say:

"Hath man no second life?—Pitch this one high!

Sits there no judge in Heaven, our sin to see?—

More strictly, then, the inward judge obey!

Was Christ a man like us? Ah! let us try

If we then, too, can be such men as he!"

Well, the good man (uncertain of himself) who would try to be bad after such a view of the case would deserve all that came to him, but he may depend upon it that when he comes to the state of soul in which he fain would eat of the husks that the swine did eat, he will perceive that the poet was right, and when he sees the folly of folly, the wickedness of wickedness, and the beastliness of beastliness, his humiliation will hardly be lightened by remembering that he has wasted his heritage. He may then catch on to the great parable of Christ as a drowning man to a straw, and at least try whether the Father in the parable is a reality and divine, even if Christ is only human. For is it not amazing to think that those who stake all on Christ's divinity, calmly ignore his own divine trust in a Heavenly Father? On bad men who experience no difficulty in being bad, the miracle of the Resurrection could have no particularly efficacious effect, as both the Scripture and ordinary common experience testify. The Scripture certainly had no faith in the effect of miracles to make men good, for it says "that if one should rise from the dead they would not repent." That seems to point to a fairly firm conviction in some men's minds that the work of renewing the mind, and of doing and being good, is entirely independent either of miraculous intervention or of any promise of reward or of fear of punishment. We are thus brought to the crux of the whole matter by considering the case of those who could not be bad if they tried, i.e., who could not be unjust, untrue, unmerciful, but who yet think that all is lost if we give up the Resurrection. What, indeed, in their case, has happened is this: they have chosen the "Better Part," for the simple reason that it is the better part, quite irrespective of other motives. They have not sinned against the Holy Ghost. If in matters intellectual they saw that two and two made four, they have for no motives, good, bad, or indifferent, been induced to say they made five: they have chosen the better part, they chose truth, because it was truth. If the beauty of spring has touched and filled their hearts through the glad sight of opening leaves and flowers, they have for no motives on earth refused the testimony of beauty, and called these things ugly, or denied their joy in them; they have chosen the better part; they chose beauty because it was beauty, and as they refuse the intellectual worse part of trying to work on the false principle that two and two make five, so they refuse the æsthetic worse part of trying to work on the false principle that ugliness is exhilarating. And no otherwise do they choose the better part in the goodness of character: the just, the true, the merciful, the gentle course is chosen simply because it is just, true, merciful, and gentle. If the simple truth of two and two being four does not draw you to see it, no belief in God will help you to do so: if a golden daffodil is not beautiful to you, nor makes your heart leap up at the sight of it, if its beauty does not draw you to see its beauty, no belief in God can help you to do so. If goodness, justice, mercy, gentleness, love do not draw you by their essential spirituality to see that spirituality, no belief in God or the Resurrection of the Incarnation of this essential spirituality will ever help you to do so. We are not drawn to these things because we believe in God, but we are drawn to God because we believe in these things. And when we first see the thrilling simplicity of the access of Jesus to the Father, and how it was this Holy Spirit in all things that had led him into all truth, and how he desired that we should be led by the same Spirit, we have the means of understanding him and of seeing him in reality—his spiritual self, the risen Christ of the disciples. Well, this view may be too childlike simple for the taste of a sensational novelist, but he may be assured, that even should the worst fears of his imagination ever prove true, and some innocent Higher Critic should unearth some real evidence to shake men's belief in the bodily Resurrection, this childlike simple means of access to truth and God would save men as a whole from such an exhibition of religious poltroonery as was never surely before surmised to exist by even the sickliest fancy. The materialistic doctrine which his book was designed to bolster up, provided, perhaps, after all, the only appropriate buttress to the precarious morality of his creatures. The facile naughtiness of but recently devout believers in that doctrine seems to imply that the buttress was, after all, a little irksome.

REMEMBRANCE IN THE LORD'S SUPPER.

BY THE REV. AMBROSE BENNETT.

"This do in remembrance of me."—1 Cor. xi., 24.

WE have in the New Testament four accounts of the institution of the Lord's Supper. It is recorded by the first three evangelists and by St. Paul. That of St. Paul is, in all probability, the earliest written account. The tradition which he has received represents the injunction, "Do this in remembrance of me," as being uttered in reference both to the eating of the bread and the drinking of the cup. St. Luke, whose narrative also contains these words, associates them with the bread only. It is doubtful how far his acquaintance with them is independent of St. Paul's writing, but their inclusion in his Gospel is at least a further witness to the fact that in the earliest times of the Christian Church the idea of remembrance, the remembrance of Christ's death, held a leading place in the general conception of the Supper.

The Lord's Supper has ever been observed in remembrance of Christ as a memorial office. We may say that of every form of it. We must, of course, say very much more than that of some, indeed of most, of the forms which it has taken. But whether we speak of the observance according to the Catholic or the Evangelical interpretation, or, again, whether it be regarded as done in obedience to a direct command, or only as a fitting expression of the Christian consciousness, it may still be said that the idea of remembrance is not wanting to any one of these varieties.

Now the question arises, what is involved in this idea of remembrance? The mere words—remembrance, commemoration, memorial rite—do not tell us very much, do not take us very far. What may we suppose to have been in our Lord's mind when he used such an expression as is contained in our text? What may we suppose to have been in the minds of those who first obeyed the request, of those who continued steadfastly in the breaking of the bread? Remembrance in itself is an insufficient answer. We have to inquire, what is the purpose of remembrance? What is the object in view? What is the end that a commemorating community sets itself in the act?

There is more than one kind of remembrance. May we not distinguish between two kinds, of one of which we may say that it is remembrance with a purpose, and of the other that it seems scarcely possible to speak of it in this way? There are times when we remember, when we recall what is past, persons, scenes, actions, events, and have no definite object in so recalling them. We may do so simply for the pleasure, or it may be for the pain, of calling up the past. Nothing else is in view but the satisfaction of the moment. Strictly speaking, of course, this too has purpose, but we shall see in a moment, I think, that a clear distinction is to be drawn between purpose of this character and the more definite, intelligent, deliberative purpose to which I would call your attention. You sit by the fire in a lazy mood and call up images of the past, persons you have known, events you have witnessed, actions in which you have shared. That is one kind of remembrance. It has to do with the present moment. No further object than the moment's satisfaction is before you. The mind lies, as it were, in a semi-passive condition, just allowing images of the past to wander over it at will. But there is another kind of remembrance. There is a remembrance in which we call up the past, not for the sake of the past, not for any present gratification, but for the sake of the future. We remember with the definitely conceived intention of being better for the remembrance. This is much more than idle reverie, more than dreamy luxurious recollection. It is active, full of purpose, foreseeing, deliberate. It implies resolution, self-consecration, dedication.

Now it is this second kind of remembrance which we must bear in mind when we are thinking of the words, "This do in remembrance of me," when we speak of the Lord's Supper as a memorial rite. It can scarcely be doubted that this was the kind of remembrance that the Master had in mind. This also must have governed the apostles in their steadfast continuance in the breaking of the bread. They used the symbols of remembrance not for the sake of the past, but for the sake of the future. They did not invoke his image in recollection simply for the pleasure of having it before them, but they did it with a clear and deliberate purpose, that they might pledge themselves once more to his allegiance, that they might promise future service in his name.

And this at all times is the kind of remembrance that has been associated with Holy Communion. Its familiar designation, the Sacrament, is at least in part explained by this; for though there are other senses attaching to this word which have had much to do with its use in this connection, it is its significance as a pledge of fidelity to a commander that has determined its acceptance among all who have been specially careful to interpret the rite as the means by which the Christian renews his obligation of faithfulness to the Captain of his salvation.

I have spoken of a remembrance which lacks definite purpose, where the mind calls up images of the past and is satisfied when they come. It recollects without meaning to do anything with its recollections. There is a state of the religious life which is something like that. Men sometimes suppose that to have religious sentiments is to have religion. They will let religious thoughts and ideas travel through their minds, religious feelings ebb and flow in their hearts, and never get beyond this. They suffer these things to pass in and out, but never do anything with them. This is a temptation which besets us all. It is the temptation to let vague and indefinite feelings do duty for clear purposes and deliberate resolves. We are always too ready to think that the religious mind can be fed with beautiful sentiments, with large and sounding general ideas. Feeling has, of course, a great part to play, and the express cultivation of good feelings as such is indispensable for religious knowledge. But we do not realise enough that we must have more than good feelings; they must be made to crystallise into some fixity of purpose, some finality of aim. We have heard much of late of religious revivals; some of the dangers which not infrequently arise, and the best means of counteracting them have been pointed out. High emotions are aroused at such times; men see visions and dream dreams, dreams often of higher possibilities of life, new impulses for good visit their hearts. One danger is that when the time of exalted emotion is past, it should leave no positive and solid good behind. And the advice, which is usually given in order to avoid such a conclusion, lays stress on the need of making some express use of the emotion before it goes. "Fix," it is said, "the flying impulse by some positive act. Take up some work, form some new habit, which will involve you in what is practically a pledge to continue in it. Get yourself committed to some definite piece of good." But it cannot be said that such counsels as these are needed only by those who have been drawn into the fervid temper of revivals; it cannot be said that only such are liable to the peril in question. Similar possibilities are found in times unmarked by religious excitement, and in quarters that revivalism never enters. There is a like danger when we are simply meeting for worship at the customary intervals in the ordinary uneventful way; it is the danger lest the ideas and sentiments which we bring before our minds on these occasions should do no definite work in us, should merely wander in and out of the mind and effect nothing.

It is so easy to sit passively and watch, as it were, large and stately ideas go by. It is another matter altogether to take ourselves in hand, and by the deliberate girding up of the mind, pledge and promise ourselves to some one clear and definite aim.

There is a want of this to-day. There is a disposition on the part of many to make the religious life consist too much in the detached admiration of ideas, too little in personal resolve and the bracing of the will to definite and immediate tasks, too much in indolent aspiration, too little in self-discipline. Take the familiar phrase, "Christianity not a creed, but a life." There we have an idea, the truth and significance of which it is always well to keep before us. The world needs constantly to be reminded of it. But observe in what its worth resides. As a negation, as a protest against another view, real or imagined, it is definite and pointed and precise, and as such it has power and value. But as a piece of constructive inspiration it is of little account, because it is too featureless and vague. It is easy to go on repeating the idea, to look at and admire it, and to remain wholly uninfluenced by it. What we want is something very much more than this. We want, first of all, a clear and definite picture, precise in outline, pointed in detail, of what that life is, what it means, what it demands, where it is to be found, and whence it springs. And secondly, having that before us, we need the deliberate purpose to make it ours; we need to promise and to renew the promise, to make a covenant with God to that end.

The writer of the 119th Psalm sings the praises of the Law. He speaks of its wonder, its truth, its breadth, its everlastingness. He tells of his delight in meditating on its contents. But this is not all. This he might do and still remain in a certain aloofness. He does more; he binds it upon him: "I have sworn and am steadfastly purposed to keep Thy righteous judgments." That is the attitude that is wanted in the religion of many of us to-day; a little more deliberate purposing, a little more readiness by specific acts to enrol ourselves in a definite allegiance.

It is possible to take a great conception like the brotherhood of man and descant upon its beauty and its reasonableness as though it were some external object. But it has not entered the sphere of religion at all until it is related in some way to our several personal wills and becomes a definite enterprise to which we are individually committed. "One is your Master, even Christ, and all ye are brethren." As we give ourselves by conscious resolve to that particular loyalty do we grow in power to fulfil in practice the universal relation.

Christians have found in the Lord's Supper the most valuable of all aids to that purposeful remembrance we have been considering. They have found in it an opportunity to make their aspirations more real, their better impulses less fluid and elusive. It has helped them by presenting a safeguard against resting too much in mere sentiments and opinions. It has helped them out of impotent vagueness and indefiniteness. One source of its special value, says a recent writer, engaged in urging that liberalism in religion should be dissociated from any disparagement of outward worship, of signs and symbols, and the practice of Christian devotion, lies in the fact that it calls upon us to do something for ourselves. We are active here in a sense which is not true of us, as a rule, in other acts of worship. For "it calls upon us to examine our lives; to make a definite confession to God of definite sins; to make definite acts of penitence, of resolution, of self-dedication; and to make open profession before our fellow-men of our desire to lead the life of Christ." In this way we make provision that that which we seek shall prove an enduring means of grace: that the blessing it brings may become to us something more than 'the remembrance of a guest that tarrieth but a day.'

"I CANNOT TELL."

THE love of God is the great fact on which the hope of immortality rests. It is a spiritual fact. It is not open to the doubt which attends historical events. It does not depend on outward evidence; its witness is within; its truth is a truth of intuition. Out of the soul's own conviction that God is love flows the inference of the higher reason, that nothing which God loves, and finds worthy of His love, can die. If He is immortal Spirit, the lives which are born of His life are spirit of His Spirit, and are immortal also. The mind refuses to think that the soul of Jesus, His best beloved Son, faded away out of his Father's hand, and out of his Father's heart—faded away into nothingness and was as though it had never been. In the realm of spirit, spirit is the reality—not the flesh—and it is enough to say, "Into thy hands I commend my spirit," without thought of the body.

Nor is this independence of the spirit felt only in the hour of death. We have it from St. Paul that there were times to him of spiritual exaltation, when he could not say whether he was in the body or out of the body. And, strange to say, the thought of disconnection from the body does not seem then to trouble him at all. In the body, or out of the body, he cannot tell; God knoweth.

We do not speak of "revelations from the Lord," but we have our moments of higher spiritual experience, and in these moments the connection of the body is irrelevant—in the body, or out of the body, we cannot tell—it is the spirit that then lives, and is conscious of no other life, and needs no other life than its own.

May not this super-normal experience, already our own, be an intimation to us of the mode of future existence? We know what it is in brief snatches to ascend spiritually into heavenly places now, to leave the world behind, to leave, it may be, our own bodies; we cannot tell. We need not then be shut out from Easter hope and joy. There is a third heaven of loving faith in the loving God, to which all may be caught up. We do not all see with the same eyes. The evidence which satisfies one does not satisfy another. There are those who look for the wounded hands, the wounded side; there are those to whom even these signs of bodily resuscitation would bring no conviction. Whether it was in the body, or out of the body, that Christ was "seen," we cannot tell. The belief in his resurrection, explain it as we may, had upon his immediate followers an untold effect, and, through them, upon the world. Men for the first time looked "stedfastly" into heaven. The risen Christ has from that time been followed with fixed and earnest gaze into a world unseen, yet not unknown. Out of that world he came, to that world be witnessed, to that world be returned; into that spiritual world our own spirits sometimes ascend; into that world, whether in the body, or out of the body, we hope to be caught up, with those who have gone before—with them, and with him, continually to dwell. We comfort one another with these words.

LIFE ETERNAL.

How do I know that after this Another life there is?
Another life? There is but one;
In mystery begun,
Continued in a miracle, God's breath,
The living soul, spells not the name of death.

How know I that I am alive?
So only as I thrive
On truth, whose sweetness keeps the soul
Vigorous and pure and whole:
Heaven's health within is immortality—
The life that is and ever more shall be.

LUCY LARCOM.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE fifty-sixth annual meeting of this society was held at Essex Hall on Thursday evening, April 5. The President, Mr. Hahnemann Epps, and Mrs. Epps received the members and friends, and tea and coffee were served before the business began.

Mr. G. H. CLENNELL, who has been hon. secretary for the past ten years, and has now retired, announced a message of greeting from the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, who was in the East; and a number of letters of regret for absence, including one from the Rev. Charles Roper and from the Rev. F. Hankinson, the newly appointed minister at Kentish Town. Also an apology from Dr. Blyth, the treasurer, who was unable to be present.

The Committee's Report, which had been previously printed and circulated, opened with a statement of the urgent need for the appointment of a missionary minister. If a suitable man could be found he would be of the greatest service in the oversight of aided churches and in pioneer work. There was abundant scope for such work in many populous suburban districts—e.g., Fulham, Chelsea, Sydenham, Finchley, Barnet, Wimbledon—where Unitarian Christianity was at present unrepresented by any centre of religious fellowship. The success of the five services recently held at Wimbledon was noted with pleasure. The Three Churches Building Fund had been closed, having reached a total of £3,131 5s., the greater part of which was invested until required. The Churches of Kilburn, Lewisham, and Plumstead were engaged in formulating plans, and agreeing upon procedure as to the next steps towards securing their church buildings. The retirement of the Secretary was recorded in the following paragraph:—

The Committee have received with great regret the resignation of Mr. G. H. Clennell as Secretary of the Society. Mr. Clennell has occupied that important post for the past ten years, and has fulfilled the duties with a thoroughness and a grasp of detail that have been invaluable to the Society. Mr. Clennell has felt compelled through the pressure of other work to give up the Secretaryship, and he will carry with him the good wishes of all his colleagues, who, while expressing their regret at his loss from his official position, trust that his interest in, and insight into, the work of the L.D.U.S. may still be retained by them, and that from his place on the Committee they may still have the benefit of his advice and co-operation for many years to come.

The retirement of the Rev. A. F. G. Fletcher from the ministry at Peckham, on which he had entered with so much promise, owing to a breakdown of health, was noted with much regret. At Acton, under the Rev. A. Hurn, good progress was being made, and the congregation were about to erect an iron church on the site that has been secured. The settlement of the Revs. Charles Roper at Kilburn, H. Rawlings at Hackney, F. Hankinson at Kentish Town, and A.

Golland as assistant minister at Essex Church were recorded, and the temporary charge of Mr. Capleton at Stepney. The normal expenditure during the year, it was noted, amounted to £561 11s. 5d., and the total income to £491 5s. 7d., which had involved a reduction of capital by £70, while annual subscriptions amounted only to £216 3s. The report concluded with an appeal for a larger income and more active support and individual interest, especially on the part of the younger Unitarians. There was much important work in the great metropolitan area waiting to be done.

Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE, in presenting the accounts, regretted the absence of his co-treasurer, Dr. Blyth, who, he said, really did the work. He repeated what he had often said before, that it was a standing disgrace to London Unitarians that the subscriptions to that pioneer society amounted only to some miserable £200 a year. The grants to Kilburn and the Three Churches Building Fund they had been obliged to pay out of capital, which was now reduced to under £700. With more funds they could do a great deal more work. He read the passage of the report referring to Mr. Clennell's resignation, and said with how much regret it had been received. From his own experience he warmly endorsed that tribute.

The PRESIDENT in moving the adoption of the report and accounts called attention to the special features of interest and strongly emphasised the need for a missionary minister to take up the work the Rev. J. H. Wicksteed had resigned. If only a gifted man could be found, they would make the appointment, and trust to the necessary means being found. They wanted an apostolic man, with spiritual force of character and winsome personality like Brooke Herford or Robert Spears; but whatever men of that kind they had were already occupied in important work. If members would give the mandate, e.g., by doubling their subscriptions the committee would go on and endeavour to meet that need, and do something to serve those populous localities to which the report referred. He spoke with great satisfaction of the success of the Wimbledon services, and referred with words of appreciation to each of the ministers newly settled in the district. He pointed to the meagre subscription list and the small number of subscribers, and earnestly appealed for more loyal support. In conclusion he referred to the retirement of the secretary, saying that his colleagues on the committee wished him to accept the gift which would be made that evening, as an expression of their warm regard.

Mr. CLAUDE H. B. EPPS, a son of the President, and second science master at Winchester, who was the first secretary of the Cambridge services, seconded the motion, and gave an interesting account of the origin of those Cambridge services, and the steps they had taken in organising them. The average attendance of 34 at the services, which had since been regularly held during term, had been steadily maintained. After this summer there would only be three of the original men, who had worked for the services, left at Cambridge, and it was most important to enlist the interest of new men. He urged all those who knew of young men going up to Cambridge to put them in touch with the organisers of the services. It had been possible even for the son of a Unitarian minister to go up to Cambridge and not know that such services were being held. As regards their work generally, he thought more organisation was needed. There ought to be a kind of Unitarian clearing house, to make sure that no young man was lost to them. The President had referred to the need of an apostle minister. They all ought to be that, and make their personal influence as Unitarians felt wherever they might be.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE supported the motion, and said that it was not so much organisation they needed, but more faith, hope, and courage. Reference had been made to older Unitarians as indifferent, but some of them, as they well knew in that Society, were as enthusiastic and faithful as any. Those who believed that they had a Gospel helpful for heart and life, must do all they could to promote that work. In every part of London there was an opportunity for work, which no one else was prepared to undertake. He had seen at Wimbledon how to those present their word had come as a Gospel of light and inspiration. He hoped that Society would pay no heed to the grumbles, but go ahead, so long as they were satisfied that there were large numbers of the people ready to hear, and they could give them a helpful religion in harmony with their reason and conscience.

The Rev. W. H. READ, formerly a Roman Catholic priest, added a few words on the importance of the work, and spoke of what the Roman Catholics did at Cambridge to meet the needs of their students in the University. The motion was unanimously adopted.

Mr. HOWARD YOUNG, the retiring chairman of Committee, then made the presentation to Mr. Clennell in recognition of his ten years' services as hon. secretary. The gift was not visibly present, but was of a book-case and the means to buy some books to go into it. Mr. Young told how ten years ago Dr. Brooke Herford had given fresh impulse to their work, and had induced some young men to throw themselves into it, and how highly they had appreciated Mr. Clennell's services.

Mr. G. H. CLENNELL, in acknowledging the gift, said it was difficult to express all that he felt at that time, but he thanked them for their gift and their constant kindness. He had felt obliged to relinquish that work because of the increase of other claims. He had accepted the secretaryship of the Hackney congregation, into which he was born, and which had a hereditary claim upon him. He referred to the progress of the work during his term of office. When he joined there were 26 churches on their roll, now there were 29; then 12 were assisted, now only 8. They were stronger in numbers and in the character of their congregations. During his first year they were engaged in an interesting experiment at Bermondsey, and though they had been met by special difficulties there, he still felt that, given a suitable district and accommodation, an industrial class congregation, such as they had in the North of England, might be formed and made self-supporting in London also. The good work of the Mansford-street Church and Mission, closely linked with the Hampstead congregation, he referred to as an example which might well be followed in other cases, and spoke of Stratford as an example of what a congregation could do without a minister. The bazaar of 1900, in which they aimed at £12,000 and got £14,000, had been a great encouragement, and had secured to them their Permanent Chapels Building Fund. It was a great service also to bring the members of their different churches together, and make them feel their unity. They had also spent nearly £4,000 on the improvement of churches, and, at the same time, had stimulated self-help in the churches, for altogether £6,000 had been spent on that work. He expressed his personal thanks to those with whom he had worked, and referred to the honourable line of their Presidents under whom he had served, Sir J. C. Lawrence, Mr. S. S. Tayler, Sir J. T. Brunner, Mr. David Martineau, Sir Edwin Durning-Lawrence, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, and Mr. Epps, and also to his co-secretaries, Mr. W. Bailly, the Revs. J. E. Stronge and E. S. Hicks. He left the work with confidence in Mr. Hicks's hands.

On the motion of Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR, seconded by the Rev. W. L. Tucker, the officers were appointed, with Mr. John Harrison as President, Mr. Epps and Mr. I. S. Lister being added to the list of vice-presidents, Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke and Dr. C. F. T. Blyth treasurers, and the Rev. E. Savell Hicks hon. secretary.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON, in acknowledging his appointment, said it was a great pleasure to him to be president of a society distinctly called Unitarian, which was a name he loved and accepted without reservation. He took a deep interest in any society that looked after their churches. In the Provincial Assembly he had done what he could to promote their welfare, and he was himself treasurer of three congregations. He recalled a memory of long ago, when he was taken as a boy one autumn evening to a hall in the Borough-road to hear a lecture by a minister on Unitarian beliefs. He had been impressed by the great hall and the large audience. It was one of a course of lectures organised by the late James Clarke Lawrence to inaugurate the foundation of that society. Among the lecturers in the course were Mr. Boucher (then at Hackney), Mr. Mardon, and Dr. Hutton (of Carter-lane). The other three lectures were given by John Harrison [his father, minister at Effra-road, Brixton]; so the present occasion was not the first on which that name had been associated with the London District Unitarian Society.

On the motion of the Rev. W. C. POPE, seconded by Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, the committee was appointed, with Mr. Percy Preston as chairman, and Mr. Ronald Bartram and Mr. W. B. Odgers, jun., as new members; and a vote of thanks to the President, moved by the Rev. E. S. Hicks and seconded by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, brought the meeting to a close.

THE TRIENNIAL CONFERENCE.

SIR,—I thank my friend, Mr. Harwood, for his letter, and am glad to know that the form of invitation to the Rev. T. Rhondda Williams had not the sanction of the Conference Committee. Perhaps Mr. Harwood will permit me to say that I never for one moment supposed that the letter in question had been written by him, or that he would have used such an expression as the one I complained of. May I add that I am as glad as Mr. Harwood is to welcome representatives from other churches amongst us—indeed, I am not aware of anyone having even criticised, far less objected to, the action of the committee in inviting Dr. Rashdall and Mr. Williams; but that is a very different thing from belittling our own name and position in order to make such an invitation more easy to accept, or to enable our guests to explain their coming amongst us. This is what I consider the writer of the letter to Mr. Williams has in effect done, and it is against this that I venture to protest.

We add nothing to the dignity of others by gratuitously lowering our own.

LONDON DISTRICT UNITARIAN SOCIETY.

SIR,—May I ask the courtesy of your columns to give notice to all it may concern that I have now ceased to be Secretary of the London District Unitarian Society, and that my successor is Rev. E. Savell Hicks, of 26, Marquess-road, Canonbury, to whom all communications relating to the Society should be addressed.

A WARNING.

SIR,—The man "James Smith," who goes about using my name for begging purposes is an impostor. His statement that he is a member of my congregation is not true.

THE GOOD OF FREE LIBRARIES.

SIR,—Without claiming that free libraries are an unmixed good, I can, from what I have seen since one was opened here a few months ago, testify to their being of great value. Every evening during the winter the reading room was crowded with youths and young men, some of whom were reading the Athenæum, the Spectator, the Bookman, and the reviews, of which we have the Contemporary, the Nineteenth Century, and the University, and I have frequently seen the quarto "Channing" I gave taken from the shelves in the reference library. Most of these studious youths would, but for Mr. Carnegie's generosity, have been in the street, some in the public-houses. They are quiet and well-behaved, and are getting good and out of harm's way. I am on a library committee, and I find I can be very helpful by suggesting good books, and have introduced some for which I have been thanked by grateful readers. I may mention Armstrong's "Makers of the Nineteenth Century," as one that is very highly spoken of. The betting news is covered over with gummed paper before the papers are brought into the reading room, so we have no difficulty with the people who would come solely for it.

Previous to the opening of our Library there were two connected with the political clubs. The clubs themselves run on beer barrels, and I am told there is always a good deal of betting going on in them. I feel very thankful we have now an institution where young people can go without running any danger of suffering from evil communications, and shall always feel grateful to Mr. Carnegie for enabling me to read books and see papers that I could not do but for his munificence.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES

Bridgend.—A sermon by the Rev. D. G. Rees, on "Christian Socialism," preached in the Old Meeting House on Sunday evening, March 25, is fully reported in the local Chronicle of April 6.

Bristol (Lewin's Mead).—A very interesting service, on the occasion of the association of five of the elder scholars from the Sunday-schools with the congregation, was held in the chapel on Sunday afternoon last. The children from the schools, accompanied by their teachers and by friends from the congregation, joined in a simple devotional service, and were addressed by the Rev. A. N. Blatchford. In recognition of their entrance into the congregation the young people were reminded of the honourable record of the old house of prayer, in which they now solemnly resolved to find their religious home. Their purpose was a sure testimony to the kind and wise influence of their teachers, and, whilst declaring their intention to walk worthily of the vocation wherewith they had been called, they were bidden to cherish those recollections of their school days which they would find full of affectionate interest throughout their lives. To the girls, more especially, the spirit of Mary Carpenter was instanced as a beautiful inspiration to a useful and self-sacrificing life; and before them all the simple and uplifting doctrines of our religious trust were earnestly set forth. A cordial welcome into congregational fellowship was given on behalf of the congregation by Mr. H. Shapecott Bunce, who, in days past, had long been connected with the Sunday-schools, first as a scholar and subsequently as a teacher, after which he presented to each candidate for recognition, as a gift from the Congregational Committee, a copy of the hymn and chant book used in the services at Lewin's Mead. The service was one of much interest, and it is satisfactory to know that for several years it has taken its place among the annual experiences of the Lewin's Mead congregation.

Cardiff.—A resolution expressing the deepest regret of the congregation at the death of Mr. G. Carslake Thompson, and heartfelt sympathy with Mrs. Thompson and her family, was passed by the congregation at the West Grove Church on Sunday, in reverent silence. The Dead March in "Saul" was afterwards played.

Chorley.—The Rev. W. T. Bushrod last Sunday celebrated the first anniversary of his settlement as minister, and there was a much larger congregation than usual, representing many shades of religious thought.

Congleton.—On Sunday, the 8th inst., the Sunday-school sermons were preached by the Rev. W. G. Cadman, of Macclesfield, afternoon and evening. The collections were satisfactory.

Flowerly Field, Hyde.—A very successful sale of work was held in the schools on Saturday afternoon, March 31, opened by Miss Margaret Ashton, Rev. H. E. Dowson presiding. The amount realised will be between £80 and £90.

Hinckley.—A very pleasant and well-attended social gathering was held at the Great Meeting on Wednesday evening, the 4th inst., to mark the termination of another session of the men's Bible-class, conducted by the minister, the Rev. T. J. Jenkins. R. Blatchford's book, "God and My Neighbour" has been the chief topic of discussion during the session, and the Rev. T. J. Jenkins's examination and criticism of its contentions have been very helpful and much appreciated. A good average attendance has been maintained, and twenty-nine prizes were handed to members of the class for regular attendance by Mr. W. Johnson. The singing class in connection with this place of worship has just concluded the winter season by giving five successful performances of the operetta "Sherwood's Queen." The performances were well patronised, and much praise is due to the members of the class for the great care bestowed on the production.

Huddersfield.—A Sale of Work, opened by the Mayor, has just been held, and has realised £90, which clears off all liabilities, and leaves some £34 in hand towards the expenses for the current year.

Leicester: Great Meeting (Welcome Meeting).—On Friday evening, April 6, a congregational Soirée was held in the schools of the Great Meeting to welcome the Rev. A. Hermann Thomas, the new minister, and his wife. Mr. A. H. Paget, chairman of the vestry, presided, and read a letter from Mr. T. Grosvenor Lee, of Mr. Thomas's former congregation at Stourbridge, congratulating them and Mr. Thomas on their new connection. A telegram was also received from the Stourbridge Boys' and Girls' Clubs, wishing Mr. Thomas God-speed in his new sphere. The chairman said they had met to inaugurate another ministry at the Great Meeting, and the large and influential gathering that evening showed how real and general was interest in the event. It seemed inherent to a ministerial career that there should be periodical changes, and those changes to the ministers themselves could not be altogether pleasant or free from regret. Mr. Thomas was that day coming to a far larger town than Stourbridge, to a congregation rich in old traditions, and hopeful as regards the future. Ministers of that church had always been prominent townsmen, standing for civil and religious liberty, for wise and scientific philanthropy, for the spread of knowledge, and for mental culture. By education and temperament Mr. Thomas was well qualified to carry on those traditions, and their earnest hope was that the ministry begun that night might prove in the best sense of the word happy and lasting. They could not on that occasion help thinking of a similar gathering three years ago, which began the brilliant but sadly brief ministry of Mr. Thomas's immediate predecessor. He was sure that they had Mr. Lummis's best wishes for the future of that congregation, and to him in his exile for reasons of health their thoughts would go out with grateful and hopeful sympathy. Concluding, Mr. Paget, on behalf of the vestry and congregation, extended a very hearty welcome to the new minister and Mrs. Thomas. Four little girls then presented a bouquet to Mrs. Thomas, after which Mr. Edwin Clephan, as the oldest member of the congregation, joined in the official welcome. In a brief historical sketch he mentioned the important part that church played in Leicester in the early part of the last century, and observed that the future lay with the young people, whom he counselled to rally round the new minister. Mrs. Fielding Johnson, on behalf of the ladies of the congregation; Mr. A. C. Cooper, representing the Sunday-school and Domestic Mission; and the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of the Free Christian Church, also joined in the welcome; and the Rev. Joseph Wood, of Birmingham, conveying the good wishes of the Midland churches, reminded them that there was no greater inspiration to good sermons than good congregations, and appealed to the congregation not to make too great demands either on the minister or the minister's wife. Mr. Thomas, replying to the welcome, assured his hearers that all branches of the church's work would have his cordial sympathy and help. He believed, with the poet, that "Youth calls for youth the world over," and would strive to be always young and fresh in his sympathy with the work of the Sunday-school, and among the young people. He entered on that ministry with the utmost hope and confidence—confidence not in his own powers, but in the future destiny of the Free Churches. He looked forward to their churches doing an even greater work in the future than in the past, and his earnest hope was that the congregation might find themselves justified in their choice.

Liverpool: Ullet-road.—This church has received, through the kindness of Mrs. Holt, an appropriate gift in the shape of a font, which is in keeping with the many other beautiful things which the church contains. The design is excellent, and has been executed in the best manner. The font consists of a basin of beaten brass in a hexagonal casing of oak. On the sides of the casing are six brass panels with the inscription in raised letters: "Suffer little children to come unto me; for of such is the kingdom of heaven." Below each panel is a winged cherub's head, and the whole is carried on a central support with six detached shafts rising from a carved base. The oak cover is dome-shaped and has three cherubs' heads with the tips of the wings meeting under a cross of beaten brass, which forms the handle by which the cover is lifted. The font will stand at the end of the north aisle, and when required for a baptismal service may be moved to the central aisle, at the foot of the chancel steps. It was designed by Mr. Ronald P. Jones, M.A., and executed by Messrs. Hatch and the Artificers' Guild, who have respectively carried out most of the wood work and metal work in the church.

London: Hackney.—During the month of March at the New Gravel Pit Church, the Rev. H. Rawlings gave four Sunday evening "Addresses to the Thoughtful," on the "Plain Truth," about the Bible, Jesus of Nazareth, Miracles, and the Salvation of Souls. The service on each occasion was followed by a meeting for "questions and free discussion," with a limit of five minutes for each speaker. The services and discussion meetings were well advertised by means of a card, on which the church was described, in a parenthesis after its name, as "Unitarian, but for unity of spirit rather than of opinion," and at the foot were quotations from Marcus Aurelius ("I seek the Truth," &c.), the New Testament (1 Thess. v. 21), and Channing (a passage from "Spiritual Freedom"). The result was most satisfactory. There were good attendances, and earnest but courteous discussions. Evidently, many of the visitors were strangers to our way of thinking. At a musical service last Sunday evening there was also a good attendance.

Manchester: Upper Brook-street.—Sunday last witnessed the farewell of Mr. Henry Woodhead, who is retiring, for personal reasons, from the position of superintendent of the Sunday-school, after fifteen years of strenuous and devoted service. Mr. Woodhead has of recent years been one of the most familiar and acceptable speakers on the platforms of many of our northern schools and in the pulpits of some of our churches, and his loss will be greatly felt by all concerned. An address signed by the whole of the teachers and officers, and presented to him at a crowded farewell meeting of past and present scholars and friends, contained, inter alia, the following sentiments:—After an expression of deepest regret at his enforced retirement, both on account of the interruption of their affectionate intercourse, and of the great loss to the school, they beg to assure Mr. Woodhead that they look back on the last fifteen years of intimate association with him in the school as their honoured leader as one of the greatest privileges of their lives, and desire earnestly to thank him for the high ideal of fidelity to the dictates of the true spirit of religion—the Fatherhood of God, and the Brotherhood of man—which he has always kept before them not only in his teachings and counsels, but, more important still, which he has always exemplified in his own life and conduct. They assure him that he carries with him in his retirement, and will always retain, the same respect and affection which have been accorded to him in the school, from the oldest as from the youngest, and hope that he may have many more years of useful and happy labour before him in whatever sphere of activity he may find himself placed in the future. While most prominent of all in leadership of the Sunday-school, Mr. Woodhead has also ever rendered most valuable and generous help in all religious, charitable, and social movements connected with the church. In these days of comparative apathy and indifference such men can ill be spared by any of our churches.

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—A successful bazaar was held in Channing Hall on April 4 and 5, in aid of the building fund of the new Attercliffe School-Chapel. The total cost is to be £1,750, and towards the final £350 which has still to be secured, if the building is to be opened, as it is hoped, free of debt on May 10, the sale on Wednesday realised £156 3s. 11½d, to which was added £38 13s. 2d. from previous entertainments. Of the final result we have not yet heard. Mr. A. J. Hobson presided on the first day, when the Lord Mayor opened the bazaar. The Rev. C. J. Street and Mr. Hobson both testified to the warm interest the Upper Chapel took in their daughter church, which had shown so much resolution under difficult circumstances. On Thursday Mr. J. B. Wostinholm presided, and the bazaar was opened by Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Leeds.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF NON-SUBSCRIBING MINISTERS AND CONGREGATIONS OF LONDON AND THE SOUTH-EASTERN COUNTIES.—London, April 7, 1906. The Rev. W. H. Read, who desires to enter the Ministry in this Province, has satisfied the Advisory Committee of this Assembly as to his character and personal fitness. Signed, W. Blake Odgers, Chairman; James Harwood, Secretary. Note.—All matters other than character and personal fitness are left for the sole consideration of each individual congregation.

THE MARTINEAU MEMORIAL.

THIS number of THE INQUIRER is devoted for the most part to the proceedings of the Ninth Triennial Meeting of the National Conference of our churches; but the date, April 21, reminds us that this is Dr. MARTINEAU's birthday, and brings with it the impulse to set here in the first place a statement of the urgent need of the Centenary Memorial, which many friends throughout the country earnestly hope that the Octagon congregation at Norwich will be enabled worthily to erect in the city of his birth.

It will be remembered that in connection with the centenary celebration of last year, a site adjoining the Octagon Chapel was secured for the erection of a MARTINEAU Memorial Hall and Schools. The actual needs of the Sunday-school and the manifold social activities which are the outcome of a vigorous congregational life demanded new and adequate buildings, for the schools through the falling in of leases, were, in fact, being rendered homeless, and it is matter of grave anxiety to all friends of the congregation and of the wider work in the province which must depend so largely on its prosperity that the need should be met. At the same time it was a natural and happy thought to associate this new building with the memory of JAMES MARTINEAU, from whose young enthusiasm came the impulse which led to the founding of the Sunday-school, and whose affections to the last clung about the old chapel.

It was not possible for the congregation to take any prompter steps towards the realisation of their hopes. It was necessary that they should first see what response would be made to the appeal for means to carry out this work on a scale far beyond their own unaided resources, but by no means beyond what was fitting to the occasion. They received much encouragement from friends whose judgment carries weight, deeply interested in their work and the special associations of the place and the anniversary, and were fully justified in pleading that the buildings at Norwich should be regarded as the national Centenary Memorial.

£6,000 was the sum estimated as required to carry out the project on a scale in any degree worthy of the occasion, and after the purchase of the site, with its three houses, for £2,000, the stringent price exacted by the Charity Commissioners, the congregation, through their own strenuous efforts (giving to the full measure of their ability), and the generous gifts of many friends, are secure of £2,400 towards the building. Now the serious question is whether the remaining £1,600 which is still required will be given. It would be a grievous thing if the Memorial were spoilt for lack of this remaining sum, but the time has come when definite action must be taken. If these words should reach any friends who have the matter at heart, we would ask them very earnestly, to consider whether they cannot still help to meet the need.

Having secured the site, which the committee were obliged to take as a whole or not at all (and it was unquestionably the best thing for the future of the Octagon that they could do), it would, of course, have been far preferable to use the whole of it, and have ample space for the building; but that, on consideration, appears to be out of the question, and it is now determined that the two smaller of the three houses shall remain standing, one to be used for the chapel-keeper, and the other to be let, bringing in some £20 a year, while on the site of the largest house, next to the chapel front, and occupying rather more than half of the ground acquired, the Memorial buildings are to be erected.

Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE is preparing plans, which may be ready for the inspection of friends when the 150th anniversary of the opening of the Octagon Chapel is celebrated on May 13. The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON is to be the preacher on that occasion, and there will be a public meeting on the following day. At the centenary celebration, on May 11, 1856, JAMES MARTINEAU was one of the preachers. Would that this later celebration might be made memorable by the announcement that the whole sum required for the MARTINEAU Memorial had been given!

We ask our friends to consider how much depends on obtaining this last £1,600, both for the due maintenance of an important work, and for the honour of the memory of our great Teacher.

Mrs. F. A. MOTTRAM, The Birches, Bracendale, Norwich, is the hon. secretary and treasurer of the MARTINEAU Memorial Fund.

THE COMMITTEE'S REPORT.

Presented April 19, 1906.

WITH the close of another triennial term it becomes the duty of the Committee to give an account of its stewardship. Weighty matters were referred to it by the Conference which met in Liverpool, in 1903, and though much time and deliberation have been bestowed, a good deal still remains to be done as they are fully treated. In the exercise of the power given by Rule 6 (c) the Committee co-opted the following gentlemen as members: Revs. Chas. Hargrove, J. E. Odgers, F. W. Stanley, and Messrs. W. Wallace Bruce and H. Philips Greg. Composed as it is of representatives from all parts of the United Kingdom the Committee cannot be brought together very frequently in reasonably full strength. Nevertheless, eleven meetings have been held in London, Manchester, and Oxford, and in addition numerous sub-committees have been appointed for special purposes.

It will be remembered that in his Presidential Address at Liverpool the Rev. J. E. Carpenter brought forward an important proposal by which the Conference was to raise a fund of £1,500 or £2,000 a year for the benefit of the congregations on its roll that need assistance. The Rev. Joseph Wood also read a paper pleading for the development of church life and a better organisation of our forces. His suggestions may be briefly summarised as follows:—

(a) That the Conference should issue a Pastoral Letter to the Churches, calling serious attention to the importance and advantage of public worship and the danger of its neglect.

(b) That some better means should be provided for bringing about suitable settlements of Ministers with Congregations.

(c) That more effectual help should be organised for our poorer Ministers and Congregations. This might be secured, Mr. Wood believed, without raising any new fund, if the managers of existing funds and associations formed themselves into a Joint Maintenance Board, through which all help should be administered.

The Liverpool Conference, on the motion of Mr. John Dendy, seconded by Mr. Byng Kenrick, unanimously adopted a Resolution which (1) Directed the Committee to give a careful consideration to the proposals of Mr. Carpenter and Mr. Wood. (2) Empowered the Committee to communicate with local Associations and other authorities; (3) Directed the Committee to report their conclusions and recommendations to an interim Conference.

In addressing itself to these tasks the Committee decided that, before considering the question of any new Fund, it should inquire into the adequacy and the best mode of applying existing resources.

Proceeding in this order the Committee regrets that it has not been able to deal with Mr. Carpenter's proposal, which therefore must await the instructions of the present or some future Conference.

With regard to Mr. Wood's suggestions the Committee has to report that

(a) A Pastoral Letter on Public Worship, which by urgent request was kindly prepared by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, was signed by the President on behalf of the Conference, and circulated throughout our Congregations. In addition nearly 4,000 copies were applied for by about twenty Churches for local distribution—a gratifying indication of the effectiveness of Mr. Carpenter's persuasive appeal.

(b) After careful deliberation the Committee could not see its way at present, at all events, to recommend the appointment of a Central Advisory and Settlements Committee. But "recognising the value of the work done by existing Advisory Boards in different districts it thinks it desirable that the Conference Committee should communicate with the local Unions, lay before them information as to the advantage of establishing local Advisory Committees and urge them to do so."

(c) On the invitation of the Committee a Conference was held in June, 1904, of Representatives of Trusts, of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and of the National Conference itself, to consider the desirability of forming a Joint Maintenance Board. Twenty-one representatives attended, but inasmuch as they had no authority to act, no vote was taken. It was clear, however, from the conversation that took place that by the terms of their Trusts the Trustees were not at liberty to delegate their functions or to merge them in a larger body. Therefore the proposal to establish such a Board was wholly and frankly given up.

Yet the possibility and the need of greater co-operation still remain and are generally recognised. The Conference Committee, therefore, decided to make a fresh start by inviting another Conference on the basis of definite proposals to be considered by the various Trusts before appointing their Representatives. Invitations to attend this Conference, held in London in October, 1905, were accepted by eighteen different bodies, and twenty-two Representatives were present. The Resolutions, after some slight amendments, were carried, all but unanimously, in the following form:—

(1) That in the opinion of this meeting, consisting of Representatives of Trusts and Societies for the support of churches, Ministers, and Students for the Ministry, it is highly desirable that duly appointed delegates of the various Funds that exist for the above purposes, should be brought periodically into conference with each other.

(2) That the Revs. D. Agate, J. E. Carpenter, James Harwood, Joseph Wood, and Messrs. Byng Kenrick, G. H. Leigh, C. F. Pearson, and P. J. Worsley be appointed a Sub-Committee to consider and prepare a preliminary scheme for a "Consultation Board," consisting of Delegates from Trusts, Funds, and Societies giving aid to Ministers, Students, and Churches, and to indicate its scope of action, its relation to local Associations, and any other points appertaining thereto, and submit the same to the various trusts in preparation for an adjourned meeting of the Representatives as above.

(3) That the same Sub-Committee be requested to collect and tabulate all available information with regard to (1) Trusts and Funds for Ministerial Aid, (2) Trusts and Funds making grants to Students for the Ministry, and to present a report to the adjourned meeting of the Representatives named above.

The Sub-Committee named in the second Resolution has prepared a scheme, which having been submitted to the various Bodies of Trustees, will, it is hoped, be considered at an adjourned meeting at Oxford on occasion of the Triennial meetings. At the present stage, therefore, it cannot with propriety be embodied in this Report. Suffice it to say that the central idea of the scheme is—to assist the several Trusts and Societies in the administration of their Funds by providing a means for the interchange of information and mutual counsel. The Committee is anxious that this should be clearly understood, and cannot but believe that the object must commend itself to all who desire to secure more method and greater efficiency in pursuing common aims. If this scheme proves acceptable in the main, the next step will be to invite the approval and co-operation of the District Association.

The above Sub-Committee has also been collecting and arranging particulars with regard to the various Trusts founded to assist Churches, Ministers, and Students for the Ministry. This report should prove of permanent value.

The Meeting of the Conference at Liverpool in 1903 having authorised the appointment of an official Secretary, the Committee proceeded in the autumn of 1904, when the necessary income had been secured, to invite the Rev. James Harwood, B.A., to undertake this office, for which his large experience among our Churches, his intimate acquaintance with the aims and work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and his personal qualities, seemed pre-eminently to fit him. After consideration Mr. Harwood intimated his readiness to accept the office, but was unable to enter upon it until his return from the Continent in the spring of 1905. Under these circumstances Mr. Fenton, with the generosity which has invariably marked his services to the Committee, kindly consented to continue as acting Hon. Secretary until April in that year, while Mr. Worthington and he together placed their resignations in the hands of the Committee. In acknowledging the devoted labours of the two Hon. Secretaries over a period of so many years, the Committee resolved to recommend the Conference to elect them as Vice-Presidents at the next meeting in April, 1906, and a resolution to that effect will be submitted to you.* Mr. Harwood having conducted the business of the year to the complete satisfaction of the Committee, a resolution appointing him as secretary to the Conference will be proposed to you.

The Committee has learned with much regret that Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke who has been Treasurer of the Conference since the death of his father, the late Mr. Thomas Chatfield Clarke (who had held the office since the Conference was founded in 1882), desires to retire on account of his numerous professional engagements as well as of the more onerous duties now imposed on the Treasurer. The Conference has been under deep obligation to its two Treasurers, who, mainly from private friends, have hitherto procured the necessary funds. In grateful acknowledgment of their services it is recommended that Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke be elected a Vice-President.

In looking round for a new Treasurer the Committee, anxious to make the Conference as representative as possible, desired to secure some one outside London, and it considers itself fortunate in being able to propose Mr. J. W. Scott, of Bolton. Mr. Scott's large business experience as well as his interest in our Churches, admirably fits him for the office. It is desirable, nay, necessary, to enlarge the area from which the Conference derives its income. If the Congregations, for the sake of which it exists, would generally co-operate, there would be no difficulty in raising at least £300 per annum to meet the ordinary expenses.

Several new congregations have made application to be placed on the Roll, and the Committee has considered it necessary to prepare a form of questions to be answered by new applicants. The present printed Roll, adopted at Leicester in 1900, was taken from the Essex Hall Year Book for 1899. Naturally several changes have taken place since then: Renshaw-street Chapel (Liverpool) and Wellington-street Chapel (Leicester) have been closed, and their Congregations have built new Churches at Ullet-road and Narborough-road respectively. Strangeways (Manchester), Alcester, Stratford-on-Avon, Eastbourne, Margate, and Ramsgate have disappeared from the Roll—the last four having had only a tentative existence. On the other hand, Child's Hill (London), Halliwell-road (Bolton), Aberystwyth, Acton, Broughton (Manchester), and Newton Abbott have been placed on the Roll. The Essex Hall Year Book rightly includes in its list all places where religious services are conducted. But until a congregation has passed beyond the purely experimental stage and shown signs of permanent cohesion it can hardly apply to be placed on the Conference Roll. This explains any discrepancies that may be found between the two lists.

Experience has shown some slight alterations in the Rules to be necessary, and these will be proposed by the President on behalf of the Committee.

Since the last Report was presented the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers has met at Amsterdam in 1903, and at Geneva in 1905. The National Conference was officially represented at the former by the President and Mr. Charles Fenton (then one of the Hon. Secretaries) and at the latter by the President, the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, and the Rev. James Harwood (the present Secretary). None who were present on either occasion are likely to forget the delightful and stimulating gatherings.

The Conference has also been represented by the President at the Whitsuntide Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; by the Rev. Henry Gow at the Anniversary Meetings of the North Midland Presbyterian and Unitarian Association in 1905; and by the Rev. V. D. Davis (at the request of the Committee) at the Meeting of the Protestantenbond at Zutphen in 1903.

On occasion of the momentous decision of the House of Lords in the case of the Scotch Churches the Committee took the opportunity at once of expressing its adhesion to the open principle so dear to our own Churches, and of showing its deep sympathy with the United Free Church of Scotland in the grave difficulty with which it was confronted, by passing the following Resolution, which was courteously acknowledged by the Rev. Principal Rainy.

"That this Committee of the National Conference, recognising the faithful and devoted labours of both Ministry and Laity of the United Free Church among the people of Scotland, the contributions made by its colleges to the great causes of theological learning and Biblical study, and the far-reaching efforts of its missionaries among the non-Christian peoples of the East—respectfully offers to the Moderator of the United Free Church and his colleagues an expression of heartfelt sympathy in their present grave and unexpected difficulties; and earnestly trusts that, whether by Parliamentary aid or otherwise, it may (without incurring legal penalties) secure the right, essential to a living Church, of reshaping its expressions of faith in accordance with the advance of knowledge, unencumbered by the creeds of an older day, thus winning the powers of adapting itself to progressive changes of thought and circumstance, while maintaining uninterrupted the continuity of its religious life and institutions."

In the circle of our own Congregations an event of special interest was the Centenary in 1905 of the birth of Dr. Martineau, which was celebrated at Norwich and Oxford by memorable gatherings and addresses, and in many other places was made the occasion for recalling the life and work of our late revered leader. In Hope-street Church Liverpool, "the spot of all the world," said Dr. Martineau, "where I have most lived, most hoped, most loved, most suffered," a mural tablet has been placed, while at Norwich, his birth-place, a fruitful memorial is to take the appropriate form of new school buildings, in the erection of which all who love the memory of Dr. Martineau may be glad to bear a share.

The Committee has had to mourn the loss of three valued friends and colleagues, who were in a very special way identified with the National Conference or the institutions which have sprung out of it. Mr. Harry Rawson was one of its original Hon. Secretaries, and at its first meeting at Liverpool read the memorable Paper, which produced an impression so deep as to lead to the immediate founding of the Sustentation Fund. To the Rev. R. A. Armstrong—a minister honoured throughout our Churches, and known far beyond their borders by his writings and his work—the first suggestion was due, of which the Conference was the result. Mr. J. Cogan Conway's memory will always be associated with the Ministers' Pension Fund, which will endure as a monument of his indomitable perseverance, benevolence, and wisdom. Each of these departed friends again and again acknowledged with gratitude the blessings he had received from the religious faith in which he was nurtured. Churches which are able to contribute honoured representatives of such distinctive types of character to the religious, civic, and social life of the community, have assuredly still an important place to fill.

To promote the well-being and extend the influence of these Churches is the primary function of the National Conference. That it is in harmony with other organisations is illustrated by the fact that some of its most earnest workers also give of their time and strength to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. They are convinced that there is not only room for both, but need of both. The same conviction will be shared by others, as they are brought face to face with the actual conditions and opportunities of our time. The Committee, in surrendering the trust placed in its hands, commends with the fullest confidence the interests of the National Conference to all our Churches, which seek to promote faith, freedom, and fellowship in religion.

W. B. BOWRING, President.

* Since the Report was adopted by the Committee, and while it is passing through the Press, Mr. Fenton writes to say that he wishes it to be stated here, that though he appreciates to the full the honour it is proposed to pay him, he wishes to decline it.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

NINTH TRIENNIAL MEETING AT OXFORD.

THE faith of those friends who suggested that the National Conference should meet at Oxford, and put their faith into strenuous efforts to secure the success of the meetings, has been fully justified. The glorious Easter weather was indeed followed on Tuesday afternoon by gentle rain, over which the country and the College gardens at any rate rejoiced, but it certainly could not hinder the cordiality of the welcome offered to the visitors, who many of them came to Oxford for the first time. Over six hundred there were—we may next week know the exact numbers—and for ministers and delegates admirable arrangements had been made for their hospitable entertainment.

On Monday, still in the Easter sunshine, there had been a very happy beginning of the meetings, in the service arranged by the Guilds' Union in Manchester College Chapel. A party of 125 young people had come over for the day by special train from London, and another party of 25 from Birmingham. It was a perfect day for seeing Oxford, and they had lunch and tea at Manchester College. Then at half-past six the service was held in the Chapel, which was filled by a congregation of 240. The Rev. John Ellis conducted the service and the Rev. F. K. Freeston preached the sermon, which will be found in this number of the INQUIRER. It made a deep impression.

The meetings proper of the National Conference began on Tuesday afternoon, meetings of representatives of trusts and of the Conference Committee having been held at Manchester College earlier in the day.

At four o'clock, the President, Mr. W. B. Bowring, J.P., of Liverpool, held a reception in the large hall of the Municipal Buildings, and afterwards delivered his opening address. The whole of the Buildings, which were engaged for the Conference, proved admirably adapted for the purpose. The spacious entrance and staircase, and the large and comfortably furnished reception room, gave ample opportunity for the pleasant meeting of friends, while the Drill Hall was equally ample in its provision of lunch and tea, and the large hall itself, with its powerful organ, was all that was required for the meetings.

THE OPENING MEETING.

THE PRESIDENT took the chair at half-past four, and was supported on the platform by Professor Jean Réville of Paris, Professor J. Estlin Carpenter, Mr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, L.C.C., Mr. John Harrison, the Revs. Joseph Wood, C. C. Coe, Charles Hargrove, J. Collins Odgers, F. W. Stanley, C. Roper, John Ellis, J. M. Lloyd Thomas, James Harwood (secretary), and others.

THE SECRETARY announced a number of letters of regret for absence, mostly on the ground of ill-health, and referred especially to one from Mr. Charles Jones, of Liverpool, to whom they were indebted for the suggestion at the Conference three years ago, in Liverpool, that they should meet next in Oxford. It was, Mr. Harwood said, largely through the generosity of Mr. Jones and his friends that they had been able to offer hospitality to ministers and delegates at that meeting, and they regretted very much, as did Mr. Jones himself, that he was unable to be with them.

Another regret was from Mr. J. W. Scott of Bolton, whom they were glad to have persuaded to accept the office of Treasurer; and another from the President of Manchester College, who had also been one of the founders and one of the first secretaries of that Conference.

Mr. STEINTHAL, in expressing his great regret that he did not feel equal to the exertion of the meetings, wrote:—"I hope that you may have a very successful Conference, and that both in the devotional meetings and the deliberations on practical work all that are present may be inspired by the Holy Spirit, and that the faith and love of Jesus may be among you with guiding power, so that all may return to their ordinary vocations in closer harmony and with greater earnestness and zeal, to work for righteousness, truth, and love in building up the Universal Church of our Father and our God."

THE PRESIDENT then delivered his opening address, which will be found printed in full after this account, and at the conclusion called upon the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter to offer a welcome to their guest from abroad.

Mr. CARPENTER, before offering the welcome to Professor Réville, read some letters from other friends and representatives of societies in other countries, whom they had hoped to welcome at their meeting.

The first was from the Secretary of the Netherlands Protestantbond, who regretted that no representative could be sent to Oxford, and offered every good wish for the success of the Conference.

The next was from Herr Direktor Schrader of Berlin, President of the Protestantverein, who said they had hoped to send delegates, but found it at last impossible, as they were themselves holding an important meeting at Darmstadt in the same week. "We can," he added, "only therefore send you our best wishes, and assure you that we feel ourselves closely united with you in the same common work."

Miss WESTENHOLZ of Folehave, near Copenhagen, also sent grateful acknowledgments and cordial greetings.

Letter from Bishop Ferencz.

"On account of the great distance, we are unable to send a representative to your National Conference, but I wish to be present with a few words of hearty greetings. May God's blessings be upon your meetings, may the spirit of Christian brotherhood fill the hearts of all those who will be present, that by clearing the religious conceptions and by strengthening the ties of love you may confer upon the progress and happiness of mankind much good. I shall rejoice to hear good news of the proceedings of your meetings, upon which I pray the blessings of God our heavenly Father.

"With Christian brotherly love, yours faithfully,
JOSEPH FERENCZ,

"Bishop of the Unitarian Churches in Hungary.

"Kolozsvár, Hungary."

Dr. SAMUEL A. ELIOT, President of the American Unitarian Association, wrote, regretting that they could have no representatives at Oxford, and added: "May I send, through you, to my friends and fellow workers of the Conference the affectionate greetings of the Unitarians of America. Our cause makes modest but steady advance, and the condition of our churches is, on the whole, healthy and progressive. We rejoice in every opportunity to draw closer the bonds of affectionate goodwill that bind us to our brethren in Great Britain. With high regard and cordial salutations, faithfully yours,

"April 6, 1906. SAMUEL A. ELIOT."

WELCOME TO PROFESSOR RÉVILLE.

THE Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER said these letters would explain why it was there was only one representative of their friends from abroad that he had to offer their greetings to that day. M. Réville belonged to the nation with which they especially associated the ideas of grace and charm, the nation which had again and again been the teacher of Europe, the nation from which in modern days they had learnt ideals of liberty, equality, and brotherhood, which the late Bishop Westcott bravely declared summed up some of the modern aims of Christianity. They rejoiced to receive in M. Réville a representative of the entente cordiale, which they had welcomed so heartily as one of the best aids for preserving the peace of Europe, and promoting goodwill among men. But M. Réville had special claims on their goodwill. It was now several years since they had the pleasure to welcome him in the Lecture Room at Manchester College, and the attendance of many brilliant scholars of that University at his discourses was a sufficient proof of the esteem in which he was held. They remembered the sympathetic insight with which he had described the decline of Paganism, and the final conflict which issued in the victory of Christianity; they thought of his learned exposition of the Fourth Gospel, they recalled his profound researches into the evolution of the constitution of the Christian Church, and especially of the episcopal office. But more than that, there were many there who would recall those delightful meetings which brought M. Réville into closer intercourse with them, the International Council at London in 1901, and the gatherings at Amsterdam and Geneva which followed it. There they learned to know and to love M. Réville, to admire his earnestness, to appreciate his eloquence, and to feel the force of his devout and intense religious feeling.

M. Réville came that night to bring them greetings from the brethren who shared the same ideals of religious truth and liberty in France. Many there would remember that the position of the French churches analogous with their own was at present most critical. The great act by which, last year, the French Parliament set the example of the disestablishment of the National Church on a grand scale, affected not only the Roman Catholic Church in France, but the Protestant congregations as well. Protestant congregations, orthodox and liberal, stood in precisely the same relations to the state. Now, however, the connection had been severed, problems had immediately arisen of the gravest nature for the future of the liberal wing of the Protestant communion. Would their orthodox brethren be willing to retain their fellowship with them, or would they insist on a severance and leave each party to go on its way alone? The situation was critical, and in view of the relatively smaller numbers of the liberal churches in France the action of the future hung a heavy weight on M. Réville, and those intimately associated with him in the organisation of liberal religious work. He trusted it might be proved that M. Réville's visit to England would show him what was possible in the shape of voluntary effort on the part of religious communities of many kinds. He would see that there was not only wealth placed at the service of those churches, but that again and again the very poor contributed out of their own resources, and by the help of many the causes of religion were sustained. They themselves, few as they might seem to be, and not highly organised in outward form, had yet so much of the spirit of the Huguenots that they hoped they might be able to give back something in the shape of encouragement, of sympathy and brotherly support to the French churches in their hour of need. Let them offer to M. Réville their sincerest sympathy in what might prove to be a grave crisis for the churches of their household of faith in France. Let them trust that the spirit of wisdom and of light might direct their faith and sustain their endeavours. Let them pray that, if need be, in separation and in solitude, they might bravely bear their testimony to the truth. Let them hope that M. Réville might carry back from that meeting, and the fellowship of their household of faith in England, that which might support him and his friends in their coming hour of trial.

Professor RÉVILLE, in acknowledging the welcome, delivered the address which is printed in full after the President's Address, and the meeting then terminated.

OUR friend Matthias Jochumsson sends us a cordial greeting from Iceland, dated Akureyri, March 24, on the opening of communications after the winter's bondage. The winter, he says, was dark and dreary, as usual; "my health rather poor—perhaps old Dame Nemesis has found the popular ovation I received at my seventieth birthday somewhat exaggerated." Yet his pen has been busy, as usual, with liberal religious subjects in the papers. The translations he has made, however, of English and German works, including the "Book of Daily Strength," have still to remain in manuscript. The interest in such topics is not keen enough to justify their publication. Indifference appears to be even a worse enemy than the orthodox reaction, which still prevails. The old man, a poet, not lacking in prophetic fire, writes of discouragement and the abandonment of youthful dreams, and yet concludes: "Still the deepest and highest dream is still mine—hidden with my inmost consciousness."

THE PRESIDENT'S ADDRESS.

LADIES AND GENTLEMEN of our National Conference,—I am proud of the opportunity as your President of addressing you on this Ninth Triennial Conference of Unitarian, Liberal Christian, Presbyterian, and other non-subscribing or kindred congregations. It is gratifying to the Committee to find so large and representative an assembly, and we devoutly hope that your deliberations may lead to the furthering of the great religious principles we so warmly advocate.

Several new churches have made application to be placed on the roll. The Committee having made the inquiries they thought desirable, I, on their behalf, welcome most cordially delegates from the new churches. Renshaw-street, Liverpool, and Wellington-street, Leicester, having been closed, and their congregations having built new churches at Ullet-road and Narborough-road respectively, are, of course, on the roll. Alcester, Stratford-on-Avon, Eastbourne, Margate, and Ramsgate have disappeared from the roll. On the other hand, Childs Hill (London), Halliwell-road (Bolton), and Aberystwyth have been placed on the roll, and we welcome delegates from them very warmly.

We are privileged to meet in the ancient and historic city of Oxford, a city famous in the annals of our country, and of world-wide renown as a great seat of learning and education. We all feel great delight in having the opportunity of meeting here, and visiting its venerable and stately colleges, and ancient historic buildings, venerable with patriotic interest. On behalf of this Conference I beg to express to the local committee the gratitude we feel for their exertions in making such admirable arrangements for our comfort and enlightenment while here. We tender to them our very warmest thanks.

Since our last Conference we have had to mourn the loss of three most valued friends and colleagues, who were, in a very special way, identified with the Conference and the institutions which have sprung out of it: Mr. Harry Rawson, one of its first secretaries, and who, at its first meeting in Liverpool, read a memorable paper, which led to the immediate founding of the Sustentation Fund; the Rev. R. A. Armstrong, honoured as friend and minister, and known far beyond our denomination by his writings and social and public work, to whom was due the suggestion from which this Conference grew; Mr. J. Cogan Conway, whose memory will always be associated with the Ministers' Pension Fund, which will endure as a monument of his indomitable perseverance, benevolence, and wisdom. While we deplore these great losses, they lay on us a great trust, that while we profit by their labours, we must see that we are no less faithful to the great ideals we share with them.

The years since last we conferred together have been memorable for many striking public events, which, while not directly affecting us much in our religious progress, have really altered the status of the world. Furious and bloody war has raged in the Far East, the outcome of which must entirely alter the relations previously existing between the Western and Eastern worlds. Let us hope that the change may lead to more peace on earth, and more goodwill between all men. We have seen a smouldering and bloody revolution in the great Russian Empire. May the leaders of that country learn, before it is too late, that "force is no remedy." In France there has been a great change in religious affairs, which we hope may be for the advance of righteousness. Here, in our native land, we have had a peaceful, bloodless revolution, which, for better or worse, has completely changed the legislative ideals of our Government. May the new ideals result in good laws, with peace, retrenchment, and reform, and their attendant blessings.

I cannot refrain from referring to the burning Education controversy that has been raging since we last met. The Bill of 1902 having upset the educational system established in 1870, it met with fierce opposition and was thought to create manifest and serious injustices. The recent election in 1906 gave a mandate to the present Government, with the result that the Minister of Education has presented a new Bill, which is in course of discussion. No doubt there are serious differences of opinion on the merits of this Bill, but in my opinion, while not being entirely in accord with my particular views, it presents an honest opportunity of settling the vexed and complex educational difficulties that beset us, and should be discussed with an earnest desire to bring about a settlement which will avoid future conflict and establish a thoroughly satisfactory system of national elementary education.

I trust you have all read, marked, and inwardly digested the report of the Committee, and I venture to claim that it has not been idle, or neglected the consideration of the weighty matters referred to it by the Conference at Liverpool, in 1903.

In reference to Professor Carpenter's important proposal, it was decided that, before considering the question of a new fund, it should inquire into the adequacy and disposal of existing resources. This is being done, and I hope the Conference will empower the new Committee to continue their inquiries.

In reference to the very interesting and valuable suggestions of Mr. Wood in 1903, a full record will be found in the report of the action taken by the Committee in regard to them. His suggestion to circulate a pastoral address throughout our churches was carried out through the kind help of Professor Carpenter, and no doubt much good was done by it.

I am glad to see Mr. Wood proposes to bring the question of a Central Advisory and Settlements Board before us again on Friday, and I hope it will receive sympathetic support from the Conference, and that the new Committee will be empowered to continue their efforts to give effect to the proposal. And here let me say that, personally, I share the view expressed by Professor Carpenter in his presidential address in Liverpool, in 1903.

He advocated that the Conference should undertake the care of the Churches, and he said: "Three years ago this Conference acquired a definite constitution: The various local Associations ranged themselves along with it, and are represented on its administrative Board. It is the belief at any rate of some—I know not how many—both ministers and laymen, that this Conference is the proper body to be the organ for raising and administering the funds that are needed for congregational aid. Then, I say, boldly, if this thing is seriously desired, if we hold the principle strongly enough to make sacrifices for it, the Conference must raise the money.”

I would also personally like to call the attention of the Conference to Mr. Wood's suggestions, page 2, paragraph c:—“More effectual help for our poorer ministers and congregations.” You will remember the poor stipends given as cited by Mr. Wood in his paper at Liverpool: I should also like you to consider why members of our “well-to-do” families are not forthcoming for the ministry. Our pulpits, in themselves, and for their larger freedom, are desirable above all others; but these men must live, and as things go, and as society is, how is it possible for a man to live decently, as everyone wishes him to do, on £150 plus £25 from a fund, say, the Sustentation Fund. The consideration of the above leads me to call your careful attention to a delicate but important matter, about which I can claim no personal experience. In our city we have been singularly fortunate in securing cultured and high-toned ministers, respected by all, to occupy our pulpits, but I am informed such is not everywhere the case, and there are cases of unsuitable and uncultured men being introduced into the pulpits of some of our churches. I am afraid such men not only injure the particular congregation, but lower the general character of the ministry. I would suggest that since some of our congregations cannot (even with help) offer a living wage for a cultured and suitable minister, it would be better for them to share a minister, and supplement with lay help, than to have a minister who is not fit. We in Liverpool have adopted such a method, and I speak from experience when I say it carries a double benefit, to the layman who ministers, and to the congregation which listens.

The consideration of the above makes me urge this Conference to take into its earnest consideration the resolutions to be moved on Friday next by the Rev. Joseph Wood, as I think, if they be found practicable, they might solve some of the difficulties before us, and if so, do inestimable good.

I venture to call the attention of the Conference to the loss they have sustained in being deprived of the services of Mr. Fenton, who has for many years acted as hon. secretary to the Committee of this Conference, and I beg you will permit me, in your name, to express our thanks for his past valuable services.

I also beg to call the attention of the Conference to the resignation of Mr. Howard Chatsfield Clarke, treasurer, the loss of whose valuable services we deeply deplore.

You will notice that the Committee have been fortunate in securing the services of the Rev. James Harwood as secretary to the Conference, and his appointment cannot fail to add importance to our Conference, and his earnest services meet with your cordial approval.

In conclusion, I should like to remind my hearers that the future is with us, though we may be small among the churches. Let us ever try to grasp the grandeur, the grand potentialities of our position. We need not shut our eyes and our minds to new knowledge, and new ideas. We see Religion walking hand in hand with Progress and Freedom, and rejoice in the august companionship. It is our province to voice the cry of the generation for more light, and not shut our eyes to it when it comes. We have all to hope, and nothing to fear, for our thought of God is larger than the moulds in which men have striven to enclose it. Casting aside the trammels of superstitions which may have once served their day, but which hinder now; and repudiating, on the other hand, the pessimism of materialism, we still stand triumphantly for the religious interpretation of man and the universe. Our work is to declare that God is greater, and other, than the dogmas men have woven around Him; that God is still God, and His Spirit still works in His children of men. As we think of these things, we may well stand ashamed before the grandeur of our work and destiny, asking ourselves what manner of men we ought to be who have this great thing laid upon us. Yet the spirit has ever worked in earthen vessels, and all that is required of us is the ready cry, “Here I am, Lord, send me.”

And I would express the hope that our coming Conference, on religious, social, and even on business matters, may be carried on in that large spirit which ever keeps in sight its large ideals, and that it may truly minister to the splendid vindication and speedier coming of the kingdom of God upon earth.

SEPARATION OF THE CHURCHES AND THE STATE IN FRANCE.

ITS RESULTS FOR LIBERAL PROTESTANTISM.

By PROFESSOR JEAN RÉVILLE, OF PARIS.

LADIES and Gentlemen, Sisters and Brethren in our free Christian faith,

It is the second time that the sympathetic duty of presenting the fraternal greetings of my liberal French Protestant countrymen to this National Conference devolves on me. I feel very honoured to be once more your guest and to be authorised by the Délégation des Eglises libérales de France to convey the best wishes of the little Huguenot tribe to the great and noble people of the free faith in Western Europe. May God bless your work and support you in all your enterprises for promoting in your own field of work and in the whole world the true spirit of Christ, in perfect liberty and fraternal co-operation!

At the last Conference, in Liverpool, I tried to explain the organisation of the Protestant Churches in France, and the situation of our liberal minority in those churches. Since that time a great change, nearly a revolution—but happily a legal one—has upset the ecclesiastical régime in my country, and created quite new conditions for future activity. Since December 9, 1905, the secular union between the State and the churches has been dissolved. Henceforth no church at all will receive any subsidy from the State, or be bound by its authority in its internal affairs. They have to organise themselves according to a new Bill, which does not confer on them as much liberty, especially in financial matters, as we could wish; but which, after all, is as liberal as it could be in a Catholic country, where the civil power is obliged to take securities against the dangerous force of a clerical centralised body.

Amongst the Protestants the separation has been generally received without opposition, even welcomed by many. There is no objection against its principle; but there are great difficulties to overcome in the organisation of the new religious associations, which have to assume the succession of the previous official parishes. In the Catholic Church it is easy: the Pope and the bishops will command, and the believing people has nothing else to do than to obey. But in our Protestant churches it is quite different. We are not a servile people, and, in consequence of our internal divisions, there is no central authority which might be recognised by all our religious groups.

I beg permission to suppose that you have not quite forgotten what I told you three years ago about our ecclesiastical situation*: an orthodox party with an elaborate synodal organisation, and a liberal party with a triennial conference, each of them having a directing body, called Commission permanente for the orthodox group and Délégation libérale for the other. But whatever might be the opposition between the leading personalities, those separate organisations had no legal existence; they were private things. Officially, in the eyes of the Government for the great bulk of the Catholic people, which did not know much about those quarrels, let me say even for the larger part of the Protestants themselves, who did not care much about those theological differences, there was but one Protestant Reformed Church in France, with some parishes where they did not teach just the same as in others. These varieties seemed inherent to the true Protestant mind.

But now the established house, where the different groups of the Protestant family were equally at home, has to be left, and the tenants have to decide where and how they will settle themselves. At first sight this seems to be a happy occasion for each group to set up for itself, according to its own principles. But in fact such a disintegration of the traditional unique Reformed Church into three or four separate and, of course, rival churches is not popular amongst the French Protestants, because it is inconsistent with the old Presbyterian type of the Huguenot church, which has been consecrated by the heroic sufferings of the forefathers, and because the bulk of the Protestant people feels by instinct that it would be a lamentable decay of the little Protestant minority in a Catholic country, where the mighty opponent church is so strongly unified.

Theoretically, indeed, it would be much better if there were as many different denominations as there are different tendencies amongst us. But practically, the consequence of such a dissection of the Protestant body would be, that in every place where there are two or three hundred Protestants against many thousand Catholics, that handful of Protestants would be divided into two, three, or four little chapels, incapable of providing for their wants, without any authority or influence, wholly taken up by mutual strife. And which of them will be acknowledged as the successor of the former single local church. Such may be the ideal of some theologians or some ecclesiastical partisans. The common man is not tempted by it. He does not understand why in the new churches people of different theological opinions could not live together as they did before, chiefly because in most cases he does not well know himself what is really his own theological system.

As soon as the separation between the churches and the State appeared to be imminent, from different sides, and especially by our liberal friends, a plea was made for the convocation of a general assembly of delegates of all the Protestant churches, in order to examine how it would be possible to elaborate a common organisation for all the Reformed churches in France. But from the beginning the leading men of the orthodox party objected to this plan, because they were afraid that the moderate orthodox group—what we call the centrum—together with the liberals would form a majority of unionists in that general assembly. At the orthodox Synod of Reims, in May, 1905, they could, however, not prevent a resolution, which, however, passed only with a majority of one voice, deciding that a general assembly ought to be called together after the separation; but when the Commission permanente was asked at what moment the convocation would happen, the answer was: after the separation means, “when the new régime of the churches according to the bill of separation has been realised,” that is to say, when the new churches will be already organised. So the general assembly, intended to prevent the division between the churches becomes a mere delusion. The harm will already be done.

The liberal churches, on the contrary, did all they could to make union easy. In a conference held at Montpellier, in November, 1905, their delegates agreed to make as many concessions as possible, in order to prevent schismatical organisation. They proclaimed themselves ready to acknowledge the confession of faith, elaborated by the Synod of 1872, as the “actual symbol” of the French Reformed Church, on condition that nobody should be struck out for declining to subscribe—which has been till now the official situation—and they declared their common faith in such terms as to confound all those who pretend that the liberals are not Christians. Perhaps it will be interesting for you to hear that declaration:

“In accordance with the spirit of faith and liberty, by which our forefathers lived and for which they suffered; we proclaim the right and the duty for each member of the church to draw up himself his faith and his creed from the Sacred Scriptures and from his own religious experiences. We are happy in the thought that we have in Jesus Christ the highest gift of God, the Saviour, who, by his person, his teachings, his holy life, his sacrifice, and his victory over death, constantly imparts to the children of the Heavenly Father the power necessary to make justice and love prevail already on earth, over all individual and collective forms of evil.

“And to all who, in communion with Jesus Christ, pray to God for forgiveness of their trespasses, strength for their moral life, consolation in their sufferings, and eternal hope, we open fraternally our churches, on which we maintain the true Protestant device: ‘Gospel and Liberty.’”

These large—some will say too large—concessions did not disarm the orthodox leaders. On the contrary they thought such conciliating liberals more dangerous than before. At the new orthodox synod, which came together at Orleans in January of this year, the majority imposed for the future religious associations a whole ecclesiastical constitution including subscription to the declaration of faith of 1872. The essential part of that declaration asserts the sovereign authority of Holy Scripture in matters of faith, the salvation by faith in Jesus Christ, the only Son of God, who died for our trespasses and rose from the dead for our justification, and it maintains further belief in all the “great Christian facts” represented by the sacraments of the church, celebrated in the Christian feasts and mentioned in the Apostolical Symbol and the liturgy of the Holy Communion. This constitution of the Orleans Synod excludes the liberals. It is very authoritative: the Synod, its different committees, especially the Commission permanente, have a prevailing power over the churches.

This time it seems that the intolerant majority of the orthodox synod has gone too far. The moderate minority itself, the centrum, protested, and has since proposed other statutes for the constitution of the new churches. And amongst the parishes themselves a great many have not applied the rules elaborated by the Synod. So we are now in a transitory state of confusion. The statutes of most of the new local churches, already constituted, are nearly all different. In many, even of the orthodox churches, as, for instance, in Bordeaux, Versailles, &c., the ministers and the laymen agreed that the first duty is to organise the church so as to make it possible for all the members of the previous official establishment, liberal or orthodox, to remain in the parish. In all the important liberal churches, like those of Lyon, of Nîmes, of Havre, &c., the liberals came to conciliating terms with the orthodox minorities, so as to have but one organisation in each city and to prevent ecclesiastical competition, when the State, some months later, will have to pass on the use of the church buildings and the property of the former official parishes to the new private religious associations.

In June next there will be a first orthodox synod of the new churches in Paris, to which all the associations who succeed the former churches represented at Reims and at Orleans will have admittance. What will that future Synod of Paris decide? Will it exclude from the new orthodox synodal organisation all the religious associations which did not apply the rules elaborated at Orleans? Or will it incorporate them in the synodal union without forcing the subscription to the declaration of faith? And, if so, will all the non-subscribing associations be admitted, or only part of them? We do not know. The ultras think of excluding all non-subscribers, and they are working hard to have such a mighty financial organisation as to oblige most of the little and poor churches to submit.

The situation of the Délégation libérale is very delicate. We have recommended union; all our important churches have put this advice into practice. But we cannot wait for the organising of our own existence until it may please the orthodox party to decide if the ultras or the moderate group are to have the victory. We have a number of little and very interesting parishes, very poor, who are incapable of providing for their own needs, especially in the Cévennes, in the very heart of the old Huguenot people, where the Protestants resisted persecution and suffered for their faith more than anywhere else. These poor little mountain parishes are in great part liberal. We want an ecclesiastical and financial organisation to be able to sustain all the poor churches, to maintain our school of Samuel Vincent in Nîmes, to support also the Theological Faculty of Paris, which ceases to be a State school, and must, after November 1, live only from private subsidies.

Thus we are obliged to establish our own government, at least provisionally, however ready we are to associate our organisation with any other, on condition that we shall not be compelled to subscribe any orthodox formula. We think of dividing our churches into five sections or districts, whose centres will be: Paris, Lyon, Nîmes-Montpellier, Montauban, Royan, and we propose to organise these district conferences into a national conference or synod of the United Reformed churches of France (Eglises réformées unies de France), but with a large security for the independence and the self-government of the local associations.

But first the local churches must be constituted and provide for themselves by subscriptions and private contributions. This is the work which is going on now, and it is a difficult work in a country, where the population has been always accustomed to consider public worship as a State service, granted by the government. The first results differ very much according to the parishes, as one might suppose. In some places unexpected sacrifices are agreed to; in others there is not much spirit. Generally, however, we must say that the fidelity of Protestant people to their church is satisfactory. In most of the new associations the right of voting is granted to women also, and this reform seems to assure a precious element of life in the democratic organisation, which the bill of separation assigns to the new religious associations (associations culturelles).

The principal inconvenience of the present situation is that everything has to be done at once. In the short period of one year all the local churches, the district and national bodies must be supplied. Naturally every church is inclined to provide first for itself, and when serious efforts have already been made for supplying the local needs, there is often not so much willingness to subscribe also for the other churches which are incapable of supporting themselves, and for the theological school, and for the common or general work of the liberal party.

So our collective enterprises are in a very critical condition. We have paid the first trimestre to all our ministers whose churches were not yet reorganised and could not yet supply their salaries. Later we shall not pay those whose churches are not ready to contribute to their own budget in proportion of their means. We reckon that we shall have a charge of one hundred thousand francs a year to support the poor churches, especially those of the Cévennes, and the Faculty of Theology of Paris wants a yearly income of 60,000 francs. There are already subscriptions for half of these sums and we shall have more; but we are obliged to appeal to all our friends, either for the poor churches of the Cévennes or for the Theological School of Paris, if we are to be able to maintain them, for in France the large fortunes are generally on the side of the orthodox party.

The sympathy of this Conference will be a highly-esteemed encouragement to my fellow-workers in France, and therefore I thank you, ladies and gentlemen, for having allowed me to deliver this report before you. JEAN RÉVILLE.

THE RELIGIOUS SERVICE.

On Tuesday evening there was service in the large hall of the Municipal Buildings at 8 o'clock. A fine choir of some 70 or 80 voices gathered on the platform, and the singing of the hymns was well taken up by the great congregation. The choir had been practising the hymns earlier in the evening, and then before the service, Mr. A. F. Kerry, M.A., the organist at Manchester College, gave a selection of music on the organ.

The service was conducted by the Rev. Charles Roper, of Kilburn, who read as lessons Isaiah vi. and part of Luke iv., on the preaching of Jesus in the synagogue at Nazareth. The opening hymn was T. H. Gill's "We come unto our fathers' God," always heart-stirring in a great assembly of worshippers.

THE CONFERENCE SERMON.

THE DYNAMICS OF PREACHING.

BY THE REV. JOSEPH WOOD.

"His word was with Power."—Luke iv. 32.

ONE of our poets has told us that "to be weak is to be miserable"; another breaks out with the confession that "weakness is the heart's worst weariness," while a great French moralist declares that "weakness of character is the one fault that cannot be amended." Few things are more pathetic in human story than man's surprise at his own weakness. He expects victory and success all along the line, and is astonished to find himself so often defeated. "Why could not we cast it out?" asked the wondering disciples before their failure to expel the evil spirit. It puzzled, amazed, and mortified them to find how little power they had compared with their Master. It has been the wonder and amazement of the Church in all ages—its failure in power. The Church has so much in its favour, an inspiring message, a glorious gospel, light from heaven, heaven's own truth, divine guidance, the promise of prolific power from above—so much that seems persuasive and commanding, wooing and winning, and yet how poor the result!

A certain sadness steals over the labourers in the vineyard, who have tried to realise their aspirations for the welfare of mankind. As they toil on they become more and more aware not only of poverty of achievement, but of what often seems like ignominious defeat. This feeling has, perhaps, never found more noble, more intense expression, than in the words which Browning puts into the mouth of his Broad Church Pope:—

And is this little all that was to be?

Where is the gloriously decisive change,
The immeasurable metamorphosis

Of human clay to divine gold, we looked Should in some poor sort justify the price?

And yet the Gospel is a gift of power. It was James Watt who told George III. that he dealt in an article of which it was said kings were fond—power! Many poets and philosophers have said depreciatory things about power and the love of it, but the truth is that not only kings but all healthily minded men desire it and rejoice in its exercise. We all want to be strong, capable, skilful, and to make our influence felt. Life itself is power—power to think, and will, and do. Men are eager for money, knowledge, place, because of the power these things put into their hands. The purse, the sceptre, the sword, the book are only so many symbols of power. The misery of so many men is that they are impotent, if not in their feet like the cripple at the temple gate, impotent in conscience, in will, in purpose, in faith. It is significant that the images used to describe sinful man, speak of him so often either as one who has been deprived of his powers or has never come into possession of them. He is halt, maimed, blind, deaf, withered; he is less than he ought to be, he does not yet know what manhood is, and the aim of religion is to set free his imprisoned powers, to open long-closed eyes, to unloose the stammering tongue, and give the cripple the use of his limbs. God hath given us "the spirit of power, and love, and a sound mind," the spirit of strength, sympathy, and sanity. What the Gospel bestows is vigour and clearness to the mind, sweet and enlarged affections to the heart, courage and constancy to the will, unconquerable strength to the conscience. "I am come that they might have life, and that they might have it more abundantly"—and what is life but power?

"His word was with power." That was the impression made by Jesus on all who heard him whenever he opened his mouth. The immediate effect of his teaching was that of the power which belongs to a commanding personality and the impressive mastery of a leader of men. His ministry was dynamic, convincing, authoritative. He did not prove, argue, or quote ancient authorities like the scribes; he swayed the multitude by personal power. What was the secret of that power? It certainly was not due to any theories of his place in the Godhead, theories which we know never entered men's minds during his lifetime. It was not that he spoke as a divine being empowered to give commands, or that his words depended on a supernatural dignity, which he never claimed, and, as a matter of fact, was never conceded before his death. Yet it is true that the power of his message lay largely in himself, in what he was, in the spiritual force behind his words, in a magnetic personality which attracts men to-day even as it did nineteen centuries ago. In the spiritual atmosphere of Christ's personality all his disciples have found power, health, illumination. The writers of the gospels often failed to do justice to his ideas, but they do not fail in giving us the impression of a great and inspiring personality. But this does not take him out of the line of other great teachers and prophets, nor invest him with attributes different in kind from theirs. The words of many teachers have been with power. I wish now to consider the secrets of that power in its supreme instance, and my subject may be called "The Dynamics of Preaching."

Weakness in the pulpit is of all things the most wretched. Tyndall, in his famous Belfast address, spoke of the necessity of a "lifting power" in human life. Where should lifting power be found and felt if not in the preacher. Alas! It must be confessed that there is much preaching with no lift about it. No one is ever deeply moved, no one is ever inspired, no one is ever angered, except it may be at the impotence of the speaker. Power is not noise, and popularity is not always a sign of its presence, but sometimes the reverse. Did you ever ask, "What is the great and palpable difference between the utterance that moves and quickens, and that to which we are quite unresponsive?" It is sometimes difficult to say why so many preachers fail. For they are thoughtful, scholarly, in touch with modern life and thought; they speak of great things in becoming language; their sermons are well constructed, and yet they might as well have been spoken through a ship's trumpet or the telephone. At the end we don't care for anything that has been said, not a ha'porth of shavings. And if asked why the deliverance was ineffective, we could only give Sir Joshua Reynolds' criticism of a famous picture: "It wants this; and it wants that!" Again, we have all heard sermons at which we have kindled; they seemed to touch and awaken what was best and purest and divinest in us, and to make it, for a time at least, ascendant and imperative over us. And why? We did not always agree with the preacher, yet his words came home to us with power. Why? Well, if we think it out, we shall say they had behind them what the Master's words had, an impressive personality. They did not come to us through a mechanical speaking tube. The sermon that moved us had a human heart in it. It was not truth in a fine rhetorical effort, nor truth in a polished essay that, like an angel, troubled the waters of the soul. It was truth in a distinct personality. The world's leaders have always been pre-eminent personalities. There are men of light who are not men of leading, for with good intelligence they have not personality. There are men of inferior intellectual endowments who yet leave a greater mark upon their age because of their vivid personality. We saw and felt it in a John Bright, so that his simplest word hushed or moved us when the most eloquent periods of another entirely failed. It is like genius in the arts, it lifts a man out of the ruck of the merely talented or clever, and gives him a higher place. It belongs always to the true prophets. Take any of them you please, Robertson, Dale, Liddon, Martineau, they were all great personalities. They could not be disregarded. It explains in some cases the secret of the power men felt in their preaching which has vanished from their printed sermons. The magic of great preaching is in something the printing press can never reproduce. Those who heard Newman preach tell us that it was not exactly the things said which impressed them, but the sense of the preacher's personality which passed over the manuscript to the hearer's heart. We turn over Wesley's or Whitefield's sermons and wonder that such poor stuff could ever have been the power of God unto salvation. We forget that when they were preached they thrilled with the heart-beats of a great personality. A soul was in them, the weight of a great character and a great will took men captive.

Christianity requires to the full the supremacy of personality. Its teaching is that the life of the soul is quickened and maintained not so much by doctrine or sacrament or ceremony, as by the impartation of its Founder's own self. Christianity is to be propagated by the spirit of Christ mediated and handed on by those who have felt its indwelling power. The law is an ultimate one, and is proved by the history of every section of the church. Whether we read of a Catholic Lacordaire, or a Baptist Bunyan, or a Unitarian Channing, their power as ministers to the soul came not from the particular "ism" they preached, but from the personality out of which their words proceeded, dominated as it was by a higher Personality.

Could we understand that Personality we should know the secret of the power which men felt in his word. But who can fathom the "abysmal deeps of personality?" We call it magnetism, we call it charm, we call it individuality, we call it atmosphere, we call it genius, and in the end we feel how inadequate are all these terms to describe the thing itself. Yet in the case of Jesus, whose nature was transparent as the light of day, there are certain elements or aspects of his personality which are clearly manifest to every sympathetic observer; and while there is much more than these, it may be that these will largely reveal, first the secret of prophetic power in the Teacher of Nazareth, and second, point to the conditions of ministerial success everywhere.

Surely the first and most impressive thing about the Master is his supreme consciousness of God, intense, marvellous, unwavering. He knew God to be the inmost substance of his being: "I and the Father are one," and he said that not as the second person in the Trinity, claiming for himself a union with God which none others could share, but as the crowning instance of the spiritual humanity of all men—man at one with God. Only he realised fully the union of the Divine and the human which we realise so feebly. He cannot do anything by himself. "The Father that dwelleth in me, He doeth the works." The very words he speaks are not his own; they are all given him by the Father. His life with God, dependence on God, the very breath of his being the breath of God, this is the intrinsic necessity and the eternal glory of his nature. He is the most perfect revelation to us of what man may be in communion with God. No act, no thought, no word, but has God for its source. In every star and flower, and cloud, and stream, and waving field he saw his Father's work and heard his Father's voice; in all the ways of men and plants, and birds, in the vine-dresser's husbandry, in the shepherd's toil, he discerned parables of God, and knew God to be speaking. Yet deeper and clearer was his vision of the Father in his own heart. Aslight fills the heavens, so the love of God filled the heart of Jesus, and nothing, not the enmity of the crowd, not the desertion of friends, not the agony of the garden and the cross could avail to dim or lessen its brightness. When all forsook him he could say, "I am not alone; my Father is with me." And as men talked with him it came home to them "This man walketh with God." Therefore his word had power.

Oh, brethren! is it not often true that our word is without power because there is no God within it—because it is our word and not the Father's; is it not true that our work, our touch, our speech has no healing power, only because the source of it all is ourselves. We lay a kind but helpless hand on the wounds of men, for the supreme thing is lacking. Men, seeing us, do not glorify the Father, for Him we do not reveal to their gaze. God is not in all our thoughts. Our preaching is cold and lifeless, a valley of dry bones, since no breath of God gives it life. We fail to realise that we should be—

"The trumpet of Thy lips, the clarion Full of Thy cry, sonorous with Thy breath." And yet our consciousness of God might be as real and vivid as the Master's. At least we may have some of it. It is to be won by all who seek aright. We, above all men, need to rise above the fevered toil of earth to the calm heights where God dwells. The man that would work for God must live with God. That man's face must be radiant with the light of God's countenance, who would give light to them that sit in darkness. God must be everything to a man who would speak with power to his followers of the things of God. The power of preaching springs out of an intense, unwavering consciousness of God.

A second secret of the great teacher's personality and power was his positive, magnificent assurance, undoubting and impregnable. The timidity that hesitates, the doubt that stammers, and the caution that can do little more than apologise for its message did not belong to Jesus. He knew; every word rang with personal conviction, the confidence which made him declare that a life built on his sayings is built on a rock. He did not discuss problems, and weigh evidence, and give reasons for and against. He announced, affirmed, commanded, and yet he never gave the impression of dogmatising. He spoke with authority, although there were no threatenings. It was the authority that arises from intensity of conviction. It was all positive. The Ten Commandments had said, "Thou shalt not"; Jesus said, "Thou shalt," and the least positive command of love is mightier on the conscience than all the negatives and thunders of Sinai. "Seek ye first the kingdom of God and His righteousness"; "Love your enemies, do good to them that hate you"; "Blessed are the merciful"; "Blessed are the pure in heart"; "Blessed are the peacemakers"; "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and thy neighbour as thyself"; "Go thou and do likewise"; "As ye would that men should do to you, do ye also to them"; "Be ye perfect as your Father in heaven is perfect"; "Follow me"; "But one thing is needful." The calm assurance in such sayings as these is full of power. It is what the preaching of to-day sorely needs. Question it as men may, what this age of freedom wants is a religion that speaks with authority. A religion of threats and fears, barking like a dog at your heels, you feel like kicking. A religion that apologises and is timorous and says, "Please do," you turn away from as something unmanly. But a religion that says "Thou shalt!" pulls you up sharply as if the reality of life had sounded its call to arms. The preaching of to-day affirms, not too much, but too little; it fails because it only half-believes its own Gospel, and speaks with an uncertain voice. If it makes a bold statement it is apt to be qualified by several "buts." The prophet must be very sure of God and an eternal soul, and he is to convince by his very sureness, not by process of reasoning. The world will always listen to men who are in "dead earnest," as we say, and whose words have the note of positive, personal, rock-like assurance. While Erasmus considered and hesitated, and hesitated and considered, the positive, confident, believing Luther produced the Reformation. The great preachers are always the great believers. Faith is power.

A third element of the Master's personality is found in the strength and beauty of character out of which his teaching flows and by which it is made persuasive. Here is none of that appalling contrast between preaching and conduct, between precept and practice, between the real and the ideal, between the fervid completeness of conception and the chill inadequacy of fulfilment which has been the weakness and tragedy of the Christian church all down the ages. He was the thing he taught. The beatitudes are his own portrait. In fact, the unique thing about the Gospel is not the teaching, but its fulfilment in the life of Jesus, so that he becomes the impersonated symbol of the highest life possible to us. In him the teaching

"Had breath, and wrought

With human hands the creed of creeds,
In loveliness of perfect deeds

More strong than all poetic thought."

Brethren, there is a greatness of personality which may be ours as it was Christ's, and it is that which belongs to the truth and grace of fine, harmonious character. From a merely intellectual or philosophical or scholarly point of view, mediocrity (as we have been told) may be the badge of all our tribe, but there is one direction in which no man need be mediocre, namely, Godlike character. If the preacher is poor in character it matters not that he is rich in mental endowment; on the other hand, if he has an outstanding, outshining character, if he is seen and felt to be daily reaching up to the ideals he preaches, his word will be with power. A man may have no spring of original thought no distinction of style, nothing at first sight to lift him out of the common crowd; but if as you come to know him you find that he brings with him a certain music, sweet odours and airs as of another world, if he is thoroughly consistent, if he himself is the Gospel he preaches, you will find that this man exercises within his narrow sphere an influence and power which angels might desire to look into. For he has, as was said of John Wesley, the genius for goodness. Mediocrity is fatal to the preacher, for mediocrity has no personality, and yet mediocrity must be ours if power consists only in great gifts of the intellect or singular facilities and felicities of speech. To every man there is one way of escape from mediocrity—he may be greatly good. And this is a greatness the true minister must have. Strong, beautiful, and harmonious character always gives weight, distinction, personality, power. “O worship the Lord, beautiful in holiness.” But how do we worship? By reaching up, imitating, becoming that which we admire. There is no limit to that becoming. To that supreme beauty our nature is capable of endless approach. No man knows what heights of goodness and nobleness he may yet climb, what grace and loveliness and perfection of character are possible for him. And growth in character is growth in power.

There was, however, something besides the personality of the speaker in the power which men felt to be in his words. There were certain elements in his teaching, certain large, simple, universal elements, which carried power and authority to the hearers’ minds because of the response heart and conscience give to them. The authority in the teaching would entirely fail were there no immediate answer to its truth in the heart. Moral and spiritual authority is not in reasoning, it is in the higher self within us. What impels us is nothing external. Duty, for instance, is not a compulsion from without, but expresses our very self, until we think less and less of duty, and more and more of moral ideals. Our vision imposes authority upon us; our ideal is the power that moves us. Religion is essentially the ideal element in human life, and to ask whether it has authority is the same as asking whether our ideals have a right to mould us.

The authority and the power of Christ’s teaching depends on the adequacy of his interpretation of the ideal side of our nature. If his commands conflict with what we most deeply are, with what we are in the very essence of our nature; if in coming to him we do not come to our very selves—then indeed he has no authority over us, and his word is without power. But as a matter of fact his word so interprets the Divine self within us that our whole nature rises up to greet its authority. He says, “Do this,” and our own conscience echoes “Do it.” He speaks of God as our Father, and our hearts leap to hear him. He tells us of the laws of moral and spiritual growth, and the better man within replies, “Yea, and Amen.” And all this without a word of argument.

All depends on the adequacy of his interpretation of our whole higher self. That interpretation has three notes—it is large, simple, and universal. It is large, that is, it deals with great truths, with great issues, with great acts. Matthew Arnold in the preface to one of his early volumes, has some remarks which are as applicable to the preacher as to the poet. He says: “Nor do I deny that the poetic faculty can and does manifest itself in treating the most trifling action, the most hopeless subject. But it is a pity that power should be wasted, and that the poet should be compelled to impart interest and force to his subjects, instead of receiving them from it, and thereby doubling his impressiveness. There is, it has been excellently said, an immortal strength in the story of great actions.” There is no more sure sign of weakness in the pulpit than when it is occupied with small themes and trivial subjects. There is a story told of a woman who went to Westminster Abbey one Sunday morning to hear Dean Stanley. “How did you like the sermon?” asked the friend with whom she was staying. “Oh,” was the reply, “it was very interesting; there was nothing to object to; but it was not what I went to hear. I went to hear about the way to heaven, and I only heard about the way to Palestine.” Now the story by no means conveys a true impression of the great Dean’s ordinary preaching, but it is significant. Sermons about the scenery of Palestine, or the customs of the East, or Babylonian discoveries, or the manuscripts of the Bible, or the newest phase of philosophical speculation, or the latest developments at a spiritualist seance, have no power. Under the morbid dread of being commonplace men are in danger of forsaking the great highways of religious truth for pleasant bye-paths, which, after all, lead nowhere. Or, unable to speak with authority, all sorts of doubtful expedients are tried to make up for the weakness of the pulpit. Having no power in himself, a man announces catchpenny subjects, or approximates his methods to something theatrical, and preaches about the trivial or the merely sensational. How different is the great Teacher’s method. He deals with things large and vital—God and the soul, the human heart of man and the human heart of God, the sins and sorrows of a tormented world, the hunger for light and peace, the need of joy and sympathy and comfort, the passion for righteousness, the yearnings of the soul for the love and beauty which are eternal, the ideal hopes and desires of the spirit, the invisible things of God, the immeasurable, immortal powers of faith and charity and aspiration; these and their like are the subject-matter of his teaching. Certain large ideas are always to the fore; we touch in everything the fundamental realities of life and principle. In his discourse, whether in beatitude, or parable, we keep company with great conceptions, and walk in the light which never yet was seen on sea or shore. I do not say that sermons on art, and literature, and metaphysics, and philosophy, or passing questions of the day, have no place in the pulpit, but I do say that they are not likely to provoke anyone to exclaim, “His word was with power.”

Then the Master’s teaching had the note of simplicity. “The common people heard him gladly.” Only do not confound the simple with the shallow. How simple are the beatitudes, but also how profound. No plummet can ever sound the depth of such a saying as “Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.” Yet there is nothing subtle, esoteric or wire-drawn in his authentic words. No religious leader ever talked so little theology as the founder of Christianity. To theological speculation he had not the slightest tendency. He lived in a different world from that of the creed-makers with their definitions and their hair-splitting. He made no attempt at any metaphysical conception of God such as only scholars can understand. All the soulless jargon of “person” and “substance,” “begotten” and “proceeding,” is as much outside his ken as the differential calculus. He speaks of things which publicans and sinners can understand and in language which strikes home to way-faring men. His appeal is to the ever-dawning revelation of God in men’s hearts, to the unfathomable simplicities of truth and love, and to the manifest facts of the mind’s consciousness and the heart’s nature, so that we may even say with John Ruskin, “What a child cannot understand of Christianity no one need trouble about.”

Lastly: the teaching of the Master was with power because it was universal in its scope. It was not for an age or a race, but for all time and for human nature in all lands. There is nothing temporary or merely local about his precepts. They treat of the experiences and thoughts and ideals and principles that are common to the whole household of man under all conditions: the thoughts, experiences and ideals in which men most feel their brotherhood to men and their immortal kindred with God, the universal common affections, sorrows, hopes and passions of human life which flow deep and strong beneath the surface of things. Take any one of his sayings and you will find it stretches out to all time, and has an infinite power of expansion, and that it covers wider and wider ranges of conduct and duty as life gathers breadth and volume.

Oh! brethren, we need to give men the ideas and inspire the ideals that are large, simple and universal, the truths that are infinite, the principles that are “the mother-thoughts of the universe.” That our word may be with power, we need to get down to the foundation things of life, the inner world of heart and spirit where controversy is not, where love is king, or should be, where in the heart’s own sanctuary we touch the life of God, the ineffable beauty, the righteousness which still hungers and thirsts, and the absolute forgetfulness of self. I do not say it is an easy task. Far less difficult is it to treat of surface things. Yes, paradoxical as it may seem, it requires more severe intellectual effort than does the preaching of theology. It is harder to state the great truths of the spirit’s life with simplicity, force, and freshness, than it is to philosophise about them. To give trustworthy tidings at first hand “From the Eternal hills and Shining Presence” to the weary, the struggling, the burdened, the sore-troubled, to men and women who, in the vast turmoil of the human race, through much sin and sorrow, through pain and passion, are bringing to birth a new heaven and a new earth—that is a task calling for the noblest powers, the deepest faith, the completest consecration. To kindle the passionate love of the spirit for moral perfection, strengthen and purify those powers of the heart which unite us in immortal fellowship with God and man, those faculties of the soul, loyalty to truth, quiet endurance, unfathomed sympathy, and love of humanity, infinite faith in justice and mercy, and their infinite practice, and which fill this present day with the splendour of heaven and the future with ineffable glory—to this exalted privilege we are called. Let us never doubt that we have a Gospel for humanity, a sure word of prophecy, “pure as the naked heavens, majestic, free;” a gospel of light and love, of healing grace and quickening life to which the spirit of man answers as the waters of the great ocean answer to the influence of this Easter moon. Let us preach it with confidence, with reverent boldness, with joyful hope, with burning faith. Brethren, may God make us equal to our high calling, that our word, like the Master’s, may be with power.

THE record of the remaining proceedings of the week will appear in the next number of THE INQUIRER, which is to complete the National Conference report. In this number we include further the Rev. Charles Hargrove’s paper on “The Church and the World,” the Rev. Dendy Agate’s paper on “Advisory Committees and Ministerial Settlements,” the Rev. F. K. Freeston’s Guilds Union sermon, and the paper read by Miss Lucas at the conference of the National Unitarian Temperance Association.

THE CHURCH AND THE WORLD. THE RELATION OF MINISTERS AND CONGREGATIONS TO SOCIAL AND POLITICAL QUESTIONS OF THE DAY.

BY THE REV. CHARLES HARGROVE, M.A.

THE foremost of American writers of our day, lighting, in the course of analytical reflection, upon what he calls “one of the most lurid pages in the annals of political corruption,” sums up the actual situation in these words:—

“The place was two distinct things—a society the most genial and delightful one could think of, and then parallel to this, and not within it or quite altogether above it, but beside it and beneath it, behind it and before it, enclosing it as in a flame of fire in which it still had the secret of keeping cool, a city the most incredible that ever was, organised all for plunder and rapine, the gross satisfaction of official appetite, organised for eternal iniquity and impurity.

“It is the admiration and amazement of the nations, the way in which sane society and pestilent city in the United States successfully co-habit, each keeping it up with so little of fear or flutter from the other. The thing presents itself in its prime unlikelihood as a thorough good neighbouring of the Happy Family and the Infernal Machine, the machine so rooted as to continue to defy removal, and the family so indifferent while it carries on the family business of buying and selling, of chattering and of dancing, to the danger of being blown up.”

It is the description of the life of a great city which has obtained disreputable fame for civic corruption, altogether exceptional, one would hope, in the extent, the immensity and the impunity of its operations. But its case is exceptional only, as are all extreme cases, in degree; just as the wealth and poverty of London are exceptional in respect of the prodigious heights and depths they respectively reach and the restricted area in which they are compressed. Otherwise the situation so luridly portrayed is that not of a city, but of mankind, always and inevitably so since first man, quickened by the divine breath, became a living soul, cognisant of, and craving after supersensual good, and so the Church was founded in the midst of the world.

The dualism of which he becomes henceforth more or less painfully conscious has been recognised in all religious systems, and made the foundation on which numerous schemes of theology, heretical and orthodox, have been erected. The individual man is divided within himself, and distracted between contrary laws of whose “warring” his soul is the battlefield. And mankind at large is divided, not by occasional quarrels over the restricted supply of females or of food as are the beasts, but by allegiance to contrary principles—allegiance wavering, half-hearted, almost unconscious on the part of the greater number, but nevertheless continually and permanently impelling men into antagonistic groups, more or less ill defined.

And the great question before us to-day, and before all churches or groups of people professing fidelity to the higher calling of all places and times, is this—what is our relation and duty, and what ought to be our attitude towards the great rival power which is beside and before and behind us, and in the midst of which we live?

Is a happy family, in which cats and birds dwell together, tamed as to congenital antagonism by discipline of the showman, habit nurtured by salutary fear and greed maintaining an unnatural peace—is this the model to be held up for our imitation? Is the world’s offer of more or less contemptuous amity, on condition of acquiescence if not approval of its methods and maxims, to be closed with once and for all?

Is it peace? Shall we try to settle down, and henceforth dwell together “without fear or flutter from the other” the church giving to the world benediction in return for support? Is it peace? Peace between right and wrong, peace between good and evil, peace between truth and lies, peace between greed and charity, peace between all opposites? But what have we to do with peace? or are we content to leave to others part in “the church militant here on earth? What peace so long as everywhere right is overborne by might, and the witchcrafts of the world seducing the souls of men are so many? What peace while the poor rot in the slums of our wealthy cities, and strong drink tempts them down to ever lower damnation—while vice stalks unabashed in our streets, and women and men are prey one of the other—while children starve and grow not to manhood and womanhood, but to a miserable maturity of weakness—while trusts accumulate the gains of labour and Mammon sits enthroned, and men do him lowliest homage—while tyranny makes of fair lands a desert watered vainly with salt tears and blood? While these things are and the like on earth, denying that God is or that God is good, is it, can it ever be, peace for those who would be on His side?

Or has it ever been? Indifference, despondency, cowardice, desertion, treachery, these have ever been in our ranks, for they are men not angels who compose them, and men subject to every weakness to which even the willing spirit is liable. But however many failed and fell away, even though at any time it were true that there were to be found no seven thousand who had not bowed the knee to the world’s gods, yet while there was left one witness for righteousness and truth, though in his despair he might cry aloud: “I and I only,” peace there never was, nor could be, for he alone would be an army to trouble faithless souls.

“The friendship of the world is enmity with God.” “If any man love the world the love of the Father is not in him.” “Marvel not if the world hate you; if ye were of the world, the world would love its own, but because ye are not of the world therefore the world hateth you.” “Whatsoever is begotten of God overcometh the world.” Persecuted and despised, they may have conceived of the world in too narrow a sense, may have drawn the line too rigidly, and been unable or unwilling to recognise how church and world divide the hearts of men within them even more than they divide men into antagonistic societies. But were they altogether at fault who so wrote? Is the friendship and good opinion of the world what the church ought to seek for, and for which it ought to sacrifice its principles and keep discreet silence as far as it may or dare? Are its “poms and vanities,” its wealth and luxury and power to be admired and to be shared in, if only the price demanded be not altogether beyond reason? Ought we to try to live on good terms with the powers which make for the lower life and trust that those who are guided by them will approve us?

What is the duty, the call of the Church, and how shall we be faithful to it? This is the subject of to-day’s discussion, and to me it seems to be of practically infinite importance. Beside it all questions of theology over which the churches themselves have so fiercely contended, summoning the world in to take part with its forces on this side or that, or leaving it unheeded to stand apart in contemptuous indifference, while the anathemas it feared, because it knew them just, were reserved for heretics—are of no account. But lest we lose ourselves in comfortable generalisations—for war, spiritual or carnal, is fine to talk about, and it is easy to fight and to endure in imagination—let us ask the question not of the One universal Church of all times and places, but of any individual company of believers in God, meeting together for humble worship and communion in the form which commends itself to us as most accordant with truth.

What does it exist for? Is it enough that it unites its members in devotion and belief, and inspires them by mutual contact of souls with spiritual life? Because we, who boast ourselves more advanced than others in freedom and knowledge, are apparently more than others wanting in this spiritual life, in fervour of devotion, in tenderness of religious feeling, in love of prayer—therefore is it, I suppose, that this subject recurs so often for self-animadversion, for accusation and reproach, for confession, for inquiry. We are cold! so we hear on every side within and without our borders; and there is no merit in coldness, quite the opposite; but is it the one object of our coming together and constituting ourselves a church—to generate heat? If the spiritual life were so developed among us that we were all fervent in prayer, all our meetings veritably in manifestation of the spirit and in power, should we then have fulfilled the purpose of a church, and might we be self-satisfied? Let the Master answer.

“Ye are the salt of the earth.” “Ye are the light of the world.” It is for earth’s sake we are “salted with fire” of Divine Love; it is for the world’s enlightenment we are visited of the light.

¶ You may say if the life be within it will manifest itself. It ought to, but it may not, and often does not. The salt may be there, nor even have lost its savour; but it does not act unless it be applied, and the carcase may putrefy with the salt close beside it. The lamp may be kindled, but unless it be set on high so that it may shine on all, the room will be in darkness.

We must first have salt in ourselves; we must have oil in our lamps; but it is not enough. The fig-tree of the parable had life in it and put forth its leaves, but it bore no fruit, was of no profit to him who passed by an-hungered, and therefore was the sentence passed upon it, “Cut it down.” Why cumberst it the ground living for itself alone? “Salt is good,” and goodly is light, and good are faith and fervour; but “by works a man is justified,” and a church by the influence it exerts in the world, by the light it sheds around for the guidance of men.

So, according to Jesus the object of a church, of any religious society, is not to save the souls of its adherents, but to realise as far as it may that for which it prays, “Thy kingdom come”—kingdom in which misery and wrong shall be no more; “Thy will be done.” Will which is Law of righteousness and peace and love.

But between admitted principles of the loftiest and application of the same to gross and petty detail the way is often of the most difficult and dubious, and easy is it even for the wise to err therein.

The Church must be effective for the world’s good, or the very reason of its being ceases. It will be as salt which does not season, as light which does not illuminate. But doing good is not an obvious task, and one may sincerely mean good and do much evil. Best intentions confer no infallibility, and benevolent activity may aggravate the very evil it seeks to remedy, may pauperise the poor, and exasperate opponents and cause division among friends.

But, unless I am mistaken, the true office of church and minister is not action but influence. As a lamp silently sheds its light on all around, so has it to make manifest to all who come within its reach the great principles on which the kingdom of heaven is founded. As salt, so is it to be a power steadfastly and quietly working for the purification of the life which itself shares in.

Let us look at the three relations of every minister and congregation: first to the members themselves, secondly to town and neighbourhood, thirdly to the nation and the world. It is not the business of the church to give alms to its own poor, and if it attempts to do so as a church, it will probably do harm both to itself, by attracting undesirable and hypocritical adherents, and to those whom it tries to help. Its part is to inspire and increase the charity which prompts to all good endeavour, to engage its members to co-operate in every undertaking for the common welfare, and “in love of the brethren to be tenderly affectioned one to another.” If there be this, the rest will follow; and there will be no need of organising sectarian charities, which are often mischievous and always doubtful. But these are scarcely “questions of the day,” and I do not wish to dogmatise as to the methods which each congregation may adopt for the discharge of its duties towards those of its own household of faith.

What is the office of the church as respects the town or neighbourhood in which it is situated? Is it no way responsible for the good government of the place, for the purity of local elections, for the characters of the candidates for council? If the number of public-houses is excessive, and the drink traffic not duly controlled, and vice is connived at, and street gambling, and those who live by it allowed with only a seeming of control: if the dwellings of the poor are insanitary, and sewerage and lighting defective, and the river an open drain: if the Poor Law is inefficiently administered, and infectious diseases not checked, and adulteration of food not looked after and punished; are these things and the like no concern of religious men as such? Is religion too holy and lofty to stoop to such low considerations as those of disease and dirt and corruption, and such-like vile and vulgar matters?

I do not think there will be any difference of opinion among us as to the interest which religion has in these things, nor can we conceive of their being tolerated in a City of God. But when we come to ask, should minister and church take a direct and active part in the government of the city and its policy? we are confronted immediately with difficulties in dealing with the situation.

We are agreed, or ought to be and must try to be, as to the desired end. It is for us Divine Service that we should do our part towards making the place we dwell in clean and sweet. Nor can we believe our cities less sacred than the camp of Israel, or that it was mere superstition which dictated to the Hebrew lawgiver directions for personal cleanliness on the ground that “the Lord thy God walketh in the midst of the camp, therefore shall thy camp be holy, that He see no unclean thing in thee and turn away from thee.” Yes, it is the right and the duty of the churches to preach, and insist upon it, that there shall be no filth and no vice tolerated where their influence can reach.

But the means whereby to arrive at or approach nearer to this end are none so certain. We see from afar the city of God, “set on a hill,” but how to reach thereto, across swamps and rivers, hedges and walls, impediments natural and artificial, we do not see, or see indistinctly, and so come to be divided among ourselves. But “a house divided against itself cannot stand.” A church can do nothing if it is not at one as to what it shall do. It cannot take action as a church, nor can the minister take action as minister and representative of his people, but only as a private citizen.

So I conclude that in municipal matters, deeply as the church is concerned, its office is to give light whereby the evil may be made manifest, rather than on its own part to work for the removal of it. In the happy case where all are agreed, and have no doubt what should be done, by all means let them do it. But rarely or never is this the case; and where it is not, how can the church work? Nay, we may go further, and ask whether as a church it will even know how to do the work it is agreed ought to be done.

I know that the foul stream which flows through Leeds is an offence against God and man; but how it can be restored to its natural purity, and what are the difficulties in the way, neither my congregation nor myself can tell. It is not our business, and we must be content to denounce that which we are powerless to alter till we have won the attention of those in whose power it may lie.

And still more difficult to deal with are the great questions of national and international politics, every one of which has its religious aspect and cannot therefore be treated by us as indifferent.

Tariff Reform, Old Age Pensions, the Claims of Trade Unions, the Feeding of Poor Children, State Education, and all the other subjects which interest and divide men to-day have to be considered not only from the politician’s point of view, who looks to what is expedient and what is possible of accomplishment, but judged also from the higher ground of what is right and accordant with Divine Law. If a congregation is unanimous in its sentence, it is but little it can do: pass a resolution, call a public meeting—I know not of anything more. But if it is not of one mind, as will most often be the case—if widely and strenuously at variance as on great questions of peace and war—it is powerless. Individual members may take action on opposite sides, but this will only make the impotence of the body the more manifest.

And the minister? Shall he in such case utter his sentence and deliver his soul and take what consequences may ensue? It seems indeed the nobler course, and if any man be fully persuaded that the Word of God is committed to him, no other course is possible. But which of us is so bold? Which is not rather ready to admit that, strong as his conviction, he yet may be mistaken, and that others as true and discerning as himself who take the opposite view may be right? It seems noble to speak out at the risk of losing not only favour, but even livelihood, and yet it may be something of secret pride which prompts a man to declare himself and his own opinion as if he had the right to speak in the name of God, Minister and not master, it is his part to serve his people with the bread of life, not to pronounce judgment from which, if delivered from the pulpit, there can be no appeal. His part to call attention to those "weightier matters of the law," which all allow and all so readily put aside when most they need to be applied, "justice and mercy and good faith," forgiveness of injuries and pity and truth—matters which in time of national or industrial war it will often make men angry to be reminded of. In season and out of season—when people willingly hear enforced precepts which are not of present application—when they are possessed by passion of war or party, and are ready to turn and rend the preacher—still must he bear witness for God and right. Be it with the multitude or with the few, on behalf of working men or of employers, he must speak unwelcome truths and stand amid the surge of passion for impartial judgments.

Finally, for I must needs leave much unsaid, I fain would say, and leave to others to complete what is wanting and correct what is amiss—this is, in my judgment, the office of the Church and its ministry, of each congregation and its minister, not to take active part in the world's affairs, but to interfere perpetually on behalf of the kingdom of God. Church and State are indissolubly united, quite independently of any establishment of a particular sect. Citizens compose our congregations, and members of the churches are an overwhelming majority of our Parliament. There is no subordination of one to the other. As head and heart work together for a man's conduct, so should religion and politics; as flesh and soul constitute the whole man, so should the human and divine each bear its part to make the nation; flesh has its rights and its uses, no less than soul, and if the two are ever at war, yet do they ever work together and by co-operation attain the end of our being on earth.

Does it seem a tame conclusion to a magniloquent exordium? Have I begun by proclaiming war, and do I seem to end by pleading for peace? Not so, but "the weapons of our warfare are not carnal." Not by loud speech and indignant remonstrance and excited protest shall we prevail, any more than by force of arms. Of our great Captain, who overcame the world by his prowess, it was said: "He shall not strive nor cry aloud, neither shall any one hear his voice in the streets." "For I am meek and lowly," he said. And a disciple lays it down that following his example, "The servant of the Lord must not strive, but be gentle unto all men."

These are the armour of the Church of God, these the weapons which it puts into the hands of its ministers. Hitherto they have prevailed when the world's arms have failed, and its defences been of no effect. And if ministers and congregations are true to their calling, if they "know what spirit they are of," and clothe themselves with indomitable faith and invincible meekness, we shall yet prevail, and slowly, it may be almost imperceptibly, win the earth for God. For is it not written, "Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth."

ADVISORY COMMITTEES AND MINISTERIAL SETTLEMENTS.

BY THE REV. DENDY AGATE, B.A.

WHEN the programme of this Conference, now so near its end, was published, a critic residing not very far from Oxford remarked that those advertised to take part in it seemed to be chiefly "the old gang." As one of the persons thus compendiously and happily described, I desire to say that I tried hard to escape my present task, and that I undertook it only because my colleagues of the Committee pressed upon me the honour of playing a short overture to the resolution which the Rev. Joseph Wood will presently move on his own account.

An Advisory and Settlements Sub-Committee was appointed after the last Conference, not, indeed, to give advice or promote settlements, but to consider the desirability of establishing a board for such purposes. That sub-committee reported as follows:—

"Your sub-committee, having duly considered the terms of the reference, do not see their way to favour the creation of a board whose duty it may be to recommend any particular minister to a vacant pulpit. They think such an innovation would be injurious to the independence of both ministers and congregations alike. At present when a pulpit is vacant the officials of the congregation seek the advice of some minister or laymen in the district, frequently the chairman or secretary of the local association, and there appears to be no reason for departing from this practice.

"As to the creation of one central Advisory Board for the whole of the United Kingdom, your Committee are of opinion that the time is not yet ripe for the establishment of such a body; but, recognising the value of the work done by existing advisory boards in different districts, they think it desirable that the Conference Committee should communicate with the local unions, lay before them information as to the advantage of establishing local advisory committees, and urge them to do so."

Some portion of what I have just quoted is embodied in the annual report. The Committee has not so far brought the matter before the local unions.

The Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties was the first body to adopt the recommendation, carried by 74 votes to 49, at the special Conference held at Nottingham in March, 1900, that each district association should form such a committee. The London and South-Eastern Counties Advisory Committee was constituted in 1891, was suspended for two years, and resumed operations after the Sheffield Conference. The Rev. James Harwood has kindly furnished me with the following particulars. Since 1891 down to the present time the Committee has on application investigated 49 cases, which are thus classified:—

Men approved and now in the ministry	17
Men who applied and afterwards withdrew	5
Men approved and not now in the ministry	10
Men approved and not granted a certificate	7

Men not approved, but now in the ministry	1
Men whose cases were not definitely dealt with, now in the ministry	2
Men whose cases were not definitely dealt with, not in the ministry	7

I ask you to note, as evidence of the value of the work done by this Committee, that in rather more than a third of the cases submitted to it the Committee was able to accept as satisfactory the credentials of men who are now occupying pulpits among us. This Committee examines into the character and personal fitness of men desiring to enter the ministry in any part of the province, but not into their doctrinal belief, and leaves all matters other than character and personal fitness for the sole consideration of such individual congregation. The Committee is also prepared to give help in other ways, which do not immediately concern us. Many ministers of other denominations, who are looking in our direction, naturally make inquiries at Essex Hall, and have interviews with the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie; and, to assist the Advisory Committee in their work, Mr. Bowie has a printed sheet of questions, which he hands to each applicant, and which, when filled up, he passes on to the Advisory Committee. These questions deal entirely with a man's past record, but touch no point of doctrine. Mr. Bowie informs me that "the majority of the inquirers are never heard of any more."

The next Advisory Committee to come into existence was that in connection with the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire. The decision to appoint it was made in June, 1892, and the first committee elected in June, 1893. Like that of London and the South-Eastern Counties it receives applications from both congregations and ministers, and is prepared to deal not only with the cases of ministers or candidates who desire a certificate of ministerial fitness, but also with those of ministers who wish to have adjudication made upon their continued fitness to occupy ministerial positions in the province. In all, 22 applications have come before the Committee. They cannot be tabulated in precisely the same form as those from London and the South-East. It will be sufficient to say that 11 of the 22 men are now in the ministry and that of the 11, 7 received a certificate of fitness from the Committee. In three other cases out of the 11 no certificate was given, in one the request for adjudication was withdrawn. The other 11 cases are accounted for thus: Certificates were granted to 3 men not now in the ministry, and were not issued to 5 others; 1 application was withdrawn, and in 2 cases the committee considered that the matters submitted were beyond their purview. These results, taken together with those already cited for London and the South-East, show the care expended by the two committees on the cases submitted to their judgment, and show also that in at least a few instances their judgment was not accepted as final.

The Advisory Committee in connection with the Southern Unitarian Association was first appointed in July, 1893, but has had only one case before it, that of a minister who "satisfied the Committee as to his character and personal fitness," and is now in our ministry. The joint Advisory Committee of the South-East Wales Unitarian Society and the South Wales Unitarian Association was established in 1900; and has had two cases before it, on which it "resolved to take no action."

With the methods of our Advisory Committees may be usefully compared the proceedings of the Committee on Fellowship of the American National Conference. This committee consists of fifteen members, three from each of five different groups of States. Each sub-committee of three acts for its own group of States, and reports its decisions to the general secretary, who reports them in turn to the other four sub-committees; and unless within thirty days of the "mailing" of the report objection is taken by some other sub-committee, the original decision is held to be acquiesced in, and is published in one or more of the denominational papers over the names of the chairman and secretary of the General Committee. The Committee on Fellowship has the annual task of revising the ministerial roll for the whole country. Sometimes at least this Committee on Fellowship has consisted entirely of ministers; whether that has always been the case I cannot say. Here in Great Britain and the adjacent Islands I hope we shall always go on the principle of combined lay and ministerial committees.

I sum up this portion of my paper by urging that an Advisory Committee should be appointed for each association which at present has none, or that for the purpose certain districts might be grouped. The Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire covers, it may be remembered, substantially the same ground as four district associations. For advisory purposes might not Yorkshire and the northern counties co-operate, and also the North Midland Association and the Midland Christian Union? If the decisions arrived at by each Advisory Committee were communicated to the secretary of the Conference and then by him to the other Advisory Committees, a satisfactory beginning of something more systematic and generally helpful and instructive than we have now would be made. If still closer co-operation proved desirable as time went by, it would be easy to go on to it. Meanwhile different Advisory Committees, including those already in existence, could learn something by a study of each other's methods, and by agreeing, if possible, upon similar lines of general action.

So much for the investigation of the record of those who wish to join us, or in some cases presenting difficulty to remain at work with us. There is further the important question of ministerial settlements, how ministers wanting pulpits or congregations wanting ministers may be helped to come together and find their affinities, all without sacrifice of congregational independence or any man's self-respect. It will be admitted that there are difficulties at present, and that the results are not always satisfactory. Some of us, both on and beyond the Conference Committee, had been hoping that the Conference itself would take action or that the Committee would do so, because the last Conference gave it the opportunity. And those of us who belong to the Ministerial Fellowship, which now has 125 members and is our largest ministerial society, decided nearly two years since to try what could be done to bring ministers and congregations together. The scheme was first suggested to us by our indefatigable secretary, the Rev. C. J. Street, who, as he was the founder of the Fellowship, became also the founder and secretary of the Ministerial Bureau, as we are accustomed to call it. It is worked thus:—The secretary writes to the secretary of every congregation where the pulpit is vacant, offering the help of the Bureau towards filling the vacancy. Sometimes the help is declined, sometimes it is accepted. That is for the congregation themselves or their committees to settle. They pay no money, but they take their choice. If the proffered help of the Bureau is accepted, the secretary writes to each member of the Fellowship who may be without ministerial charge or is known to be willing to undertake fresh work (something more of this presently), and asks him if he desires his name submitted to the congregation in question. If he says "Yes," his name goes on the list sent to the congregation; if he says "No," it does not. If new names come on the ministerial list before the vacancy is filled up the process is repeated in each case. Committees and congregations are urged to discourage competitive candidature, and to deal with one man at a time; and ministers are also urged to similar action in regard to congregations, not, e.g., to hold one invitation open for an indefinite time in hope of receiving another to a more attractive field. Any member of the Fellowship can send his name to the secretary as being "movable," but the names of all the ministers and congregations on the list are known only to a confidential committee consisting of the president and treasurer in addition to the secretary. All the correspondence is from time to time perused by these three.

You will understand that the amount of work for the secretary involved in all this is very great, and that only a man of business habits and unflagging industry could undertake it in addition to all the other claims upon his time. Indeed, the work is too heavy for any minister in active duty to carry on for more than a year or two. If everything were not kept thoroughly posted up, the business of the Bureau would fall into hopeless confusion. But we, who know what the work is, and who are deeply grateful to Mr. Street for having done it for nearly two years, are satisfied with the results. No fewer than five appointments to vacant pulpits have been made directly through the agency of the Fellowship, and in several other cases our friendly aid has at least contributed to the result. Ninety-four churches or associations have been communicated with; 37 have been on the list. Thirty ministers have been on the list; 20 ministers and 13 congregations are on it now. Two congregations and 8 ministers have been on the books since 1904. One minister's name has been sent to 34 places; one congregation has had the names of 22 ministers sent to it; while two congregations have received two names only. One congregation where a settlement was effected received 18 communications from the secretary, who received nine from it. The minister who settled there sent the secretary 23 communications and received 35 from him. One minister, on the books from the beginning and still on, though temporarily settled, has sent the secretary 33 communications, and the secretary has sent 72 either to him or to congregations on his behalf. It seems, further, to some of us that this is work which, we hope without putting an undue strain upon him, might be undertaken in future by the secretary of the National Conference on behalf of the ministry and the churches at large. He might be assisted, as is the secretary of the Ministerial Fellowship, by a small confidential committee. Of course, Mr. Street has always steadily declined, as secretary of the Bureau, to recommend some particular man to a congregation, although sometimes he has been besought to do so, as Advisory Committees have also been besought, and have also declined. Any such official recommendations would savour of favouritism, and would not make eventually for either harmony or efficiency. I may add that if this Conference sees its way to ask its secretary to undertake such work as Mr. Street at present does for the Bureau, many of us connected with the Ministerial Fellowship would gladly vote for our relinquishment of it.

Were I not pledged to a brevity which I have no wish to exceed, other things might be said. I beg only for a sympathetic consideration of the points raised in this paper and by Mr. Wood. What we all desire is to have capable and devoted ministers engaged in congenial and fruitful work, to have congregations which shall wisely choose and loyally support their ministers, and be filled at once with the spirit of worship and fellowship and the zeal for practical religion. Can we not by mutual help bring both these desires to fulfilment?

YOUTH AND FAITH.*

BY THE REV. FRANK K. FREESTON,
President of the National Conference
Guilds' Union.

"Your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions; and also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out my spirit."—Joel ii. 28, 29.

WHAT a daring prediction to make in the name of the Lord and his prophet! What a wondrous, joyous promise! But has it come to pass? Did these days of prophesying ever dawn, or have they been and gone with no hope of return, or are we still waiting for them to come again? Was this promise made alone to others in a far-distant past, or is it also meant for us—for us who are set in the midst of present demands, but now met for an hour in this place of prayer? You have gathered together here, sons and daughters from many homes, young men and some elders from various Guilds, to join in this united service. Do you prophesy, as saith the promise? Do you dream dreams, and see visions? Do you feel the present outpouring of God's spirit in your days, and your lives? These are questions to ask rather than to answer at once; but, perhaps, if pressed, these would be your replies: "Would that all the Lord's people were prophets, but we dare not take such assurance to ourselves. Would that He might put his spirit upon all men, but we can only look on. Dreaming dreams and seeing visions may be harmless but must be useless, for dreams are not true, and visions are not facts. We simply try to do the plain and ordinary duty of each day as it goes by, to avoid any evil that comes in our way, and to do a little good to somebody. As for these higher things, they are beyond our reach entirely, and God does not expect from us more than we are doing already."

But stay: is that so really? Is there nothing more and better to say? Are we doing our true selves justice if we urge no more than this? It is natural, perhaps, to say at first, "Who am I, and what is my father's house," but it is nobler to say, "Here am I, send me. Lord, I am ready, despite my insufficiency." It is then that we hear the prophet calling, "Let the weak say, I am strong. Be not afraid, but be glad. Fear not, for the Lord will do great things." It is then that we believe in great things ourselves, though beyond our present reach, and are fired with great hopes which save us, though as yet not seen as facts; then that we are stirred with strange joys and awakened to fresh possibilities; then that we are filled with wonder at the present hour, and eagerly peer into the future, and are dull no longer. Yes, there is something prophetic at the heart of every true life, a prophetic note only waiting to be struck; there are some dreams that are ready to become realities, and some visions, no less, which reveal the highest truths.

Let us to-night, at least, dare to believe in the great things, in the invisible things which are eternal, in the spiritual things which are real, in the divinest things of which life is capable. And let this day recall some of these to our memory.

You have been visiting, some for the first time, this ancient, world-known city of learning. You have gazed at its glorious spires and towers rising up towards heaven, paced through its historical colleges and halls, wandered about its spacious quadrangles, lingered in its peaceful gardens, and been everywhere reminded of the great and good who have spent their opening manhood at Oxford. For what does this Oxford stand? For learning, scholarship, knowledge, yes; but for more than that: for the prophecy, the dream, the vision of Truth, truth as supreme and absolute, truth which must be followed, obeyed, revered, with patient discipline and pure devotion, and for its own sake alone. No student loved Oxford more than he who said:

For vigorous teachers seized my youth,
And purged its faith, and trimmed its fire;

Showed me the high, white star of Truth,
There bade me gaze, and there aspire.

You have gazed, in your youth, at this "high white star of Truth;" there is something in your heart which will not permit you to knowingly think an untrue thought, say an untrue word, do an untrue act, or spread an untrue report; something in your mind which will not let you be content with less than the whole truth, if it is to be found out; something in your will which could make you fight for it, suffer for it, nay, die for it, moreover, like Ridley and Latimer, if ever a cruel power sought to make you recant, and swear truth to be error. Yes, you would openly, bravely prophesy because you have seen the vision of truth as supreme and could not prove coward or traitor.

We are holding this service in one of the newest and smallest of these Oxford colleges—but a small college with a great message. What is that message? As you entered the building you read that inscription "To Truth, to Liberty, and to Religion." What a splendid proclamation! If truth is to be sought truly, its search must be free entirely from authority or penalty, and when thus found by way of freedom, its highest name is religion. You believe in this religious freedom; not in freedom as a mere negative condition, but as a necessary medium, as a right, a duty, an obligation, without which our truth seeking is not worthy of the name and our conclusion not really our own. Think then what you owe to-day to all those lovers of religious liberty, from Luther and Zwingli to the Ejected Puritan Clergy, from Servetus and the Socini to Priestley and Lindsey, patriarchs, prophets, and martyrs, whom we commemorate with gladness of heart, and others, our fathers and brethren, not wholly unworthy to be named along with them. They dreamed dreams which have come to pass, saw visions which have become facts, and the very thought of their loyalty makes you prophesy and say that you can at least bear willingly in this easier day, any little penalty, any unpopularity, if only the cause of religious liberty be helped thereby, and all trammels on thought be done away. But this liberty for which we still make our plea does not mean, and must not imply, any lazy neutrality; freedom does not, must not, mean, no need of conviction. When Jeremy Taylor, Fellow of All Souls', wrote his Liberty of Prophesying, he did not mean liberty to ignore all religion, but to form your own conclusion and be tolerant to another's opinion. When Arthur Stanley, Fellow of University, left Oxford to become Dean of Westminster Abbey, these were his last words to the young men of this university: "Be as free, be as liberal, be as courageous as you will, but be religious, because you are liberal; be devout, because you are free; be pure, because you are bold; cast away the works of darkness, because you are the children of light; be humble and considerate and forbearing, because you are charged with hopes as grand as were ever committed to the rising generation of any church or any country." That is the true spirit and prophecy of religious liberty.

We are met not only in a liberal college, but in this beautiful college chapel. Why is it here at all, and why has such loving, reverent art been so richly lavished upon it? This chapel stands for Faith—faith in divine things; it is meant as a fitting forecourt for the sanctuary not made with hands. And we have been singing hymns, and praying prayers, and feeling how good it is to be here, and to be here together, and in such goodly number. What are these hymns and prayers, and kindling emotions which lay their sacred spells on our hearts? Are they not prophecies, dreams, visions of the holiest things so near to us, of the heaven that lies about us, of the immortal hope, the Easter faith, by which we are bound to the unseen world where our life is hid with Christ in God? Our hymn soars higher than our action, our prayer is for more than we perform, our fellowship must soon again be outwardly broken, but yet we have faith in that which we do not see, faith in what we sing and pray, and in that glow of faith we all prophesy. The Spirit of God is poured down, and our answering spirits are lifted up into a unique joy of fellowship, into a common passion of aspiration which assures us the prophet's promise may come.

Oh, friends, though the great prophets and saints are few and far above us, though the great religious watchwords seem too great to take upon our lips, though we feel less than the least of the saints, though we cannot be leaders at all, but only belong to the rank and file, we can be faithful followers, loyal helpers, with perhaps the same longings and ideals, the same hopes and joys.

Therefore, sons and daughters, young men and maidens, believe in your youth and your visions. Do not wait for some convenient future, the never-arriving tomorrow. Youth is the time for faith, for generous hopes, for chivalrous enthusiasms. Just as surely as the bright, fresh leaves and flowers are bursting out around us in these beautiful, wonderful spring days, so surely may bright, fresh, thoughts and hopes spring forth from our hearts. Many of you have been reading lately the thrilling and romantic story of that prophet, dreamer, and "visionary," Mazzini, who founded Young Italy and secured Italian unity. He was not yet twenty-six when he launched that tremendous enterprise, and he had only at first five helpers. "Here are we," said one of them, "five young, very young men, with but limited means, and we are called on to do nothing less than overthrow an established government." But they did it. "We were often in real want," wrote Mazzini himself, "but we were light-hearted in a way, and smiling, because we believed in the future." "Smiling, because we believed in the future;" that is a saying, a picture, to remember.

We must have, therefore, a true life idea. Is the true life a stroll on a mossy lawn? Not often. Is it a school wherein to learn discipline? Yes, in part, but more than that. Is it a workshop in which to use tools? Yes, but more than this. Is it a pilgrimage for our own salvation, like that of Bunyan's Christian? No. Is it, then, a mission for the sake of others? Yes, a thousand times "yes." Life is a campaign, a crusade, a holy war. Each should be a soldier of the divine idea and wear the Christian armour, the sword of the spirit and the shield of faith. What shall be our passwords, our watchwords, therefore, in this holy warfare? In a beautiful evening collect, which you probably know by heart, there is a part which we cannot too often repeat, in word or thought—"Keep us through life to the holy vigils of love and service." There, surely, are our watchwords: Love and Service. Turn them into commands, "Love, Serve." These were the motto of the good Lord Shaftesbury, and are on his monument in Westminster Abbey. The one reminds us of what we are to be, the other of what we are to do. Ponder them over.

Love—our highest word for God, the essence of the two great commandments of Jesus, the greatest of Paul's three excellent things; love, the fulfiller of the whole law, the caster out of all fear, the one thing that faileth never, and endureth for ever; love that forgives and is forgiven, that understands and is understood, that gives, asking not again, yet receives more in return, that saves others and is saved therein, that in healing another's pain finds balm for its own; love that is the Good Samaritan to the wounded on life's road, the welcoming father to the repentant prodigals of the world. Need anything more be said?

And Service—love's highest test, love's privilege, its means of grace, its holiest purpose. Serve—not as a duty which is hard but as an opportunity of aid, not as a task to be set and completed but as a wish to prove a friend, not as so much effort for so much result but as the whole spirit of our life and work, not as an irksome limitation on our leisure time but as an offering of perfect freedom, and not as an act of our own will alone but as co-working with the will of heaven. "Dismiss me not thy service, Lord, But train me for thy will." The service of man is the service of God, if rendered from this high motive: it is the Christ service, the Christ motive; and then, if our power of service seem small, or if we are laid aside from the service we have attempted, or if we should find that others can do it so much the better, then we can say with Dr. Arnold, in the last entry in his journal: "Let me labour to do God's will, yet not anxious that it should be done by me rather than by others, if God so wills it should be."

The true life is not easy; it needs all our courage. The visions of great things do not too often visit us, yet without the vision we perish. The vigils of love and service can only be kept by prayerful, faithful hearts. But here it is that our Guilds try to help us—through the days between one Sunday and the next, through the years between youth and adolescence, through the space between the school and the church. Those who are in charge of your Guilds regard them, hence, as of precious importance. Their welfare, your welfare, is very dear to us. It is not much that we can do, for your lives are in your own hands—and God's. But we wish to be your friends, your true comrades in a common cause. So we appeal to your loyalty to-day, and ask that you will help your Guilds to realise their high ideals. For if, with their aid, you learn to love and serve God, you will assuredly hasten on the coming of His kingdom; if you dream dreams and see visions while you are young, they will not, cannot be in vain, and as you grow older in years, yet still young in spirit, you will dream, and dream them again.

Your wondrous portion shall be this,
Eternal youth, eternal bliss,
And everlasting love.

THE DEVELOPMENT OF THE TEMPERANCE MOVEMENT.*

By CLARA C. LUCAS.

FROM the days of Noah until now men and nations have been faced by the problem of how to save people from the evils of strong drink. Amongst the Oriental religions, before the days of Christianity, advice was given and commands were issued against the drinking of wine. Neither Greece nor Rome were unfamiliar with the vice of drunkenness. Over 2,000 years ago Phylarchus is reported to have said: "The Greeks who sacrifice to the sun god make libations of honey. They never bring wine to the altar, because it is fitting that the god who keeps the universe in order should in no way be associated with drunkenness."

Amongst the Romans, too, the havoc and deterioration due to strong drink were realised by a sculptor, who, portraying a man and woman, hand in hand, in a hopeless state of intoxication, inscribed beneath his statue—"The end of Rome."

Nevertheless, amongst these various nations there were those who understood the value and benefit of total abstinence—they were "water drinkers" as they were called—as probably Adam in "As You Like It"—

"Though I am old, yet am I strong and lusty,
For in my youth I never did apply
Hot and rebellious liquors in my blood."

But we must not linger over these olden days, but consider the growth and development of what is known to-day as the Temperance Movement.

There is perhaps no moral movement which has been more persistently and earnestly advocated than that of temperance.

It was in its origin essentially a people's movement, and it has been fostered and maintained by the people. Had it been begun by the wealthy and powerful, for the benefit of the so-called "lower classes," its dirge would long ere this have been sounded, and it would have died a respectable, though perhaps a lingering death.

Like Christianity, the Temperance Movement began in a small way amongst simple folk. Like Christianity, too, it went through its period of persecution and reviling, whilst to-day it has become eminently respectable, and is looked upon with favour in high places.

In the beginning of this century drunkenness was admitted to be rife, and this was not confined to one class or condition of the people, for "as drunk as a lord" was but a revelation of the condition of many of the nobility.

It is a lamentable fact that Hogarth's pictures of Gin Lane and Beer Alley are only too true portrayals of the social condition of his time. In 1736 the Gin Act had been passed, and here is ample proof that increased facilities lead to increased drinking. It is recorded, "gin drinking was a new agent of evil like a visitation of a plague." In the House of Lords the Bishop of Oxford spoke on the subject, saying: "Almost at every street we had two or three gin shops filled with such company as no sober man could view without horror; and (he adds) they tell me every one of these gin shops had a back shop or cellar strewed every morning with fresh straw, where those that got drunk were thrown." Another relates (Parliamentary History) how it was not uncommon for a gin seller to announce on his sign-board that his customers might be made "drunk for a 1d., dead drunk for 2d., and clean straw for nothing." Then came in 1751 the Tipplers' Act, by which the excise duty was raised, and it was decreed that neither brewers nor distillers should interfere with licences nor act as justices in the granting thereof. This Act, be it observed, was on the side of restricting the trade on account of the awful conditions which had arisen from its almost unlimited power.

In 1757 an event occurred which points the moral that a discontinuance or diminution of the use of intoxicants conduces to improved moral and industrial conditions. Owing to a scarcity of corn the distillers were prohibited from using grain for the making of low wines and spirits, and Smollett states that, as a result of this law, "the commonalty appeared more sober, healthy, and industrious." Bristol, Liverpool, and Bath sent petitions to Parliament praying for the law to continue. The only thing which suffered was the amount of revenue derived from the spirit, but which, says Smollett, "at all times ought to be sacrificed to the health and morals of the people."

Our present system of granting licences dates from 1828, when 21 previous Acts were all repealed; and two years later came the Beer Act. By this Act it was hoped that the sale of spirits would be reduced. Be that as it may, drunkenness was not diminished. Fourteen days after the Act came into operation, Sydney Smith wrote: "The new Beer Bill has begun its operation. Everybody is drunk. Those who are not singing are sprawling. The sovereign people are in a beastly state." In Liverpool alone no less than 800 licences were taken out nineteen days after the Act became operative, and by the end of the same year 24,342 licences had been granted. The publicans were not slow to profit by their increased facilities. It must, then, be granted that the times were indeed ripe for the gospel of temperance. It was not given to the great nor powerful to herald its advent, but to those who were counted as fools and simple. There had been here and there in America, Scotland, and Ireland, small societies whose aims were in the direction of temperance, and which were called moderation societies; whilst so early as 1810 there existed in Manchester, in connection with the Bible Christians, a Total Abstinence Society. Any member breaking his pledge was suspended from membership, and not re-admitted until he had been tried three months.

In Skibbereen, co. Cork, also, there was a total abstinence society formed in 1817, the founder being a reformed drunken nailer. This society increased so rapidly that it was enabled to build its own meeting-house. Scotland, too, was waking up, for in 1818 Greenock possessed two societies, one for the promotion of total abstinence from spirits, the other being based upon moderation principles.

It was, however, about the year 1830 that the real organisation of temperance societies began in England. But it must be remembered that the word temperance does not at this date include total abstinence, for the early societies only pledged their members to abstinence from ardent spirits, allowing the moderate use of other liquors.

Mr. Winskill, in recounting the early days of the movement, writes:—"The subject of temperance was brought before the notice of a few friends in Liverpool by several captains of American vessels."

To Yorkshire, however, belongs the honour of establishing the first temperance organisation in England. Mr. Henry Forbes, a Bradford manufacturer, whose business often took him to Glasgow, becoming interested in the movement of that city, signed the pledge and determined to begin operations in Bradford. On February 2, 1830, the first temperance society in England was formed, 9 subscribing to the pledge, and by June the membership had reached 180. Then followed a public meeting attended by 1,800 people. The Rev. John Jackson was engaged as agent, and through his efforts many new societies were established, so that by 1834 a county association was formed, viz., the Yorkshire Temperance Society.

Lancashire, however, was not long behind, for only a few weeks after the formation of the Bradford Society one was established at Warrington, so that Yorkshire and Lancashire may claim the honour of leading the way in England.

Societies followed thick and fast; Manchester and Leeds came in 1831, and then the London Temperance Society. So that in a very few years the total membership reached 38,000. But moderation, which was hitherto the basis of these societies, was soon found to be delusive in rescuing the drunkard; and it was a Lancashire man, Jas. Teare, of Preston, who was one of the first to recognise the importance of advocating entire abstinence from all kinds of intoxicants. It was, however, slow work to convert the older societies to this new idea.

The great genius and force of the movement in its second phase was Joseph Livesey, of Preston, a self-taught man, originally a hand-loom weaver, who heartily threw himself into the cause in which he so fervently believed. By means of his organ, the "Moral Reformer," publicity was given to the subject. Preston in 1833 adopted a total abstinence—in addition to the moderation—pledge; Joseph Livesey and John King themselves signing the Total Abstinence Pledge, by which they promised to abstain from all liquors of an intoxicating quality, except as a medicine. They were joined by five others, and then began the grand work of the "Seven Men of Preston."

Amongst their various methods of reaching the people was that of house to house visitation, and Mr. Livesey, describing the condition of the handloom weavers, tells how they worked from five in the morning until ten at night, their wages averaging 6s. a week, with flour at 6d. a pound.

Public meetings were not neglected, though often enough it was difficult to persuade societies to lend halls for the purpose. Not to be beaten, however, J. Livesey hired the Preston Cockpit, capable of holding 900 people. It was at a gathering here that Dickey Turner invented the word Teetotal. Speaking in favour of total abstinence he said, "I'll have nowt to do wi' this moderation botheration pledge. I'll be reet down out and out tee te total for iver." "Well done, Dicky," exclaimed Livesey: "that shall be the name of our pledge." And so without any intoxicants whatsoever, the Teetotal Ship was launched, followed by a great wave of missionary zeal.

Reformed drunkards were encouraged to tell of the change which total abstinence brought to them and to their homes. Very original some of these speakers were. Preston could boast of its teetotal poet in Henry Anderton. Here is one of his rhymes:—

"Let it stick in thy head

What friend Pollard once said

(For a long-headed fellow he's reckoned)

Don't quaff the first pot,

And the Devil can not Compel thee to swallow the second."

David Jones, of Liverpool, in urging the advantages of total abstinence, exclaims—

"You've had enough of rags and bones

So take advice from David Jones."

During the Preston race week in 1833, Livesey, Teare, Anderton, Swindlehurst, and three others started on a missionary tour, visiting Rochdale, Blackburn, and Manchester. The following was the plan they adopted: Hiring a conveyance, the party started armed with 9,500 tracts, a bell, and a small white silk flag on which was written—"Touch not, taste not, handle not, drink not, buy not, sell not, distill not, any intoxicating liquors." On approaching a town the flag was waved, the bell was rung, and James Teare, having a loud voice, acted as crier and announced the meetings, which from whatever motive were attended by crowds.

We may easily imagine, however, that Total Abstinence would be much less likely to attract than the principle of moderation, and it was often difficult to induce existing societies to adopt the new pledge. It was much easier to find high patronage for moderation:—Already the latter counted among its members three Bishops and a noble lord.

The Durham and Northumberland societies received an impetus from J. Livesey—his famous "Malt Lecture" attracting large audiences. We must not suppose that these were always festive and altogether enjoyable occasions. The journey itself was no small undertaking, for we must remember that travelling in 1835 was very different from that of to-day; but that was not all, the people were not anxious to be told how they might maintain life and health without alcohol; for 70 years ago this had in some measure to be proved. Besides this the trade would be endangered. So it was to the interest of the publicans to encourage a very active resistance to these

Seven Men of Preston. Mr. Whitaker describes one of these meetings at Lancaster. As Mr. Livesey's lecture began, he says: "A Man's leg came through the ceiling over the pit, and down tumbled the plaster. Presently an old paint pot was suspended through the hole, and paint dropped from it on to the people below. A dusty, stuffed imitation fish was hurled at the chairman's head. The gas was turned off, then they had imitation thunder and lightning."

If Lancashire gave us J. Livesey, Yorkshire may proudly boast of another temperance hero, viz., Dr. F. R. Lees. His introduction to the public was somewhat unique. In connection with the Leeds Society a public debate was arranged in the Music Hall, in order to decide between the merits of moderation and total abstinence. The advocate for the moderation pledge was Dr. Williamson, who made an excellent address. When the moment came for the reply, the courage of Mr. Edward Johnson, who had undertaken the duty, failed him. To the publicans and their friends this was a glorious victory! It was, however, but a short-lived victory. A young man of 21, sitting in the orchestra, was espied by his teetotal friends, who literally dragged him to the platform and forced him to undertake the duty of refuting Dr. Williamson's arguments. This young man was Frederick Richard Lees, afterwards Dr. Lees. The laugh was now reversed, for the publicans acknowledged themselves to be beaten. The scientific works of Dr. Lees on the drink question have been of immense value to the temperance movement, and his name is honoured as that of a champion of the cause to which he so strenuously devoted himself.

Hitherto, the chief method adopted by the early Reformers was that of Moral Suasion. They aimed at showing the people that it was not only possible to maintain life and health without alcohol, but that they could live healthier and happier lives without it.

Whilst moral suasion was the great lever in the reform, legislation was not overlooked. In 1834, Liverpool was persuaded to adopt a bye-law prohibiting the opening of public houses after 1 o'clock on Sundays. This resulted in a great reduction in the number of prisoners who came up for trial on Mondays.

Nor was the subject a stranger in the House of Commons. In 1834 James Silk Buckingham, M.P. for Sheffield, was instrumental in securing the appointment of a Select Committee of the House of Commons to inquire into the extent, causes, and consequences of the prevailing vice of intoxication amongst the labouring classes, with a view to preventing the further spread of the national evil. The temperance friends, either from nervousness or over-cautiousness, suggested postponing the inquiry, but Mr. Buckingham was firm. He went down to the House expecting defeat. On rising he was met by titters of laughter. He moved his resolution, which was seconded by the member for the West Riding of Yorkshire, Sir George Strickland, and was supported by the Quaker member, Joseph Pease of Darlington, and Mr. (later Sir) Ed. Baines of Leeds. The resolution was carried by a majority of 32. This was indeed a good augury for Parliamentary effort.

If it be asked what part the churches played during these early days, the answer could not be altogether satisfactory, for amongst many of the religious societies the movement was looked upon coldly and with an air of suspicion. Not a few of the clergy and ministers forbade the use of church buildings for temperance meetings, some, indeed, going out of their way to denounce the cause. Nevertheless, there were amongst the various denominations a number of ministers whose support and approval were most valuable and helpful. At Manchester, in 1848, a conference of ministers was held, attended amongst others by 7 clergymen, 47 Congregationalists, 33 Baptists, 7 Wesleyan Methodists, 6 Unitarians (including Revs. Henry Solly, Franklin Howorth, Francis Bishop, and Philip Pearsall Carpenter). Mr. Winskill writes:—"One of the results of this conference was the signing of a ministerial temperance declaration by 583 ministers." These included 14 Unitarians. In connection with many churches at this time revenue was not infrequently derived from property let as public-houses, whilst there were not a few churches whose underground premises were let as spirit vaults or wine stores, and Mr. Winskill speaks in terms of high praise of the faithfulness and highmindedness of Rev. Russell Lant Carpenter, and quotes the following from the Scotsman, 1849:—"The Rev. R. L. Carpenter, of Bridgwater, late minister of the Unitarian congregation there, has ceased to hold that office, because he could not conscientiously, as an advocate of temperance, receive as a portion of his salary the rent of certain beer shops." Two months later the INQUIRER reports the following resolution passed by the Bridgwater congregation:—"That in the opinion of this meeting, it is undesirable for a Christian congregation to derive any portion of its income from the rent of beer houses." It is needless to add the beer sellers had notice to quit.

It is a matter of deep regret that even in 1906 church revenue is obtained from public-houses. A northern town has this undesirable notoriety. According to a newspaper report, "A public-house reported for compensation by the ——— magistrates, belongs to the vicar and churchwardens, and is leased to a firm of brewers for £50 a year, which is devoted to parochial purposes, so that in that parish the more drunkenness the better will be the funds for church work!"

A delightful feature of these days was the strictly unsectarian platform—creed or no creed, it mattered not—men and women of whatsoever church or of no church, of whatsoever political opinions, all were welcome missionaries. Whilst to-day the churches offer no active resistance to temperance, but on the other hand look upon it with favour, there has been now and again a tendency to sectarianise and thus to narrow the work, sectarian zeal sometimes overshadowing the real object of temperance. But that the churches are more alive to their duty and responsibility in this matter must be a cause for thankfulness.

We must, however, leave the story of these early struggles of the temperance pioneers, men who were inspired like the prophets of old, men filled with the spirit of religion, who thus proved their belief in the brotherhood of man.

We have in this brief survey only been enabled to give a passing glance to the beginnings of the movement. Time will not permit us to trace it up to the present, to remind you of the works of even the more prominent apostles of temperance: of Father Mathew in Ireland, of his great power in influencing for good his fellow countrymen; of J. B. Gough, the great orator, whose first lecture in England, in 1853, was delivered to 3,000 people in Exeter Hall, and of a host of helpers and temperance agencies throughout the kingdom.

In looking back to these early temperance efforts, and comparing the position of the movement with that of to-day, one cannot but be struck by the enormous strides which have been made, and by the innumerable organisations—every town and village having its temperance society and Band of Hope. Compare the hostility of the churches in the early days with the activity we see to-day! We have the Church of England Temperance Society with its 6,826 branches; the Wesleyan Church, with 107,148 adult temperance members, and 437,454 juveniles, whilst a large majority of Baptist and Congregational ministers and theological students are avowed teetotalers. And amongst all churches there is a readiness to devote one Sunday in the year, at least, to the advocacy of temperance. We have, too, the important and powerful women's temperance organisations, with over 1,100 branches.

There is to-day an increasing number of sectional temperance societies, such as the Army and the Navy Temperance Societies, The Commercial Travellers' Temperance Society, The Railway Temperance Union, with nearly 22,000 members; whilst among the young the Band of Hope Union counts no less than 3,000,000 members.

Science, too, is on our side—indeed it is from the findings of science that temperance has been placed on a sure and sound footing. What the old temperance reformers discovered by sheer common-sense, by reason, and by intuition, verified by experience, scientific research has been able to demonstrate. The old reformers preached the doctrine that alcohol was not necessary to life, nor even to health; and, realising the fact that much of the misery and poverty were due to the drink evil, they advocated total abstinence.

Thanks to Sir Benjamin Ward Richardson and many others who laboured long and patiently, experimenting and testing—the foundations of temperance are now strengthened and established on the rock of Science, before which old errors built on the sandy foundations of habit and custom must eventually yield.

For instance, we now know that alcohol is not a food, that it is a narcotic poison, that even in small quantities, as Sir Victor Horsley points out, the results are the same in kind as in large quantities. At a meeting of the Medical Institute of Birmingham, in 1904, Sir V. Horsley, referring to the numerous inquiries by patients as to the desirability of taking alcohol, gave it as his opinion that doctors should answer "No, it is not wise. If you take it, you must understand that you take it as a luxury."

Professor Simms Woodhead, of Cambridge, describes alcohol thus:—"It is a powerful narcotic poison of the worst kind, a deadener of sensation, and a depressant of function."

And so, whilst in every department of life there has been a growing sentiment in favour of temperance, nowhere has that growth been more remarkable than in the medical profession. In the early days of the movement, a teetotal doctor was an anomaly scarcely to be tolerated, whilst to-day the British Medical Temperance Association has hundreds of adherents.

The splendid success of the London Temperance Hospital is but one testimony to the growth of temperance opinion both amongst medical men and patients.

Amongst our public bodies and officials—councillor, magistrate, member of Parliament, judge—all claim to be (if not actually total abstainers) more or less interested and in favour of temperance reform.

Politically we have many schemes which find favour amongst various sections and parties. Sunday closing, local veto, municipalisation of the drink trade, non-employment of bar-maids—all aiming at the curtailment of the traffic, and the removal of some of the temptations to drinking.

Often enough, the temperance party holds the balance between rival candidates. The question is generally asked at an election "How is the temperance vote going?" and happy is the candidate who secures that support.

And to-day, by the addition of labour members to our new Parliament, there is every hope that temperance reform will receive such an added impetus that no obstacles will be found strong enough to delay or obstruct its progress.

In 1896 an event occurred which marked an epoch in the development of temperance opinion. That event was the Royal Commission on the Licensing Laws. It was constituted in equal proportions of (1) Temperance men; (2) Representatives of the brewers, and (3) Those who were described as impartial—attached to neither one side nor the other, with Lord Peel as chairman. Evidence was taken over a period of three years, and the remarkable and important result of that Commission was the unanimous conclusion that drink was the cause of much of the preventable misery and degradation of our land. So strong was the opinion of the commissioners that they declared drink to be "a gigantic evil, to remove which, hardly any sacrifice would be too great." Amongst the many suggestions the Commission advised an immediate and large reduction of public houses.

One more striking testimony on the side of temperance comes from the Committee appointed by the late President of the Privy Council (the Duke of Devonshire) to inquire into the question of physical degeneration. This committee—be it remembered, was not appointed in the interests of temperance. Some alarm was being raised by the fact that a seriously large number of the men desiring to ente military service were physically unfit. The report, whilst giving due weight to the evils of over-crowding, pollution of the atmosphere, and the conditions of employment, emphasises the mischief caused by "drink."

A special point was made of the injury to the race caused by drink amongst women. In the words of Mr. Eccles, one of the witnesses, "If the mother as well as the father is given to drink, the progeny will deteriorate in every way, and the future of the race is imperilled."

Had nothing more been gained but the evidence elicited from these witnesses, the report must be regarded as valuable. But the report goes further—it makes suggestions which are decidedly in favour of, and on behalf of temperance.

Not only does it urge the teaching of temperance and hygiene in relation to alcohol to school children, but also suggests that adults should be enlightened on the question by literature showing the dangers and evils arising from the use of alcohol.

In connection with this question of temperance teaching in our public schools, a most remarkable appeal was recently issued by the British Medical Association in favour of such teaching, to which in the course of a few days, 15,000 medical men signified their approval.

So, whether from a scientific or moral point of view, or from the point of economics, the trend of opinion is all on the side of temperance. Indeed, we are surrounded by an atmosphere of temperance.

Everybody believes in it nowadays, more or less. Even the publican poses as a friend of temperance, and is willing to sacrifice (?) an unremunerative licence, if so be he may obtain one in exchange which will pay him better!

And yet where are we to-day? In spite of 11,000,000 teetotalers, our drink bill in 1905 was £164,000,000 or £3 15s. 11½d. per head, allowing five to a family, £18 19s. 9½d. per family. To our shame, be it remembered, we spend more per head on drink than the United States or Germany. Our drink bill, as the Rt. Hon. John Burns has pointed out, is our heaviest item of Imperial expenditure. Imagine £14,000,000 on Education, and £164,000,000 on Drink. Think what an impetus trade would receive if this 164 millions were diverted into other channels, for from a wage-earning point of view, The Trade, as it arrogantly calls itself, yields very much less in proportion to the wage-earner than do ordinary trades and manufactures.

And yet this trade has so entrenched itself, spreading its roots and feeders in every direction, with unlimited wealth and influence at its back, that sometimes it seems hopeless to cope with it.

The brewers have been far-seeing enough to enhance their power enormously by turning their concerns into brewery companies, with shareholders large and small, from all sections of society—clergy, women, nobles; indeed, all sorts and conditions of people. This has helped to rivet the terrible chain still more firmly.

In these days we hear of many remedies for social ills—many of them much-needed reforms, and entirely worthy of help and sympathy. Is it not, however, true that by dealing with the drink traffic we should be striking at the root of many present-day troubles? and once destroy the root—the branches would speedily wither away. If the drink question were settled, in what town, for instance, would there be the need for a society for the prevention of cruelty to children, the necessity for which is a disgrace to modern civilisation?

Yet, not even the most enthusiastic temperance reformer supposes that total abstinence is a panacea for all our social ills; but he does believe that most of them would be lessened, whilst some would even disappear—for, in the words of Cobden, "Temperance reform lies at the root of all other reforms."

And so, whilst we must ever be thankful for the grand work which has been accomplished by a band of noble men and women, our truest gratitude will be shown by realising that to us comes the call to labour on, and thus to hasten the dawn of a better and brighter day. Though some of the outposts have been captured, the citadel is yet unconquered, and there is work for every soldier and patriot. This army has various battalions, one going to one part of the field and one to another.

The efforts to-day seem to divide themselves into legislative and educational. Under the former, the Licensing Act of the late Government will have to be altered. So long as the present system of licensing continues, the magistrates must be at liberty to refuse as well as to grant licences. Hitherto we have not been swamped by teetotal magistrates! Then, too, the people must have some say in the matter; localities must be able to express their opinion as to whether they desire public houses or not in their midst. Elections may have to be fought on the temperance question, for until a Government is returned willing to sacrifice £37½ millions derived from drink, there is small hope that the question will be effectually dealt with by legislation. Johnson's words might be applied here:—"Let the English Government perish rather than be maintained by iniquity."

Educationally, there is a wide field yet before us. Our hope lies with the young, and there is now every prospect that temperance teaching may have a chance of being given in our elementary schools. Until this forms part of the curriculum, it cannot be thoroughly effective. Yet before this can succeed the training colleges and teaching centres ought to give systematic training on the subject to prospective teachers and candidates.

The suggestion of the Physical Degeneration Committee of posting placards in our towns showing the evils arising from the use of alcohol has by a few towns already been acted upon, and the scheme should commend itself to all progressive boroughs.

And to the churches of all sections, and especially to those which glory in their simple dedication to "Worship of God, and service of man" comes the call. If the churches were but in earnest in the matter, no Government would long be deaf to their voice. Indeed, the battle-cry is to us all:—

"Come, labour on:

The enemy is watching, night and day,
To sow the tares, to snatch the seed away;

While we in sleep our duty have forgot
He slumbereth not."

IN JERUSALEM.

SINCE I wrote on that warm, sunny afternoon on the blue Ionian Sea many a memorable scene has come before us—Athens, approached on a day of glorious effulgence; Smyrna, twice visited, each time to our delight and wonder; Constantinople, most beautiful of cities seen from the water; Rhodes, Beyrout, Jaffa, each with its own special noteworthiness. Indeed, to tell our travellers' tales might well take almost as long as the journey hither. Of Athens alone many a page could be written of things seen, thoughts, memories, and longings that will make those crowded hours for ever memorable—hours, almost minutes individualised by intensest emotions from the moment when we made out the gleaming Acropolis, with Lycabettus behind, Pentelicus farther away, and Hymettus on our right, to that in which we stood looking from the Acropolis itself, through the arch of Propylæa, at the sunset that glowed over the waters of Salamis. Then the curtain of evening fell, but not before we clasped hands on Mars Hill.

Great days have followed that great day, but no mention can be made of them here. We come to one at last when we came (by train!) across the plain of Sharon, wide and green, up the winding Vale of Sorek (Samson's country), and through the deep glens of West Judea, with heights above gleaming stony white, six, eight, ten hundred feet (it seemed) above the dry water-course below, and with many a patch of sweet verdure on the lower slopes, and flowers, the first of many thousands that have since delighted us. At last, a long last, we are at Jerusalem Station. Dust, noise, struggle for a short time render us doubtful whether this can be the city we came so far to see; but our good dragoman, Michael, has got us through the din at last, and we subside into the quiet of our hotel.

This is not a diary, but only a gossip. Enough if I can convey to friends at home some of the impressions gained during our brief stay here. Brief as it is, we have visited Jericho, Jordan, and the Dead Sea (including a swim), we have looked (well pleased) at Bethlehem, and have pretty thoroughly examined this city and its environs. We have had good weather on the whole, not too hot; indeed, some rain has kept us cool and refreshed, without hindering our programme. No untoward adventure has befallen us, and our health has been excellent.

As I write the dawning sunshine floods with gold the battlemented wall of Jerusalem (within which our hotel stands), and if I were on the roof, where we have often looked around at the city and the mountains that encircle it, I should see the Tower of David (Hippicus, Phasaelis, Herod's Palace, whatever name the great pile of masonry should bear) standing up strong and defiant without, ruinous and grassgrown within. The Turkish sentinels keep watch and ward upon its crests, while day by day the many-coloured throngs of traffic and pilgrimage go to and fro beneath. So of old, I suppose, the Roman soldier looked from the Tower of Antonia upon the multitude in the Temple precincts away there to the east behind me. It was hither to this "palace" I suppose, that Jesus was brought to see Herod, if Luke's story answers to fact. Between the Prætorium at the north end of the Temple area and this point, say, three-fourths of a mile in a direct line, are the spots dedicated by tradition to the several scenes in the last tragedy which has somehow become the theme of the world's deepest thought and the fount of its dearest hopes.

I could wish on this Sunday morning to take a sponge and erase from my mental record the vast impostures—vast, shameful, pitiful—that have grown up around the Gospel story here. Yet that record must be a true one, and while the heart aches over the death of this beloved man of Nazareth (as over the sorrows of the many prophets who, before and since, have been martyred by their ignorant and fanatical followers); the heart aches even more over the poverty of poor human nature that out of a story like his has made a mummery like this. As to the genuineness of this or that grave it seems to me little better than trifling to speak. Actual old graves, dating from Herodian times, or before, or after, may doubtless be found; but to find his here is surely an impossible task. As to the church of the "Holy Sepulchre" and its allied structures, never more may my eyes look upon things so disgustingly alien to the spirit of him whom the shrine is supposed to honour. What absurdities have we not seen there, not only the clustered sites for the various incidents of the crucifixion and resurrection stories, but the tombs of Nicodemus and Joseph of Arimathea, the spot where Abraham was about to sacrifice Isaac, the place where Adam was made, and, again, the place where his skull is buried, the tomb of Melchizedek, and the centre of the earth! The emission of the fraudulent "Holy Fire" on Easter morning from the holes on each side of the "Sepulchre" structure will surely cease some day, and some merciful stroke of Providence will sweep away the whole hideous, tawdry, and melancholy business into oblivion. It begs by the wayside of Christianity like the unhappy leprous mendicants that clamour for "backsheesh" wherever the pilgrim goes. It and they would be better cleansed. No doubt there would be noise if right measures were proposed to be taken with this heap of rubbish and offence. We went down from the seat where Queen Helena sat and saw the finding of the "true cross," into the chamber below where the "true cross" was found. A dirty man begged for money below, a corresponding female begged above. Of course, they begged in vain so far as we were concerned, and as our steps retreated they entered into a shouting dialogue, obviously question and answer as to each one's luck; the oburgations that followed us needed no interpreter.

After two visits to this truly awful scene we had the refreshing interval of that visit to Jericho. How sweet and lovely from a distance was the belt of verdure around the scattered hovels and the few hotels that make up the modern place of that name! One could imagine the avidity with which the sons of Israel, new come from the sandy desert, would feast their eyes on a scene so fair and full of promise. True, as they faced west the wall of mountain, the wilderness of Judea confronted them beyond this fertile belt; but here, here at last, was the land of promise! We also learned much from our journey across the wastes leading to the bitter Dead Sea; but all we see is a new lesson or an old one made more telling. Scenes on the road, in the fields and streets people afresh the stories of the Bible; and over all, over us as over the Psalmist, is this eternal blue, with majestic clouds now and again and stars that flash through the clear midnight air. What changes have been here below, in this city of more than three thousand years' history! No change is there above, and our eyes turn to the infinite Mystery in silence, but still in trust.

MARTINEAU'S FIRST "CALL."

This is the anniversary of James Martineau's birthday. There will be some who will turn in thought to-day to the story of his life and work. It would seem an opportune time then to recount the circumstances of the first definite invitation extended to Martineau to settle with a congregation as minister. It may also be of interest to publish his letter in reply which has happily escaped destruction.

While learning the business of an engineer in the machine works of Mr. Fox, at Derby, Martineau lived in the pleasant household of Edward Higginson, the Unitarian minister, and there found congenial society. When he passed on to Manchester College, at York, in 1822, with a new purpose, and the determination to prepare for the ministry, he did not forget his friends at Derby. Helen Higginson, one of the minister's daughters, had made a deep impression upon his heart. Love, then as ever, found means of communication. When he came of age, in 1826, the engagement was openly acknowledged. It was a busy year, and a year of mingled sorrow and joy for Martineau. His father died at midsummer in that year, and the business anxieties of the old home must have cast some measure of shadow upon his mind. The missionary work in the villages about York, in which he engaged with ardour, had put a strain upon his powers. What wonder that he hastened to Derby and the society of his betrothed, when the vacation came. Now it so happened that the pulpits of the Loughborough and Mount Sorrell congregations were vacant. The ministry of the Rev. William Parkinson in that society ended in 1826. It was an easy journey from Derby, and Martineau secured an engagement to supply. The Loughborough Wardens' Account Book has the entry under the date, August 19, 1826.

"Paid Mr. Martineau for supply and expenses to Mount Sorrell, £1 10s. 10¹/₂d."

There was a meeting house at Mount Sorrell, and service was held there as well as at the Loughborough chapel. The Mount Sorrell building is now in the hands of Baptists. The Unitarians allowed them the use of the place for some time, and subsequently made over the building and land to them for a nominal payment of £10! The "tenpence halfpenny" was probably the coach fare to Mount Sorrell.

The young preacher must have left a favourable impression behind, for a few weeks later when Edward Higginson, his fellow student, a brother of his betrothed, was over at Loughborough, he was commissioned to carry back to Derby an invitation for him to settle there. Helen Higginson reports this on September 13. Martineau was away from Derby at the time as his reply makes clear. Here it is:—

DERBY, Sept. 18, 1826.

MY DEAR SIR,—I should deem myself guilty of disrespect in leaving your letter so long unanswered, had not my absence from Derby, which terminated only yesterday, been the sole cause of the delay. That I was at once gratified and surprised at such a result of my brief and imperfect acquaintance with your religious societies, it is pardonable in me to acknowledge, and justice to you to avow. But you will, I doubt not, be able to appreciate without explanation many reasons which forbid my entering, so long before the expiration of my term of study, into such a pastoral connection as that which has thus been proposed for my acceptance; and I must, therefore, decline the invitation with which I have been honoured by the congregations assembling at Loughborough and Mount Sorrell. An offer, however, which it is an honour to receive, it is matter of regret to refuse; and I may be pardoned for assuring you that it is with feelings of great interest that I take leave of your societies—that the kindness of many of their members and the public attention of all, have left on my mind an impression which will not soon be effaced, of regard for your individual welfare, and of interest in the prosperity of your Christian churches. With a sincere wish for your speedy settlement with a pastor whose ministrations among you may be directed by greater ability, and accompanied with more success than you could have rationally anticipated from my inexperienced labours.—I remain, Dear Sir, Yours very respectfully,

JAMES MARTINEAU.

It is not clear whether the united congregations were fully aware that Martineau had another year to spend at College. He had a roundabout journey at the end of the month from Derby to supply at Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and thence he went on by coach to York for the session 1826–1827.

An entry amongst the scanty records of Loughborough Chapel runs:—

"Mr. Holland came to be minister December 24, 1826. What he receives from the fund to be made up to him £100 per annum."

This was the Rev. Thomas Crompton Holland, who remained till 1857. The fund was the Lady Hewley Fund now lost to the Unitarians, and administered by members of the Presbyterian Church of England, and other orthodox dissenters.

MANCHESTER DISTRICT SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

It was peculiarly fitting that the Association should hold its Annual Meetings this year at Rochdale. For twenty years the Rev. T. P. Spedding has been minister at Rochdale, and for the past two years he has been President of the Association. As minister, Mr. Spedding welcomed the Association, and as President he responded, thus giving a homely touch to the proceedings. Both as minister and as president he might well be proud of the gatherings. Favoured with beautiful weather delegates gathered from near and far. The church was crowded at the service while the extensive schools were taxed to their utmost capacity to provide accommodation for the serving of meals. Over 500 delegates sat down to luncheon, and this number was considerably increased at tea time. To serve this large party, and generally direct the proceedings of the day, required the services of a little army of 190 workers, all young men and women recruited from Mr. Spedding's congregation and school. This was the sixty-first annual meeting of the Association, and never, perhaps, in the long series were the meetings better attended or more successful.

This again was fitting, for the Association had come to submit one of the best reports of work accomplished it has ever had to present. And not only had it a good record of work, but also an almost unique balance sheet.

The Association has three separate accounts, and there were large favourable balances in each. The general account is £178 to the good; the Holiday Home, £154; and the Seaside Home, £45, in addition to £530 set aside for the extension of the latter. Thus, the financial position of the Association is an exceedingly strong one. This is due to the wise policy of making each department as far as possible, self-supporting, as well as to the wide-spread support of the association by its affiliated schools and private friends. The affiliated schools number 78, and of these 68 had made returns. In these schools there are over 14,000 scholars on the books, more than one-third of whom are over 16 years of age, while the teachers number over 1,400. These schools are organised under six local associations, which promote regular conferences, joint services, musical festivals, &c., reporting to the Manchester Association, and looking to it for those other services which can best be rendered by a larger body. Of these, two prominent features are the Convalescent and Holiday Homes. Nearly 1,300 scholars and teachers have visited these homes, in search of health or recreation, for periods of one or two weeks. Both the Homes have worked with great smoothness and satisfaction, but for the new season certain changes are suggested in order to give preference to younger children during the busy holiday season. The publications of the Association have been as successful as ever, about 8,000 copies of our issue of Hymns and Choral Songs having been sold, in addition to large numbers of Tune Books, &c. There has been great activity in the temperance department. At the annual festival there was a choir of over 200, and a large attendance of friends. Speakers have been sent to many Bands of Hope, and large additions made to the temperance lantern slides. Winter lectures, Sunday afternoon addresses, official visits have again been offered to all the schools, and very largely availed of. Beside all this many conferences and discussions have been held on the work of the schools, and the Association hopes soon to perfect certain schemes of systematic and Bible instruction, which it has under consideration.

The gatherings on Good Friday commenced with a religious service conducted by the Rev. J. C. Street. An excellent local choir rendered some good music, and Mr. R. Barlow officiated at the organ. Mr. Street spoke of the great impression made on him forty-six years ago, when he first came north, by this "great unchanging festival." He was then fresh from the Midlands and he had never seen such gatherings. Returning now in the evening of his life, he was glad to find the festival as youthful and delightful as ever. In the interval great changes had taken place in regard to the care for the young. But the Sunday School still held its place in the affections of young and old, and he regarded it as the most beneficent influence of the century. In earnest terms the preacher counselled his audience to have regard to the fact that the future would make great demands upon them. They would have to deal with an alert and cultivated youth. If they would be equal to the task they must add to the old devotion and self-consecration a still more earnest self-preparation. Then they would find that what might seem to be a great problem, would become a great and glorious opportunity.

The business meeting which assembled after lunch was not without its touch of sadness. First, the delegates were asked to rise in their places in regard for the memory of a fellow worker, who had just passed away. Mr. Thomas Parry had been a member of the committee for thirty years, and in 1890 he was president of the association. He was a regular and honoured attendant at the meetings. Next the meeting sent a vote of affectionate regard to the Rev. John Moore who after sixteen years of devoted service, as one of the hon. secretaries, is retiring on account of ill health.

After this, and in spite of the agenda, the meeting insisted upon passing a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. D. A. Little who, for more than eighteen years, has served the association as its general hon. secretary. The formal business was then soon carried through, and interesting addresses were given by the representatives from kindred Associations, viz., Mr. H. Dyson (Midlands), Rev. W. Lindsay (North Midlands), Rev. F. Allen (London and South Eastern), Rev. J. M. Mills (Liverpool), and Rev. Charles Hargrove (Sunday School Association).

EDUCATION AND SOCIAL REFORM.

Mr. HARGROVE said the country was on the eve of a campaign which had for its object the securing of the souls of the children for a particular faith. It would be as sore a battle this time as it had ever been, for it was one between persons' convictions. They desired that the children should grow up with their minds free of all those doctrines which other denominations inculcated, and which Unitarians, with all respect to them and their convictions, believed to be false and hurtful. Unitarians asked for no admittance into the schools supported by the nation for the purpose of teaching a distinctively Unitarian doctrine. They knew quite well that they had no right to go to Church-people, Roman Catholics, Jews, or secularists, and say, "You must pay in order that we may have our children taught doctrines that you disbelieve in." They respected all honest creeds, but they objected to having those creeds which they did not believe in taught at their expense. Unitarians could provide for their young people a training which experience had proved made them healthy, manly, and womanly citizens.

The burning question of education having thus been introduced, the President submitted a resolution which had been sent up to him congratulating the Government on the introduction of their Bill. His speech, however, was far from congratulatory, and he declared that the more the Bill was examined the less satisfactory it was found to be. Mr. Wigley, on the other hand, heartily supported the Bill, which the Rev. C. Peach proceeded to characterise as more reactionary than Mr. Balfour's Bill of 1902. The Bill, he said, left the old authority unreformed, with its co-opted and clerically nominated element; it admitted of the indefinite expansion of the sectarian schools, and while conceding to the Roman Catholics everything that Mr. Balfour allowed it, went beyond him in undertaking at the public charge the maintenance of the buildings used for sectarian purposes. The Rev. J. Harrison agreed with this view, while the Rev. J. W. Bishop spoke in favour of the Bill. Upon a vote being taken the meeting declined, by an overwhelming majority, to congratulate the Government upon the introduction of a Bill which it clearly did not approve.

After a short adjournment for tea, a great gathering of about 1,000 persons was held in the Provident Hall. Mr. W. W. Hadley presided, and in introducing the speaker for the evening he said he could not understand a Sunday School teacher who was not interested in social reform, the supporters of which had great cause for rejoicing in these days.

The Rev. W. HOLMSHAW, who had been appointed to speak on the Relation of the Sunday School to Social Reform, then read an earnest and able plea for the due consideration of such questions in our schools.

Sunday Schools, he said, could help this cause of social reform by endeavouring to develop a social conscience and enthusiasm in the young. For this work the Sunday Schools afforded great scope. There, among the elder scholars, they might discuss with advantage to teacher and taught, the problem of poverty; the housing question, and the efforts made to solve it by Mr. Cadbury, at Bournville, and by the Garden City movement. That subject provided scope for consideration of the land question, and all that it involved. Then there was unemployment. In this connection the teacher might discourse on the relation between capital and labour, and the distribution of wealth. He might approach the subject from the side of co-operation, labour co-partnership, and profit-sharing. He could point out that co-operation meant the association of workpeople for the management of their own industrial interests, and the equitable distribution of profits amongst those who earned them. He could enlarge on the fact that under modern industrial conditions, as a whole, machinery had taken the first place, and men and women the second; and state that this was reversing the true order of things. In like manner other questions which affected the elevation of the life and the promotion of the well-being of the people might be handled. Education and the drink traffic were both profoundly important problems.

The Rev. C. PEACH, who opened the discussion, said, if they were going to attempt the discussion of these problems in the schools, it was no use trying to satisfy the young men of to-day with mere platitudes about the brotherhood of man and the love of God. The teachers should know what they were talking about. They should understand, for instance, what trade unionism stood for, why it was vital to the workers—not merely that there should be collective bargaining to make the workman as strong as his employer, but because it pointed the way to an ultimate social organisation which meant order and harmony in the community. It was far better that a youth should have a hobby than a vice; better that he should be a heretic on some social questions than have a heart that was cold and indifferent to poverty and suffering, and live a life of over self-indulgence.

The Rev. H. B. SMITH, of Mottram, remarked that he was told that half the original founders of the Pioneers' Co-operative Society were members of the Unitarian Church, which was known as the "Store" Chapel.

The Revs. J. B. Higham, of Wigan, C. Hargrove, and Frederic Allen also spoke, Mr. Hargrove emphasising the necessity that these Sunday School discussions should be based on correct science and fact, and that theories should be tested. Mere declamation would not do.

Various votes of thanks were passed on the motion of Mr. Broadbent and Mr. A. Dugdale, jun., and the meeting closed with hymn and Benediction.

LIVERPOOL DOMESTIC MISSION.

THE annual meeting of the subscribers and friends was held at the Mission, Mill-street, on Wednesday, April 11. Though the attendance was scarcely as large as sometimes, it was a hearty, sympathetic meeting, and the speeches of the evening, especially, perhaps, that of the chairman, were well calculated to sustain the high tradition which has gathered around the annual meeting of this institution, meetings which, in the bygone years, have been thrilled by the inspiring utterances of Martineau, Thom. Beard, Armstrong, and many others, now, alas! no longer with us.

The committee's annual report was read by the hon. secretary, Mr. HAROLD COVENTRY. It contained no new thing with regard to the general working of the Mission, but drew special attention to the unsatisfactory financial position of the Mission, an increase of at least £200 per year in subscriptions being urgently required. A special effort is to be made to gain new subscribers and put the finances on a satisfactory footing.

The financial statement was presented by the deputy treasurer, Mr. FORWOOD HEYN, and the president, Mr. TOM R. COOK, who occupied the chair, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, delivered a most interesting address on the past work, the aims and ideals of the Mission. Mr. WALTER HOLLAND, the treasurer, who has held that position for more than twenty years, took occasion, in seconding the resolution, to accentuate the committee's financial appeal. He had succeeded in almost liquidating the debit balance by the generous aid of some twenty friends, two donations of £100 each and other smaller ones making up a total of about £600.

The Rev. CHARLES CRADDOCK, of the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, moved a vote of appreciation and sympathy with the missionaries and the many voluntary workers, and in the course of his remarks contrasted the life of town and country, bringing to bear his past experience of rural life in Devonshire. He suggested that there was even more work for the missionary in country than in urban districts.

Mr. PHILIP HOLT, in seconding the resolution, emphasised the large part that the drink problem played in the work which their missionaries had to face. He rejoiced in the new hope engendered by the advent of a sympathetic Government, and in the signs of the awakening of the local licensing Bench to a deeper sense of their responsibilities. In supporting the resolution, Mr. HAROLD ARMSTRONG suggested that the best training an embryo politician could have would be an apprenticeship to the work carried on by Mr. Lloyd Jones and Mrs. Anderton.

The resolution was carried with great heartiness, and was suitably acknowledged by the two Missionaries. The committee's report had contained a congratulatory allusion to the recent marriage of Mr. Lloyd Jones. Similar references had been made by subsequent speakers, the hope being expressed that Mr. Lloyd Jones would be enabled to carry on his work with even greater success than hitherto; and in acknowledging the resolution mentioned above, Mr. LLOYD JONES expressed his deep sense of the very great and special kindness which had been extended to him and Mrs. Lloyd Jones on this occasion.

Mr. ARTHUR THEW, of Birkdale, moved the re-election of the committee, which was seconded by Miss BOWRING, and carried.

A vote of thanks to the chairman, on the motion of the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, seconded by Mr. RICHARD D. HOLT, J.P., was heartily accorded, and thus brought the meeting to a close.

It is mind, after all, which does the work of the world, so that the more there is of mind, the more work will be accomplished.—Channing.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Atherton.—On Easter Sunday the minister of Chowbent Chapel, Rev. J. J. Wright, welcomed twenty-six young people of the Sunday-school into membership of the congregation.

Burnley.—The anniversary services in connection with the Burnley-lane Unitarian Mission were held on Sunday, April 8. In the morning Mr. J. W. Hird, of Colne, preached; in the afternoon and evening the Rev. J. M. Whiteman. There was a very good attendance, and the collections amounted to £3 11s.

Manchester: Moss Side.—On Sunday, April 8, 1906, the Rev. A. Cunliffe Fox, B.A., commenced his ministry, and preached both morning and evening to large congregations. On the following Monday a soiree was held in the schoolroom, when a large number of the members of the Church and congregation met to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Fox. The Chairman, Mr. J. H. Pimley, said: "To-night we are assembled together to give to our new minister, Mr. Fox, and his wife a hearty welcome to Moss Side. When I look back upon the twenty years' history of this church, and consider how it has been built up, step by step, I cannot but think that you, Mr. Fox, are extremely fortunate in taking up and continuing the work of our late minister, Mr. Roper—fortunate that he has pioneered the way to a successful Church, also that you start without a penny of debt upon any branch of the church." The officers of various institutions extended a hearty welcome: Mrs. John Wood, on behalf of the Ladies' Sewing Society and the Young Women's Social Union; Mr. Wrigley, on behalf of the Sunday-school; and Mr. Hewkin, the Literary and Debating Society. Mr. J. Tyson (one of the founders), and Mr. Wm. Taylor (Treasurer), also spoke. Mr. Fox said that he wanted to make it perfectly clear that he was a Unitarian, and he was glad to see that they had not washed that name from their notice board. He understood Unitarianism to mean a religion of life, truth and high endeavour, and he counted it a privilege as their minister to be able to preach these truths not only to them, but he hoped through them to the people of this great city.

North-East Lancs. Sunday-school Union.—The third annual United Musical Festival was held in Nazareth Chapel, Newchurch, on Saturday afternoon, March 31. Fine weather favoured the festival, so that a large number of friends gathered together from the nine affiliated schools. The choir of about 130 voices was under the leadership of Mr. Thos. Marsden, and gave an excellent rendering of the several items on the programme. Special hymns were joined in heartily by the congregation, numbering about 400. The soloists were Miss Blanche Mackie (Burnley), Mrs. E. Wilkinson (Colne), Mr. L. Lucas (Padiham), and Mr. F. Sutcliffe (Newchurch). Short addresses were given by the President, Mr. J. W. Hird (Colne), Rev. T. P. Spedding (Rochdale), and Rev. J. J. Shaw (Newchurch). In the course of his remarks Mr. Hird said he looked on music and religion as twin sisters; their aim was the same, both would result in aspiration towards higher ideals. Music was one of the best gifts for humanising the mass of the people, and was therefore to be encouraged. Sunday-school teachers were in the nature of tuners, and their work amongst the children was to produce all the harmony possible. Sunday-schools were not dead, but contained far richer promise for the future. The Rev. T. P. Spedding said he desired to speak a word of encouragement and cheer from the larger association at Manchester, and went on to speak of the uplifting power of music, showing how it sometimes happened that a song would convey a message which mere words could not. Choirs would do well to remember that THEY were often the real preachers through their music, and not the man in the pulpit. The Rev. J. J. Shaw recalled the fact that these festivals were the outcome of some suggestions made by the late Mr. Thos. Kenyon, of Newchurch, and he also spoke upon the influence of music in helping the religious side of man's nature. By the courtesy of the local Wesleyan friends tea was provided in their schoolroom, as well as in the school connected with Nazareth Chapel; crowding was thus avoided. After tea a social evening was held.

Sheffield: Attercliffe.—Completing our last week's report of the Unitarian Mission Bazaar, we are glad to hear that the second day's takings amounted to £139 4s. 10d. The total receipts, including a few sums since received, amount to £338 2s. There will probably be a net result of at least £300, which is considered most satisfactory.

Wolverhampton (Farewell).—An exceedingly well-attended meeting of the congregation of the above was held on March 26, to say farewell to the Rev. J. B. and Mrs. Higham upon their removal to Park-lane, Wigan. A presentation was made to Mr. Higham of an illuminated address and a Yost typewriter, and to Mrs. Higham of a gold chain, to testify to the affection and esteem in which they were held by the congregation at Wolverhampton. The presentation was made by the chairman, Mr. Councillor Evan Evans, and there were a large number of members who spoke in support. Mr. Ald. Price Lewis, and members of the Central Labour Club, Sons of the Phoenix, and others spoke of the loss that Mr. Higham's departure would be to the town of Wolverhampton.

In Tuesday's Tribune there was an article, by Miss A. Zimmern, giving a most interesting account of what Mrs. Humphry Ward has done for the children of London as the initiator of Cripple Schools, and the encourager of Vacation Schools, the idea of which came to us from America. The letter which Mrs. Ward recently addressed to the Times on "The Play-Time of the Poor" is now separately issued in pamphlet form. (Smith, Elder & Co. 2d.)

For nothing worthy proving can be proven,
Nor yet disproven; wherefore be thou wise,
Cleave ever to the summer side of doubt,
And cling to Faith, beyond the forms of Faith.
Tennyson.

THE NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

THIS double number of THE INQUIRER completes the report of the National Conference meeting at Oxford, with all the papers given complete. There only remains Dr. HUNTER's sermon, which we must keep for next week, when we hope also to add some report of the Temperance Association, the Guilds' Union, and the Van Mission meetings.

It is twenty-four years since the Conference met for the first time in Liverpool, and three years ago it returned for its eighth triennial meeting to that city. Birmingham, Leeds, London, Manchester, Sheffield, Leicester were the intervening places of meeting, all centres of Liberal religious activity, where there are active congregations of our people. Oxford was different, and to meet there, where we have no strong church, was an experiment, but an experiment, as we said last week, fully justified by the abundant success of the meeting. The attraction of the University city was, of course, very great, and there was also Manchester College, the noblest embodiment, in outward form, of our Free Faith, with its great power for teaching and inspiration. From the first afternoon of the PRESIDENT's reception, there was no doubt that the true ring of cordiality was there, and that in point of numbers also the Conference would maintain its high tradition of helpful fellowship and kindling power. What rendered the meeting notable beyond all others was the readiness with which distinguished men of other communions took part in the proceedings. The standard of excellence, and we may say brilliance, in the papers read, was never higher, and if the discussions were not strong, partly, no doubt, from lack of time, we must yet be thankful to have secured contributions of such exceptional value as Mr. WICKSTEED's paper on "Social Amelioration," the three papers on the "Outlook of Liberal Religion," and Mr. Gow's address on the "Ideal of the Church." Of the two sermons and the business meeting we shall have more to say; and simply note here that with the wonderful outpouring of Dr. Hunter's sermon we gratefully remember the address at the Friday morning devotional service by Mr. Matthew Scott: Thursday morning brought the shadow of the dire calamity at San Francisco, and the message of sympathy at once telegraphed, in the hope of so reaching our friends: "The Conference of Liberal Churches, Oxford, mourns with you." The brave spirit in which that terrible calamity has been met has since relieved to some extent the gloom of the first impression. Courage and faith and instant overflowing sympathy are what we see in our brethren, faced by that great need; and a like spirit, we are thankful to know, found earnest utterance in our National Conference.

MARTINEAU MEMORIAL SCHOOLS.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—In your last issue you called attention to the approaching triple jubilee of the Octagon Chapel, Norwich, on May 13, and reminded your readers that at the Centenary in 1856 James Martineau was one of the preachers: "Would that this later celebration," you added, "might be made memorable by the announcement that the whole sum (£1,600) required for the Martineau Memorial had been given."

The devoted treasurer of the Norwich Fund, Mrs. Mottram, informs me that in response to this appeal Mrs. Russell Martineau offers an additional contribution of £100, if the rest of the money can be raised by May 13. Who will follow this admirable lead? The time is short, and it is impossible to organise a fresh canvass: But the facts are well known: Will those who have not contributed—and some, perhaps, of those who have—desiring to see an important enterprise worthily completed, send their promises (money need not be paid till Michaelmas next) to Mrs. F. A. Mottram, The Birches, Bracondale, Norwich?—Yours faithfully,

J. ESTLIN CARPENTER.

THE REV. W. G. TARRANT, from whom we publish another letter this week, telling of experiences in Galilee, reached home with Mr. Ion Pritchard on Tuesday evening, in excellent health, and all the better for a deeply interesting holiday. He is to preach again at Wandsworth on Sunday. We have yet another letter, which arrived before he did, to publish next week, and then we hope that he will still write for us something about Nazareth, where they stayed on their way back from Tiberias, and, finally, something of what the Sphinx said to him in Egypt.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.

NINTH TRIENNIAL MEETING AT OXFORD.

WEDNESDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

ON Wednesday morning, at 9.15, there was communion service in Manchester College Chapel, conducted by the Revs. Dr. Drummond and Ambrose Bennett, who were assisted in the distribution by the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter and J. Edwin Odgers. A large congregation took part in the service. Mr. Bennett read from the last chapter of St. Luke the account of the journey of the two disciples to Emmaus, and how Jesus "was known of them in the breaking of bread." Dr. Drummond gave the address.

At the Morning Conference, in the hall of the Municipal Buildings, the Chair was taken by Mr. Philip Meadows Martineau, and papers were read, by the Rev. Philip Wicksteed, on "Three Requisites for Social Amelioration," and by Mr. Graham Wallas on "Darwinism and Social Motive," followed by discussion. The papers are here printed in full.

After lunch, to which ministers and delegates were entertained, for the most part, in the Drill Hall, which had accommodation for over 400 guests, though another party was provided for at Manchester College, meetings of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund and of the National Unitarian Temperance Association were held. The paper by Miss Lucas, of Darlington, read at the latter meeting, was published in last week's INQUIRER.

At 4.30 the Conference resumed, Mr. W. Wallace Bruce taking the chair. The Rev. Charles Hargrove read the paper on the Churches and Social Questions, which was published in last week's INQUIRER. A report of the discussion and the resolution passed will be found in this number.

THE CONVERSAZIONE.

In the evening a very successful conversazione was held in Manchester College, at which the guests, numbering, it was estimated, over 700, were received by the Principal, Dr. Drummond, and Mrs. Drummond, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson (the Chairman of Committee) and Mrs. Dowson, and Dr. Edwin Odgers (Chairman of the Local Reception Committee). During the evening the Oxford Hungarian String Band played in the corridor, and in the quadrangle a large tent had been erected for refreshments. The only drawback was a chilly evening, but all the proceedings were of the heartiest character.

In the Library, which was crowded with guests, there was some speaking, in welcome and response, which began at 9.30.

Dr. J. EDWIN ODGERS, as chairman of the Reception Committee, first welcomed the members of the Conference, saying how greatly the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, the President of the College, regretted that he was unable to be with them, and then called on the successive speakers.

Dr. DRUMMOND, on behalf of the College, offered a most cordial welcome to the Conference, and said that their meeting in Oxford was almost like a return from the Babylonian captivity. Their fathers had been driven out from the old seats of learning by bigotry and earnest religious zeal. The zeal, he hoped, remained, but the bigotry had largely disappeared, and the College had no reason to complain of the welcome they had received at Oxford. They had always held to the ideal of University education, and their fathers had provided it, as they were at, for ministers and laity alike. Now they could come to the University without any violation of their conscience, but all the time they could claim to have been true to the great motto: Dominus illuminatio mea, and he would add, salus mea, "The Lord is my light and my salvation." Where the hearts of men were set on the central light of all, trying to follow and reach up to that true life, they were bound together in holy fellowship, and there could be no sectarian bigotry or persecution, such as had so often deformed the Christian Church. It was natural that men should see different objects illuminated by the light, or the same objects in different form and colour; but if they all followed the one true light they would escape from their own limitations and darkness, and rise into the universal Spirit that embraced the world. It was the highest vocation of that Conference to promote the recognition of that wide and universal life, and he hoped the meeting there in Oxford, where all sects came into the University, and young men exercised their thought on the great questions of religion, might help to bring nearer the kingdom of God, which was the universal aspiration of mankind. In that hope he welcomed them and trusted that the Divine blessing might rest upon their deliberations.

Dr. ODGERS then introduced two distinguished members of the University, who had kindly undertaken to join in that welcome: the Rev. R. H. Charles, D.D., Greenfield Lecturer on the Septuagint at Oxford, and Professor of Biblical Greek at Trinity College, Dublin; and Dr. J. A. H. Murray, editor of the New English Dictionary.

When I was invited to come here and offer a few words of welcome to this Conference, I naturally considered the grounds on which I could best justify my acceptance of the invitation. As I reflected, it appeared that I could do so from the standpoint of two hopes which I strongly entertain—one Academic and the other Ecclesiastical. The Academic hope which I cherish as a Professor of Trinity College, Dublin, and a member of this University, is that at no distant date Oxford and Cambridge will follow the example of Dublin and throw open their degrees of B.D. and D.D. to all comers—in other words, may make these degrees purely Academic distinctions and actual guarantees of a certain amount of Theological knowledge. It is now nearly a generation since tests in connection with these degrees were abolished in Dublin; surely there is a growing body of scholars and men of affairs who look for their abolition in the two great centres of English University life?

The other hope which I cherish is a larger one, but probably one which may appeal to a smaller circle. It is a larger hope, I repeat, and passes beyond the bounds of University life on to the Church at large, and bids me as one who has devoted twenty years of study to Judaism as it existed at the beginning of the Christian Era—bids me, I repeat, look forward to a time, when the National Church of England will in one respect—namely, its comprehensiveness—resemble the Jewish Church of that period, and become the spiritual mother of all true, spiritually-minded Englishmen. For consider how in the Temple at Jerusalem, Sadducee and Pharisee, Essene and Herodian worshipped, bound together not by uniformity of intellectual belief, but by worship of the same God amid the greatest diversity of theological opinions. But the worship in the Temple was not confined to Jews only; for our Lord and his Apostles, and even the great opponent of the law, St. Paul, worshipped with Sadducee and Pharisee. Thus the Jewish Church exhibited the widest comprehension that the world has yet witnessed; and Judaism contained Church-parties but no sects. We have become too much accustomed to think that a Church consists essentially of those who hold the same clearly defined intellectual beliefs; but this is to confound a church with a sect. The sects, therefore, and the sectaries of all churches will no doubt exclaim against the hope I put before you, as visionary and in reality impossible of realisation. But, however they may object, such a church did exist at one time, and on the roll of its members was the Founder of Christianity and every one of his Apostles without exception.

The members of the Church, therefore, who at various times have sought to make the Christian Church comprehensive, have the sanction of their Master's example and the practice of the Apostolic circle, and from this strong position they can rightly urge that the renewal of such a wide comprehensiveness is surely not impossible in these later days. Could not faithful men, who find in Christ the guide and inspiration of their religious life, however they differ in their conception of his nature and being, agree to worship God side by side, bound together in the unity of the same spirit? In such a Church no one would think of whittling down his convictions to suit his neighbours', nay, rather he would hold firmly to the truth as it was revealed to him, and whilst he could not for the sake of others relinquish any serious conviction, he would never think of claiming from others conformity with his own. And thus, while one man would give his whole-hearted belief to the very letter of the forms in which the traditional faith of the Church has expressed itself, another, no less truly a member of the Church, could give his adhesion only to the spiritual truth behind the forms. Thus might at last be realised that ideal of the Church, which according to the finest definition I know, is in the words of the Church of England Prayer-book, "the body of all faithful people."

Dr. J. A. H. MURRAY, who said he spoke as a humble layman, was no less cordial in his welcome. It was a grand thing to see such an assembly of faithful men come together in a great cause. He offered that welcome as a thorough believer in independent thought and the duty of men to discover for themselves as much truth as they could. Truth itself might be absolute, but for them it must be relative, and the measure to which they attained must depend on the truth-seekers as well as on the truth. Honest and true men in all ages had seen one part or another of the truth. They must all desire, with Dr. Charles, that all good and earnest men, seeking to know God and the light, and their duty to God and man, should help one another and believe in one another. In that spirit he welcomed them. And then Dr. Murray proceeded to speak with very pleasant humour of the great work on the New Dictionary, in which he had been engaged for more than twenty-five years.

Mr. W. B. BOWRING, President of the Conference, in acknowledging the welcome, said that they owed a deep debt of gratitude to the local committee for the admirable arrangements they had made. When they heard the Conference was to meet at Oxford, they felt it would be a great delight, and so it had been.

Professor JEAN REVILLE, as representing friends of kindred faith in other countries, and especially in France and Switzerland, also responded to the welcome. It was a privilege, he said, to come to Oxford, the great centre of old traditions and of spiritual development and progress which was ever moulding the tradition anew. He was happy to be again in that College, where free science and free faith were joined together, represented by men whom they, on the Continent, were learning ever more to esteem, and whose works were of such great value to them. He thanked them for the kindness of their reception. In such a re-union as that, in the spirit of free science and free Christianity, he saw a prophecy of what would be in the future, when beyond the limits of country and language, while each remained true to his own country, there would be a great brotherhood, and the Christian ideal would at last be realised.

THREE REQUISITES FOR SOCIAL AMELIORATION.

THOUGHT, BUSINESS FACULTY, SYMPATHY.

BY PHILIP H. WICKSTEED, M.A.

THE machinery of society is complex and imperfectly understood. Remote and unforeseen reactions often baffle our intentions; and benevolent impulses are not always safe guides towards the accomplishment of their own purposes. Hence it will readily be admitted, in the abstract, that severe and dispassionate thought is a necessary element in securing social amelioration. Whatever else is needed, we need dry light.

And yet it is extremely difficult to secure a practical recognition of this obvious and acknowledged fact. The necessity of "doing something" appears to be so urgent; and the danger is so great of allowing mere intellectual interest in a problem to introduce itself as a humble servant, and then gradually draw to itself the whole vital forces of the investigator. No sooner have we exorcised passion as disturbing to thought than we seem to be in danger of permanently substituting an intellectual interest for a desire. Our zeal is gone, and scientific curiosity alone remains. Besides, the ends to be accomplished are so obvious that it is difficult not to be impatient with nicely balanced academic discussions as to the means for accomplishing them. The wants are so crying, the sense of shame and indignation that they should still exist is so acute, that it seems a mockery to write and read books about them, instead of setting to work. When men are buried alive in a coal pit it seems a strange thing to set about studying the principles of the "angle of rest" of a heap of earth, and the strength of a "retaining wall," instead of digging. In a word, the directness of our perception of what has ultimately to be done gives an air of unreality to deliberations as to the best means of doing it.

Moreover, it is difficult to escape the feeling that the man who challenges any scheme, however crude and ill considered, which aims at alleviating manifest misery and wrong, is secretly indifferent or hostile as to the end itself, and is seeking a pretext to evade his responsibilities. There is a vast body of persons who suspect that they have personally much to lose and little to gain by radical changes in the existing order of affairs. There are multitudes who desire to escape the sense of social uneasiness and responsibility, which threatens their tranquillity. And all these find an escape in the plea that social problems are extremely complex, that the obvious is almost certainly fallacious in such matters, and that an immense accumulation of observations and materials is the necessary preliminary to effective action. One can, therefore, very easily sympathise with the attitude of the ardent reformer who answers the plea that thought is a necessity by the bitter reproach, "You have no heart!" To tell the apostle of a social panacea that further thought is necessary, seems like proposing the appointment of a Royal Commission—a mere attempt to escape by a subterfuge from the demand for action that can no longer be resisted by a direct refusal.

Yet, again, there is a widely spread feeling that political economy as a science is discredited. A generation ago the great classical economists were supposed to have laid down, once for all, the foundations of an exact science of political economy; and, indeed, to have practically completed the structure itself. No one would dare to put forward any such contention now. Theory, it must be admitted, is at a discount; and the political economists themselves are apparently seeking refuge in a "natural history of industry" from the recognised impossibility of creating a science of economics. Statistics, minute investigations of existing institutions, and laborious attempts to recover past conditions of industry, seem to have taken the place of political economy as formerly understood. And of those who still keep alive in their own hearts a belief in the importance of the theoretic side of the study, not a few deaden it in all hearts except their own by deforming their pages with mathematical symbols, and mocking the reformer who wants light on the housing problem by beseeching him to study the differential calculus.

But, in spite of all this, phenomena are not wanting (though we have to look a little below the surface to find them) which indicate that the theory of economics may soon be restored again to honour.

It is now between thirty and forty years since a certain leaven was kneaded into the economic lump almost simultaneously by Jevons in England, Walras in Switzerland, and Menger in Austria, which has ever since worked, and is still working, with a slowness that sometimes tempts to despair, but with a persistent steadiness which ought to inspire the right minded with serene confidence.

It is impossible, on such an occasion as this, to go into any detail, or deal with the matter otherwise than dogmatically, and I must, therefore, be content to announce my own conviction that whereas the form of many of the writings of which I speak appears to make the study of economics more abstract and remote from actual life than ever, their ultimate result will certainly be to bring the study of industrial life into touch with the ordinary experiences and observations of mankind; to make it at once more concrete and more rational than of old, and to remove all ground for the charge of inhumanity, or indifference to moral considerations, or coldness and aloofness from the real conditions of life, or exaltation of material above spiritual considerations, which was so frequently and so passionately urged against the old classical economy. At the same time we shall have the bona fide generalisations and the precision of theoretic concatenation which constitute science.

Lest all this should appear to be merely in the clouds, let me attempt to make at least one point clear. Economists have been in the habit of attempting a careful distinction between the economic motives, which it is their direct business to deal with, and the non-economic motives with which they are only concerned in a remote or secondary fashion; and the economic motive has been directly, or by implication, defined as material and self-regarding. Thus, the "economic man" has been conceived as one who is always and only intent upon his own interests; and his interests have been conceived as consisting solely in the securing of wealth and the avoidance of work. This conception has, indeed, been qualified and undermined in every direction by the economists of the last fifty years or more, but the prevailing impression still remains, and is still largely justified, that the study of political economy is the study, exclusively, of selfish, or at least, of self-regarding motives, and the prejudice against such a study still persists. I will try to sketch what I hold to be the renovated conception of the "economic motive" which will dominate future economic studies.

Every man has certain purposes, impulses, and desires. They may be of a merely instinctive and elementary nature, or they may be deliberate and far-reaching. They may be self-regarding or social; they may be spiritual or material. But, whatever they are, it is impossible for him to give effect to them by his own unaided action upon the forces and substances of nature. No man standing naked upon the face of the earth can feed, clothe, or house his body, or secure an entrance for his mind into the regions of intellectual, imaginative, and emotional enjoyment. Nor, suppose he has altruistic impulses, can he minister to like needs or develop like possibilities in others. Nor can he secure the furtherance of his purposes and the fulfilment of his desires simply by enlisting the co-operation of those that share them, or are interested in them for his sake. If we make the attempt to go through a few hours, or even a few minutes of our daily life, and consider the net-work of co-operation extending all over the globe, and through countless generations in the past, by which the clothes we put on, the food we eat, the book containing the poems or expounding the science that we study, or the pen, ink, and paper with which we write an appeal for some charitable or religious object, have been placed at our service, we shall begin to realise the vast system of organised co-operation between persons who have no knowledge of each other's whereabouts, or even of each other's existence, by which the most ordinary processes of life are carried on. By the organisation of society we can therefore secure the co-operation of countless individuals, of whom we know nothing, in directing the resources of the world towards objects in which they have no interest. The symbol, but the symbol only, of this system of co-operation is money. It represents the social alchemy by which the things I have, and the things I can, are transmuted into the things I want and the things I would. Not really by means of money, but by processes which money represents, I can convert my acquaintance with the nature of different kinds of woods, and my skill in handling certain tools, or my knowledge of the higher mathematics, or my capacity for firing men's imaginations, or for chastening or stimulating their religious emotions, into the food and clothing, into the books and pictures, into the rapid transport of my own person through distant lands, into the dinners for hungry children, into the May festivities for listless villagers, into the collation of Syriac manuscripts, that I desire to further. And all this independently of any interest in these desires of mine on the part of the persons who assist me to accomplish them; or, if not independently of any interest, at least independently of any sufficient interest to have qualified them and set them at work for mere love of the thing to be done. Why, then, do they co-operate with me? Not primarily, or not solely, because they are interested in my purposes, but because they have certain purposes of their own, and just as I find that I can only secure the accomplishment of my purposes by securing their co-operation, so they find that they can only accomplish theirs by securing the co-operation of others, which I am directly, or indirectly, in a position to place at their disposal. A vast range, therefore, of our relations with others, direct or indirect, conscious or unconscious, is part of a system of mutual aid by which we further each other's purposes simply as an indirect way of furthering our own. Our own purposes may, of course, be selfish, but that has nothing whatever to do with the question. However unselfish they are, we require the co-operation of others who are not interested, or who are inadequately interested in them, in order that we may accomplish them. We enter into business relations with others, not because our purposes are selfish, but because those with whom we deal are relatively indifferent to our purposes (whether selfish or unselfish), and are (like us) keenly interested in purposes of their own, to which we are relatively indifferent.

The peculiarity, then, of a business relation between A and B is not that each enters into it solely for his own sake, but that neither of them enters into it directly for the sake of the other. A may be expending his income in printing works that he believes to be of the highest spiritual or social significance to the world, and B may be a printer. A secures the co-operation of B, not for B's sake, but for the sake of the whole world whom he desires to enlighten. His object is neither selfish nor self-regarding, but it is dictated by no special and personal regard for B. B, again, has money given him; that is to say, he receives the power of transmuting the credit that A has with the public into such forms as may further his, B's, purposes; and these purposes of B's, in their turn, may be sordid or exalted, material or spiritual, self-regarding, or the most altruistic; but, such as they are, he prints books to A's order for the sake of these purposes, and as an indirect means of furthering them, not, primarily, from any direct desire to further A's purposes. "Business," then, is primarily, a vast net-work of organisations by which any person or combination of persons can direct their resources and their powers to the accomplishment of their purposes, without the necessity of a direct relation, hard and often impossible to secure, between the objects sought, and the faculties and materials possessed.

Now, with respect to this we have two remarks to make. In the first place there is nothing degrading or revolting to our higher sense in this fact of our mutually furthering each others' purposes because we are interested in our own. There is no taint or presumption of unselfishness in the matter at all. But it indefinitely expands our freedom of combination and movement; for it enables us to form one set of groups linked by cohesion of faculties and resources, and another set of groups linked by community of purpose without the necessity of finding the "double coincidence" which would otherwise be necessary. This economy and liberty will be equally valued by altruistic and by egoistic groups, and it would be just as true, and just as false, to say that the business motive ignores egoistic and that it ignores altruistic impulses. And, in the next place, this economic motive can, in a normal society, never permanently exist in isolation; for, although the carpenter or the doctor offers to further, in certain ways, the life purposes of indifferent and unknown persons, as a means of furthering his own, yet, when he has once entered into the relation with them involved in this service, he finds himself studying their wishes, and endeavouring to accomplish their aims, and so he gradually acquires an independent interest in their well-being; and though the relation remains at its foundation economic, non-economic materials will be more or less largely built in the superstructure. Seeing then that economic and non-economic motives are so inextricably associated together, it may safely be predicted that the economics of the future will seek its fundamental laws on ground which does not isolate the economic motive, but finds out the underlying principles that bring it within the range of general psychology. The economics of the future will not insist at the threshold on an analysis and an exclusion which are impossible to carry out.

But note that the natural tendency on the part of economic motives to ally themselves directly with humanities works chiefly in one direction. The man who is paid for his commodities or services is called into immediate co-operation with certain specified purposes of the man who pays; but, on the other hand, it is generalised and undifferentiated command of things and services that the payer confers on the man he pays. The payer has already made his choice of the particular way in which his purposes are to be furthered, and calls the other into direct fellowship with it by way of execution; but the particular way in which he, in his turn, is indirectly to further the purposes of that other is left undetermined. The receiver of money will specify the services he is to receive when he comes to deal with those whom he, in his turn, pays, and they will then enter directly and consciously into some portion of his life; whereas he will simply put them into a position to acquire unspecified co-operation from persons unnamed. It is true, of course, that there is a human relation on both sides; but its humanities develop more naturally, and more directly, on the side of the man who is paid than on the side of the man who pays. This has nothing to do with the relative wealth or poverty of the two. The tailor may naturally take a direct interest in the appearance of his customer, primarily for his own credit, it may be, but secondarily because he is called upon to participate in, and further a specific purpose of his customer; but the customer is called upon to render no direct and specified service to the tailor, and at most has merely a generally benevolent or human interest in him as an individual with whom he has dealings. In the same way, the doctor, the lawyer, and, most of all, the minister of religion, is called upon to enter directly and specifically into certain branches of the lives of the people who pay them. They can see exactly where their action touches them, and can identify their individual contribution towards their well-being. This must inevitably superinduce upon the business aspect of the connection a disinterested concern in the welfare of those they serve. But those who pay them their fees, or contribute to their salary, are not called upon to exercise judgment, fidelity, and tact in directly forwarding specified purposes of their lives; they are not participating with them in specific enterprises and achievements. They cannot identify the particular point at which they are personally and individually helping them. The same is true in a lesser degree in the case of the employer and the hands in a workshop. The relation is a direct challenge to the man employed to do faithfully a specific thing for the man employing him, whereas all that the employer does is to put the man he employs in a position to secure the specified co-operation, not of himself but of others in the fulfilment of this or that desire. Thus, in the economic world, rendering services for payment involves a more direct and specific call upon the humanities than does payment for services received. What the earner of money gives, though fundamentally a means of accomplishing his own purposes, is naturally affected by a sympathetic interest in the purposes of others. What he gets is much more completely dependent on his purely economic vantage, that is to say, on the significance which others attach to his services for their own sakes, not for his. He may give with a sense of personal interest in what he is doing for another; he will get only what he is worth. And he wishes this to be so. A man is pleased if his workmen take a disinterested pride in their work and in the credit of the firm. We are all pleased if our fishmonger or our shoemaker seems to consider our personal tastes, not only because he wishes to retain our custom, but also because he is glad to serve us. But the man who is paid does not wish to receive money from persons because they are interested in his well-being or his altruistic purposes. He wishes to receive it because they are interested in purposes of their own, and need him to forward them. This was the meaning of that frank inscription on a banner displayed in a late procession of unemployed: "Curse your charity!" No doubt there was confusion (or what seems so to us) in the state of mind that it represented. It may be urged that the unemployed virtually demanded as a right that the public should pay them more for their work than their work was worth to the public; and at the same time declared that if an individual or a voluntary association of individuals were to offer them more for their work than their work was worth to them it would be "cursed charity"; as though all the virtue of the action proposed lay in unwillingness on the part of some at least of those taking it! But, in truth, this is no absurdity, though it may be a crudity. It means that the unemployed protest, not against individuals who will not pay them more than they are worth to them, but against the social order which has somehow thrust them into a position in which they are worth so little to anyone, and from which they cannot escape to any place in which they will be worth more, though conscious of having in themselves the intrinsic factors of worth, in skill to do needed things and will to exercise it. And this is in truth the most fundamental aspect of the great social problem of poverty. How is it that so many people are not in a position to render services to others of sufficient value to make it of advantage to those others to give them command of what makes a human life possible?

Surely it is sufficiently obvious that the solution of the problem, so stated, is one towards which no substantial advance can be made without severe and strenuous thought, and the thought must be on large and comprehensive lines.

We have seen that a man's worth depends on his power of furthering the purposes of others, and therefore an obvious solution appears to be found for each individual, if the world can but be kept in urgent need of the thing that he can supply or do. It is to my interest that the world, while rich in other things, should be starved for the thing that I can supply. But it is equally obvious that no general solution can be found along these lines. For, in order that I may prosper, it is not only necessary that the world should be relatively pinched for the thing that I can give, but also that it should have relative abundance of the things that I want; and therefore when another man, in his turn, demands that the world should be rich in the thing (amongst others) that I can give and poor in the one thing which it is his business to supply, his solution of his problem conflicts with my solution of mine. If my position has been unduly weakened because the world has been relatively so well supplied with the thing that I can give that my services have but little significance, the only lines on which a general solution can be sought are those along which the balance will be redressed, either by a proportionally increased supply of everything else, or by the transference of my powers to the supply of something else of which there is a relatively greater need. For, as we have seen, every man's economic vantage depends on the existence of unsatisfied desires on the part of others. He therefore has a vested interest in them; and consequently no wholesome desire can be satisfied, and no unwholesome craving quenched without somebody's economic position being weakened. Thus every diffused blessing which increases the collective well-being of society brings more or less acute distress upon some class of persons. If England and all the world is well supplied with tin it makes life easier and pleasanter to millions, but it saps the industrial position of the Cornish miner. If all the world turned sober it would indefinitely increase its well-being, but publicans, brewers, distillers, and even vine growers would be thrown out of employment. If universal peace were secured and armaments reduced to the vanishing point, there would be many an Othello to mourn that his occupation was gone. If a really successful unpuncturable tyre were put on the market, there would be a great increase in collective happiness, clerical and other appointments would be kept with notably increased regularity, profanity, at least in cultivated society, would tend to be more closely restricted to its natural preserves on the golf links, but there would be a procession of unemployed assistants of bicycle repairers, and the production of "outfits" would be a "ruined industry." If the sanitary habits of the public suddenly improved, there would be a slump in the business of the undertaker, and if capital punishment were abolished the hangman would be out of a job. Thus the obvious solution of my own economic difficulties, or those of others who have excited my benevolent interest, is to keep the world starved of the things we can supply, and this, in the nature of things, can provide no general solution. So that people who think at all are apt to think wrong, because they do not think enough, and have no clear guidance. The efforts of true reformers, on the other hand, must be directed, not towards preventing generally diffused progress, but towards minimising the concentrated distress which that diffused progress in well-being constantly involves, that is to say, facilitating the transfer of faculty from where it has less to where it has greater worth, or strengthening its economic position (in the last resort) by making it (and this is the true inwardness of schemes for land reform or communalising instruments of production) of more direct worth to its possessor himself in supplying his own immediate wants.

As I am merely giving illustrations, and not sketching a system of economics, I must be content to hope that the complex nature of the social problem, and the necessity of my first requisite for social amelioration, namely, thought, has been sufficiently indicated.

But abstract thought, however keen and comprehensive, can but make its contribution to the solution of social problems. All these problems are of a practical and concrete nature, and for their successful handling they demand that kind of instinct for what will work and what will not which we think of as business faculty. The business man has a cultivated sense for promising lines on which to move. He can anticipate better than other men the way in which any body of persons will act industrially under given circumstances, or the selection that they will make between given alternatives. He is accustomed alike to handling men on whom he has an economic hold, and appealing to men over whom he has none. He has come into personal contact with ranges of motive and aspects of character which it is exceedingly difficult to discover by abstract thought, and he knows, by intuition or by experience, the effects of subtle or remote reactions which he has never analysed. And he also knows that success or failure often depends as much upon severe attention to minute details, insignificant severally, but decisive in the mass, as it does upon the general scheme on which action is laid down. But the man of business faculty whom we need must be prepared to direct his powers towards the securing of ends which are wholly foreign to business habits. He must seek to strengthen the economic position of others, not his own. The methods must be those to which he is accustomed, but the problem is so different from that in connection with which he has received his training and formed his ideas that he may well lose his bearings, and find even his instincts at fault. Hence the importance of the union between the thinker and the man of business. If they can be united in a single individual so much the better; but there can be no great measure of success unless they are in some way combined. I can only attempt to indicate a few of the lines on which their combined action may be fruitful. In the first place, it is certain that the mere economic instinct as such, is often blind. That is to say, we often fail to get the best support for our own purposes out of other men, just because we do not treat them well enough from their own point of view. It is an open question whether there are not trades in which shortened hours or increased wages would produce a better result from the employer's own point of view; but at present, in the best judgment of the skilled industrial opinion, the experiment is not worth trying from the economic point of view. The risk of loss more than balances the possibility of gain. Now a combination of benevolence and business faculty may think it worth while to try the experiment, bearing a limited loss if it fails, and initiating an important step of social progress, which will thenceforth become economically self-supporting, if it succeeds. Again, if, as I believe, economic study can show that the holding of allotments, or the feeding of children at the public expense, if general, has no direct tendency to lower wages, but if local in its application, may, under certain conditions, tend to produce that effect, the business man, when he once grasps the general principle, will at once recognise its practical bearings, and will take his precautions, or conduct his experiments on the most promising lines. If, again, as I believe, economic study can show that the successful maintenance of a minimum wage tends to increase unemployment, and that the institution of relief works by public authorities, combined with the principle of remuneration according to the standard wage in the organised trades, would, if generally carried out, directly lead towards public insolvency; the man whose business faculty has been trained in the management of the affairs of a great union will, if he once grasps the principle, see better than another how to escape these dangers with the minimum of detriment to the purposes which it is the immediate object of the proposed measures to accomplish. In a word, the man of trained business habits, as such, is perhaps not the likeliest man to take a wide view of social problems, or successfully to define the general lines on which reform must move; but he has at his command, more than another man, a mass of illustrative, corrective, and illuminating detail, and a practical instinct that will enable him successfully to organise the detailed means when the immediate object to be secured has been scientifically determined and closely defined, and the chief dangers laid down as in a chart.

But there is one great pre-supposition underlying the whole discussion alike of the application of thought and of the application of the business faculty to the solution of social problems. It is that there is a sincere desire for social reform on the part of a sufficient number of individuals of the community to constitute an efficient driving force. Towards the formation of this body of sympathetic desire we can all of us contribute, however incapable of sustained abstract thought, and however deficient in business faculty we may be. But our sympathy must go far beyond the mere benevolent wish that none should be in want. No man, it is true, can predict or realise the ultimate reactions of any important change in the industrial life, but the immediate effect of strengthening the industrial position of the less fortunate members of society must often be to weaken that of the more fortunate ones. To enable a man to pass from a relatively overstocked to a relatively understocked market of abilities is to make his services relatively more important to others and their services relatively less important to him. These two things go together, just as much as it would follow from an ounce of copper being worth more bread than a pound of bread was worth less copper. If we are serious in our desire to improve the position of the disinherited, we shall realise without a shudder that a more even distribution of wealth means stripping the privileged of their relatively ample endowment. Now, practically, most active men direct their efforts to getting as far as possible ahead of other people. They want to increase their income, to improve their position, to secure a number of possessions and enjoyments for themselves and other privileged persons in whom they are interested. Even if their ultimate objects are largely benevolent, they seek, in the first place, to put themselves in a position to accomplish these objects by strengthening their economic vantage as against other men, so as to get a larger share of that power which determines the direction in which the collective resources of society shall be turned. Now, we must realise with perfect distinctness that, if we aim at securing the more even distribution of wealth, we are deliberately reversing this effort. That is to say, if we are ourselves above the average line, we must, if we are sincere, seek to weaken our own industrial position as against that of others, and to strengthen theirs as against ourselves. That means that we shall strive to bring about a state of things in which we shall have to render more strenuous services in order to gain the same command of general resources, or equally strenuous services in order to gain a smaller command. We shall seek to diminish the range over which we can direct the activities of men to the accomplishment of the things in which we are selfishly or unselfishly interested, and increase the extent to which others can so direct them without consulting our wishes or our tastes.

Now there is no absolute contradiction between these two streams of effort and desire. A philosophy of life is conceivable in which we should perpetually strive to make the best of existing circumstances in the direction of acquiring personal command over the resources of society, and directing them towards certain ends of our own, high or low, and at the same time should desire these conditions themselves should be rendered severer for ourselves, if we think we have more than average advantages, and more favourable to others if we think that they have less. But, none the less, if we distinctly realise to what our individual efforts are directed, and what is the meaning of our social programme, most of us will probably be aware of elements of contradiction and inconsistency, which will require to be eliminated with much chastening of spirit; and we shall perhaps begin to think that our sympathy with social reform has hitherto been rather cheaper than we should have wished. We may, perhaps, realise that when we rose from the most earnest prayer, "Thy kingdom come," we should have been rather startled, and perhaps dismayed, if we had found that it had really come. In other words, we must "prepare for the kingdom" in the inmost affections and aspirations of our hearts, if we are to render anything more than a lip service to social ideals. I suppose it can hardly be denied that the personal schemes and ideals which most of us form for ourselves and our children are of a nature which is at present intrinsically incapable of universal realisation, because they involve the subordination and subjection of others less successful than ourselves. The mere fact that we most of us wish to belong to the "servant-keeping class" is a sufficiently eloquent testimony to this fact, and the pathetic attempts which are constantly made to throw some slight disguise over this painfully frank proclamation of an ideal of social inequality testify alike to uneasy consciousness of an inconsistency somewhere, and the quite humorously superficial measures with which we are content to absolve ourselves from liability to reproach. The cry for the "simple life," with all its elaborately conventionalised unconventionalities and its naïve self-consciousness and affectation, has nevertheless a certain soundness at its centre. It is a recognition of the necessity of "preparing for the kingdom" by dissociating what we most value in life from material supports and adjuncts that make it necessarily exclusive. We feel that what really matters is not essentially dependent upon a wide command of material things, and we wish to simplify the material basis of a truly human life. Why, we ask, should we spend half our lives in surrounding ourselves with dust collectors and the other half in dusting them? But there are other conventional needs besides material ones, and possibly the discovery is awaiting us in the near future that a great deal of what we have been in the habit of considering our intellectual and artistic advantages, laboriously and expensively acquired, are really just as much conventional encumbrances, and have just as little really to do with the development of the finer feelings and the attainment of the higher culture as the heavy dining-room furniture of the Early Victorian period. Perhaps it is not only materialism, but more generally affectation and insincerity that is the great wasting and complicating agent in our lives. But, be that as it may, the desire for the simple life testifies to a genuine, if not yet very effective, belief that the things that matter most are essentially accessible to the many, on a material basis not too elaborate to be secured by the many, and that those joys which are capable of being "in widest commonalty spread" are the most truly joyful. It is exceedingly difficult for us, who are in the enjoyment of relative affluence, to speak of our belief in the possibility of erecting a human life on a very modest material basis without the appearance of cant; but we may at least strive to bring ourselves into such an attitude of mind towards our possessions and into such appreciation of the opportunities of lives but moderately endowed with material supports that a loss of fortune that should bring us near the average line would not fall upon us as a heavy disaster. Surely if we have done less than this our sympathy with the disinherited is something less than sincere.

Our minds cannot be long directed to such subjects as this without being strongly impressed with the wastefulness, from the social point of view, of much of the present organisation of our lives and affections of our hearts. If we had a little more imagination and had accustomed ourselves more to reflection, we should have a far higher standard of public duty and a greater respect for public property, from which would follow an indefinitely increased economy in all branches of public life. "Alas! master, for it was borrowed," cried that son of the prophets who lost his axe-head in the water. Was he distressed because the loss would fall on another who was innocent, and not upon himself, who had been careless? Or was it because the price would be exacted from him by the owner? One would like to think the former; and it is, of course, no exaggeration to say that we should most of us be more grieved to spill the ink over a handsome book that belonged to a friend than over one that belonged to ourselves; though even in this case it may be true that "we should be more unhappy, but we should not be unhappy so long." But, setting that aside, what if this book or this hatchet belongs to our friend the public? As the axe-head flies off, do we naturally cry, "Alas! master, for it was municipal?" or if the book falls from our desk with the thud that tells of a crushed corner, or the cry that suggests a wrenched back, do we say, "Ah me! it was from the free library"? A reverence for public property, diffused through all ranks of society would give a larger range for possible economies and reforms than the combination of business talents and theoretic thought on which I have been insisting is likely to produce for some time to come. But what can we do towards such a consummation? Not much, perhaps; but we can begin—at home. And, finally, we can prepare for the kingdom by learning to dissociate enjoyment from possession throughout that enormous area over which they are intrinsically capable of dissociation. Many of us, I suppose, have acquired so much wisdom that we would rather our friends kept horses or motor cars than that we kept them ourselves. Many of us would distinctly prefer being joint possessors of the pictures in the National Gallery to being individual possessors of a few of them, the rest belonging to other privileged persons. Many of us would prefer to live within reach of fine public buildings to living in fine houses ourselves. And this feeling for enjoyment, apart from private possessions, may be indefinitely cultivated. Our parks and public gardens show the economy it may effect in securing enjoyment with the resources at our disposal. Window gardens give collective enjoyment in many an else sordid street of London where each possesses but a very little of that which he enjoys, and perhaps a select few (and I need hardly say that "these things are an allegory") may be brought to prefer cowslips in the field and roses in the hedge, where they may be enjoyed in common, to the same flowers languishing in hot hands, or even revived to ornament the dinner table. And such will contemplate with sad surprise the necessity of a formal prohibition to gather water lilies on the Thames. But this is perilous ground. Indeed, it may be laid down as a rule that in appeals to the social consciousness, generalities may be safely relied on to awake a deep response; but specific examples are held to vitiate the whole argument, and only create protest and indignation. Let us have no more of them, then; and let us strive to end on a harmonious note by returning to the safe general proposition that the three requisites for social amelioration are thought, practical capacity, and sympathy, but the greatest of these is sympathy.

To lack the loving discipline of pain were endless loss.—R. C. Trench.

DARWINISM AND SOCIAL MOTIVE.

BY GRAHAM WALLAS, M.A.

MR. MORLEY in his "Life of Gladstone" describes how, some thirty years ago, on a Sunday afternoon, Sir John Lubbock, with whom he and Mr. Gladstone were staying, "took us all up to the hill-top whence in his quiet country village Darwin was shaking the world." The other day I was talking with an able and reasonably orthodox Nonconformist minister. The talk turned on Darwin, and I said that Darwin's hypothesis as to man's origin seemed to be generally accepted. "Yes," answered my friend, "we all accept it, and how little difference it makes."

Who was right, Mr. Morley or my friend? Did Darwin "shake the world" or did he make very little difference? Or did the world receive indeed a shake, but then settle down with little difference made?

On one point, even the most careless newspaper reader can, I think, detect a change in our outlook, due to the general acceptance of Darwinism. We are anxious about the preservation and improvement of our racial type. We are concerned with the birth-rate from a point of view very unlike that of those political economists who dealt a hundred years ago with the returns of the first English censuses. We trouble about the quality as well as the quantity of births. We appoint Commissions on national degeneration and read papers on "eugenics." We raise questions of conduct in this matter very different from those raised by Mr. Herbert Spencer and the other first hasty generalisers about evolution, who seemed to suggest that if shopkeepers were encouraged to compete for business and clergymen for congregations, a process of the "survival of the fittest" would automatically set in, which would rapidly improve the race without the necessity of further thought or the starting of new moral difficulties.

But though a serious discussion of the duty of the human race in the improvement of its own type would be an admirable subject for such a Conference as this, I do not intend to enter upon it now. To-day I propose to consider the relation of Darwinism to our way of approaching some of the problems affecting, during each generation, those who have been already born, and the conditions of whose birth it is therefore too late to alter. My own work, for instance, is largely concerned with education. When I read a book on education, written a hundred or even fifty years ago, I find myself in a new world of ideas. Those of our grandfathers who thought about education were apt either to believe, with James Mill, that the human child was a lump of sculptor's clay, which could be changed by the schoolmaster into any type desired, or with Rousseau, that it was a flower which would reach perfection by its own laws of growth if it were only left undisturbed. We distinguish nowadays, in a way which would have been unintelligible both to James Mill and to Rousseau, between the native qualities which we must take for granted in each individual instance, and the acquired characteristics which we can hope to change. We send our mentally deficient children to special schools, without hope that they can be made normal, and construct scholarship systems for the purpose, not of making clever children, but of discovering them. We expect in our schools to do much in improving the habits of attention and discipline, and almost nothing in improving the native powers of memory and apprehension.

In the same way, when we deal with the facts of our own moral nature as disclosed by introspection, our acceptance of what we roughly call Darwinism seems likely to change the whole conditions of the problem of personal ethics. Instincts are evolved as well as bones and muscles, and from the beginning of the recorded history of human words we can watch the ever new surprise with which men have recognised the war within their own souls, both between inconsistent instincts, and between instinct and the moral ideals which are the result of knowledge and reflection. "I delight," says Paul, "in the law of God after the inward man, but I see a different law in my members, warring against the law of my mind and bringing me into captivity under the law of sin which is in my members."

Here too, as in the case of education, men have swung between attempts to ignore first one side and then the other side of the shield. Some have cherished the hope that, as the result of a final moral struggle, all impulses except the spiritual may in each man be destroyed, that "after the spirit we may make dead the deeds of the body." Others have denied the necessity of a struggle at all, and have claimed that if we follow our impulses with unflinching faith, we shall thereby create a method of life which will fit our instinctive nature as the mould fits the statue; where, in Blake's words: "God, like a Father rejoicing to see

His children as pleasant and happy as he,
Would have no more quarrels with the Devil or the barrel,

But kiss him and give him both drink and apparel."

Among a people accustomed to accept the teaching of Darwin, neither of these two views will be possible. It is true that many of our instincts point to a life other than that which we now live, the life of our pre-human or almost human ancestors. But we cannot get rid of our instincts any more than can any particular whale get rid of his rudimentary hind legs, and we can no more assume that those instincts will enable us with easy satisfaction to live that ancient life in connection with which they were developed than can a whale assume that because he has rudimentary hind legs he can walk with comfort on dry land. Nor can we merely by moral striving alter permanently our racial type. Tennyson wrote before Darwin when he said:—

"Move upwards, working out the beast
And let the ape and tiger die."

Our racial type can be changed in its own time and according to its own laws, but to each of us, while we await that change, the saying acquires a new and rather sad meaning, that though in our moral conflicts we can seek the strong allies of deeper knowledge and nobler ideals, we cannot by taking thought add one cubit to our stature.

But Darwin has shaken the world of the social reformer even more completely than that of the moralist. For many centuries past the young men of each generation have been told by their elders that every proposed reform in social organisation is "against human nature." They have generally, and rightly, ignored this warning, because no one knew what human nature was, and there were no means of distinguishing between those things in human character which the reformer could hope to change and those which he must assume to be unchangeable. Facts about human nature as apparently permanent as the belief in magic or the sentiment of monarchy have proved capable of change, while apparently superficial traits, such as the sense of the ridiculous or the need of recreation, have proved to be unexpectedly stubborn. I remember reading a story, I think about Frederick Denison Maurice, who one day in the middle of the last century, noticed that macadam had been substituted for paving in part of Oxford-street. The passengers in his omnibus, being relieved for a moment from the deafening noise, turned and spoke to each other. Some day, he said, all Oxford-street will be macadamised and the omnibus will become a delightful informal club. The London streets are now paved with wood, and sitting as we do on the top of the omnibus, we could hear each other if we spoke in whispers. But no Londoner ever does talk to a casual neighbour on an omnibus. Certain facts in our inherited nature make us shrink from the effort involved in acquiring every few minutes a new acquaintance. Indeed, as the conditions of city life bring us nearer and nearer together, in the railway carriage, in the lift, the theatre, the restaurant, in the great clubs where for years together we sit in the same rooms and eat and read among our unknown fellow-members, we fence ourselves about with the same invisible rule of silence, to be broken down only between the friends who slowly and cautiously come together. Fifty years ago if the proposal had been made to set up common dining rooms for seven thousand members of one club, men of conservative minds would have rejected it as being somehow against human nature, and reformers would have welcomed it as abolishing our unnecessary and unnatural habit of reserve. Now we can understand the paradox that man when he makes cities which are as crowded as beehives must bring into them the need for comparative solitude which was developed among his ape-like ancestors.

It is by experiment that we learn what are the permanent facts of human nature which are relevant to any particular instance of a common life, but it is the Darwinian view of human nature which will enable us to systematise and explain our experiments.

Darwinism gives us a starting-point from which we can study such facts as that it is apparently useless to try to make a right-handed boy ambidextrous and quite easy to make the descendant of two generations of meat-eaters a healthy vegetarian, or that the threat of the workhouse seems to discourage a labourer from saving, and the prospect of an old age pension to encourage him. Above all it offers to the social reformer some guidance in his life-long search for those social motives which are the fulcrum of social change. Unless he is prepared to study undismayed the nature of man as evolution has for the moment left it, the reformer who is also a politician will find his life one of constant and cruel disillusion. Even if, like Disraeli, he is against Darwin and on the side of the angels, he may learn, against his will, that his efforts to check the brutalities of Chinese indentured labour are only successful when they are backed by the instinctive hatred of the West European man for the Mongolian racial type. He may recognise in the shouting crowd who applaud his election the same instinct which shocked him at a great football match. He may realise with disgust, but without understanding, the professional skill by which his agent and the agent on the other side work up the driving force of a great political contest, by playing on those facts in human nature which he most desires to forget.

As one reflects on all this, one understands why so many of Darwin's contemporaries shrank from the intrusion of an impartial and sceptical science into things so sacred as the struggle for holiness in men's hearts or their longing for perfection in State and Church. Aristophanes felt the same horror at the calculation by science of the movements of the sun which he worshipped, and the human body which he loved. Darwinism must still seem to many good men to lead in the region of personal conduct to a cold-blooded compromise between impulse and caution, and in politics to the deliberate exploitation of human weakness. But the mean, says Aristotle, is an extreme. Knowledge of the conditions of our contest points not to contented acquiescence, but to a more untiring because a more successful effort. The genius of the musician is strengthened, not weakened, by all that he learns or divines of the formation of sound, and of the strange working of the ear and brain of man. It is when reason has brought most clearly into her view the unreasoning impulses, the weaknesses and the limitations of human nature, that the Kingdom of Reason of which Plato dreamed becomes most nearly possible. But the way to that kingdom lies through the service and interpretation of nature. It is placed,

Not in Utopia—subterranean fields—

Or some secreted island, Heaven knows where,

But in the very world, which is the world
Of all of us—the place where, in the end,
We find our happiness, or not at all.

THE DISCUSSION.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH, who opened the discussion (the Rev. L. Jenkins Jones, who was also to have spoken, was unable to be present), said they must all have been deeply moved by the papers they had heard. A point of special interest to himself was the emphasis Mr. Wicksteed had laid on the difficulty of dealing with the unemployed. He appreciated what was said of the great need of thought and business capacity in dealing with social questions. He thought they had also to add every word of what Mr. Wallas said as to the need of experiment. It was not sufficient merely to bring thought and sympathy to the consideration of these questions. He could not conceive a more appalling catastrophe than that they should have on the one side of the community its educated and cultured class giving thought to the problem, and its working class, impatient of this apparently mere scientific curiosity, rushing headlong into what must be a disastrous experiment. What was wanted was to bring together, if possible, the sympathetic relations that Mr. Wicksteed referred to, the thought on the one hand and the urgent necessity for practical action that would not abide long thinking on the other. They had had many papers at many of their Conferences on social questions, and they were all sufficiently versed in the obligation of thinking on these questions. The problem grew, particularly in their big towns, more acute every day, and meanwhile it seemed to him that the efforts they made towards the amelioration of these conditions were extremely unsatisfactory and but poor palliatives. For instance, whilst they were struggling with the great problem of the housing question and with all the vast consequences bad housing involved in character, whilst they were struggling with this in the centres of their great towns and cities, they were allowing more new slums to be created all round the cities than they were removing in the centre. It all pointed to the need of larger conceptions and the extension of powers to their great centres so that they might have great schemes for the laying out of large areas and the development on national lines of the cities. But when he looked in Manchester and other big Northern cities into the actual condition of this mass, the most pitiful of all sections of the community, the mass of the unemployed on the streets, for whom, apparently, society had no need, and yet upon whom it still laid the obligation of observing social order, when he looked into these parts of Manchester he was struck even more by the unsatisfactory character of their attempts to deal with the problem, for mere palliatives their attempts really were. Whilst the question of land reform, which would make cultivation on a small scale possible, was of great importance, he was more and more coming to the conclusion that the great question was the better training and greater care of the children. He was astonished at their carelessness as a community, in regard to the children. They had undertaken the duty of educating the children; they were ready even now to go a further step and see that some provision was made for the feeding of the children. There was a Bill before Parliament this session, with the objects of which he heartily agreed, to prohibit cigarette smoking among children. The late Government passed a Bill the object of which was to prevent children, as they said in the North, from supping the supper beer as they took it home. They spent a great deal on educating the children up to a point, but the amazing thing to him was this, that, after all this expenditure of care and treasure, they flung the children out into the community to be wasted any how. Ought they not to extend the conception of duties further and say, the community ought to protect children against the avarice or ignorance of the parents who would barter 5s. a week to-day against the whole future happiness and industrial occupation of their offspring? He did not know how it could be secured, but he knew who were some of the greatest offenders in this matter, and one of the greatest offenders was the Government itself, which employed a large number of young people, and when it was too late for them to acquire a trade flung them out on the street as no longer of any use or as having become too expensive. It was largely the consequence of the breakdown of the apprenticeship system. What they wanted was in some way or other to restore the old apprenticeship system, to raise the conception of their Trades Unions above the mere idea of collective bargaining to bring something like equality of power between two parties to the contract. It was the old higher conception of the guild which looked after the worker, the quality of his work, and saw that he had a recognised place in the community. That he thought in the towns was one of the most urgent of questions. He was very much of the opinion of the President of the Board of Trade in his scepticism as to the value of farm colonies as a solution of this problem of the unemployed. He hoped that from the discussion there they would take the courage that was needed to recognise this fact, that there were problems that could not be solved by thinking. It was the Divine order that they could only discover some things by acting, and therefore they should extend their sympathy and comradeship to those sections of the community which, impatient of too much thinking, demanded action, and by associating with them bring to action the temper and the principles which might save them from disasters, and render some real service towards the solution of some of these questions.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER said the Rev. A. J. Carlyle, Fellow of University College and Rector of All Saints', the City Church, was to have taken part in the discussion. Mr. Carlyle had been a devoted student of political philosophy, and was also the leader of many important social reforms in that city. He responded readily to the invitation from their Committee to be present at some meeting of the Conference, and selected that morning as the one on which he would speak. Unhappily, Mr. Carlyle had been called by telegram to the South of France to the death-bed of his mother, and thus, to their great regret, was unable to be with them. Turning to the subject of the morning Mr. Carpenter said he should not attempt to rival either the profound analysis or the wit of his friend, Mr. Wicksteed, nor should he attempt to offer so searching a thought as that which animated the paper of Mr. Wallas. But he did wish to say one or two words to those who were engaged in the ministry of religion as to the significance of the general subject. The first part of Mr. Wicksteed's paper recalled to his mind the terrible chapter in one of the treatises of the American economist, General Walker—he thought the treatise on "Wages"—in which he analysed the cause which made men worth so little that they only got, if they got it at all, the lowest rate of sweated labour. Let anyone read the analysis of the complex conditions, economic, intellectual and moral, which General Walker there expounded, and he would realise something of the enormous difficulty of the task which besets the social reformer; but he would also realise the enormous part which mental and moral considerations play in that great question. It was here that the work of the teacher of religion might come in. But he was not going to speak of his share in the education of the sufferers, but of what it seemed to him the teacher of religion might do in the way of stimulating the social earnestness of those whom he addressed. Every minister was the centre of a little group of persons, young men and young women, whose interest he could awaken. In cities which had universities and colleges they could take advantage of skilled instruction in the classes of social economics, or, if such aids were not available, they must form little reading circles and so take up the study. Every minister was the centre of a little group of social facts. Let him study the organisation of his own town and gather the kind of facts set forth in the volumes of Mr. Charles Booth or the work of Messrs. Rowntree at York, and so gain a personal contact with social fact. During the last century the churches had been occupied with one great line of work affecting profoundly the bases of religious belief, and had to assimilate the results of Biblical criticism. They might think that assimilation still very imperfect, but at any rate the great study had established itself as a thing which could not be ignored. So in the same way the work of the churches in the next generation would be the assimilation of social science. This century would see in that respect, he was persuaded, an enormous advance, but it would not be done by bringing the detailed facts into the pulpit; it would be done by a slow accumulation of the work of thinkers in many directions. It would also be done by observation and by experiment, such as Mr. Peach had referred to. For his own part he thought farm colonies were a desirable experiment, and with experiments should begin the assimilation of great ideas. All these things required time, and they were sometimes in danger of being discouraged because things went on so slowly, and they could not tear up their existing social organisation and begin anew. In the culture of sympathy, for which Mr. Wicksteed pleaded, they must remember the danger of anger lest things did not go on quickly enough; for they had seen on a colossal scale in Russia during the last few months what dire results an explosion of helpless anger produced when there was inadequate knowledge and sympathy to control it. They must be prepared for the more active culture of sympathy which would express itself in those various ways to which Mr. Wicksteed called their attention in the last pages of his paper. And there was yet one thing more. The greatest danger of all, he thought, affecting the thinker was the paralysing doubt that after all his thought his endeavours might be in vain because the thing was too big for them, the difficulties too great, the knowledge required too minute and too vast, and no single mind could compass it. Once more let them remember the element of time. Mr. Darwin, on his hill-top, devoted the thought of some forty years to watching the effect of worms in lowering the level of a field. Let them have confidence and believe that it was pre-eminently the work of the church to inspire, that God did not set them to tasks that were beyond their power. They must work for the kingdom of God; He gave them on this earth the generations of men; He gave them as they believed in the universe the infinite vistas of eternity. With the great hope of the future when they passed out of this life they were not now concerned, but it was the concern of the church to cultivate alike the needful sympathy and the needful confidence, that in the education of the sons of God these things were possible for them upon this world, and with the element of time they would not be disheartened. He, at least, believed that, by the end of this century, the difference would not be small.

The Rev. W. J. JUPP said he would like to say a few words which should deepen in his own heart the profound impression that must have been created by what they had heard that day. A negro preacher of former days, who had a most wonderful success in moving people, was asked how he did it, and he replied: "First I 'splains, secondly I 'spounds, and thirdly I puts in the 'rousements." Mr. Wicksteed had "'splained," Mr. Wallas had "'spounded," who would put in the "'rousements"? In truth, no one could. They must all do it, and what he would hope was that they would henceforth, more than ever, all of them who were in any way connected with these churches of theirs, keep their minds turned towards those great social questions by putting in the "'rousements." He did not mean that they should get very excited now or at any particular time, but that they should be so strongly affected by the significance of these things that they should always and henceforth, whenever opportunities occurred, find themselves naturally trying to solve the problem, and contributing their part towards the higher condition of things which the slow but sure solution of the problem would bring about for humanity; and in order to do this he thought they might resolve to make their Sunday, which offered such splendid opportunities for considering great questions, perhaps a little less selfish, a little less religiously selfish. In the town where he lived there was an agnostic—there were a great many, he believed—but there was one who occasionally honoured his congregation by coming to the service. A Sunday or two ago this man was there, and said to him afterwards, "I think your people meet together just for a little spiritual recreation." "Well," he replied, "perhaps so, and spiritual recreation may be good for us all." But he knew what the man meant, and it was possible that they did not on those occasions, when they met thus together, give sufficient attention to the social significance of religious ideas, and it would be exceedingly well for them all if they could try more and more to lift the questions of every-day life into the light of their religious communion and religious thought, and realise in fact, that religion must in future more and more find its expression in the working out of those problems that had been brought before them that day. Let them determine that henceforth they would give their best thought, their finest strenuousness, and deepest passion to social problems.

The Rev. J. B. HIGHAM having suggested that much good might be done by greater attention to the training of children, the discussion was concluded.

DISCUSSION ON THE REV. C. HARGROVE'S PAPER.

At the afternoon session of the Conference the chair was taken by Mr. W. Wallace Bruce, L.C.C., who said they had met to discuss a very important and difficult subject, one which came, to a certain extent, naturally after the very interesting papers they had heard that morning: how far was it wise for a minister in the pulpit to refer to questions of social or imperial politics, and how far the congregations as congregations should take action upon them. All would agree that a minister should teach the principles of action which should guide the decision of questions; but when it came to applying those principles to particular action a difficulty at once arose, since human beings were so formed that two men equally honest, equally sincere, and equally desirous of attaining the same result, could differ absolutely the one from the other as to the best means of attaining it. It was a question of temperament, environment, experience, and point of view; and if one of these two men got into the pulpit and there intimated, as a man in the pulpit usually did, that his point of view was the right one, there was strong probability that considerable offence would be caused to the man in the congregation who had not an opportunity of putting his point of view forward. Especially was this the case in some of their congregations, where there were to be found men of wide experience of affairs, men possibly of very special knowledge of the subject in question; and no doubt all of them knew of cases where the difficulty had presented itself. But there was another view of the question, and as a judicious chairman he was going to put that view to them. At the present time, when the discoveries of science and the teachings of progressive philosophy had raised doubts in the minds of many men as to the creeds and doctrines in which they were brought up, they found in the great artisan class there was a very large proportion of the class that did not go to any place of worship at all. During the last fourteen years he had been a member of the London County Council, and he had been thrown very considerably amongst leaders of that class, either as a member of a committee or chairman of a committee of which they were members, and he had had many opportunities of discussing these questions with them. They would tell one that they had thrown up religion because the doctrines they had been taught in their youth they had put aside as they had put aside the affairs of their childhood. These men had their religion, although they would not allow it. Their religion was the bettering of the condition of the people. There were many of them he could mention who were spending their lives in the working out of such questions as the improvement of housing, getting people out of the slums to live under more healthy conditions, and so forth, and they were doing that perfectly unselfishly; therefore it could not be said these men were without religion. It appeared to him there was no reason why their faith, which was not in fear of any discoveries of science, should not appeal to these men, but it would not appeal to them, he thought, by stating principles alone. He thought in order to appeal to these men they must preach what he called applied religion; that was to say, religion applied to the ordinary affairs of life, religion as it affected the very classes whose condition they were desirous of bettering. He thought religion of that kind would appeal to these men, and he had no reason to doubt, that if so appealed to, they would be found in churches where at present they were not to be found. Having thus placed before them difficulties apparent on two sides of the question, he called upon the Rev. Charles Hargrove to read his paper on "The Relations of our Ministers and Congregations to Social and Political Questions of the Day," which was published in last week's INQUIRER.

Miss CATHERINE GITTINS, of Leicester, opened the discussion. They had all been much impressed, she said, by the eloquent words they had heard, with the spirit of which they would all agree. They would also agree with the central proposition that the true influence of a church was in the minister's hands, but, personally, she failed to see how influence could be exercised without action, and what she wished to do was, though it seemed perilously like rushing in where angels feared to tread, to suggest a few ways in which she thought action might be taken, and why it ought to be taken. She did not feel inclined to separate minister and congregation as Mr. Hargrove and the chairman had done; she preferred to speak of the church as a whole, as one body though of many members, for she was persuaded that the laity, with a minister as their head, which was his rightful place, could do more in the world than the most eloquent preacher without his people at his back. There could be no doubt of the interest and the supreme importance of the question they were considering that day, viz., the relation of religious bodies to the social questions of the time, nor could there be any doubt of the opportuneness of the time. They all recognised that at all events in the sphere of politics there was a new spirit of earnestness abroad, and that this spirit was being concentrated on the improvement and amelioration of the condition of the masses of the people. It was not only in politics they saw an uprising of the heart and conscience of the nation. The churches too were feeling the thrill of the new life, and one could hardly take up a newspaper without noticing some manifestation of a spirit which reached them beyond the narrow line of its own opinion, and tried to forward the kingdom of God on broader and deeper lines. They were all waking up at last to the truth of the saying of Arnold Toynbee, that all social problems had three aspects, the political, the economical, and the religious, that the religious was the most important and fundamental of the three. For instance, what was industrial co-operation, which was one of the most potent economical forces of the time, but an attempt to carry on business on terms of brotherhood between man and man? What was peace, the most important of their international concerns, but a recognition of the equal Fatherhood of God? What was education, on which their existence as a nation depended, but an affirmation of the belief in the inherent possibilities of human nature? This it was the churches were beginning to feel. But most of the churches seemed to find insuperable difficulties. She was present a few Sundays ago at a lecture given under the auspices of the Christian Social Union. It was given, of course, at a High Church, but there was a complete, a remarkable absence of ritual. The vicar himself did not even wear a gown, but he made an impassioned appeal to the working men who constituted a large part of the audience to take up their heritage in the National Church, which belonged to them of right, to claim baptism from their parish priest, confirmation from the bishop, and so on. But it was evident that he despaired of any response, and he had since admitted it in writing. Thus it seemed their High Church friends must leave behind them what they considered as essentials of religion in their endeavour, which was very earnest, to grapple with the social problems of the times. And what ritual could not do, dogma could not do either. Even Dr. Horton, or Dr. Forsyth, with all his zeal for social reform, could not expect the masses of the people to accept his subtle and elaborate doctrine of the Cross. Nor could the crude doctrine of the Salvation Army appeal to the intelligent men and women of the working classes. Yet with all these drawbacks, the churches felt that necessity was laid upon them to attack the evils of the time, and nobly were they doing it.

And what of themselves? Were they in the van or in the rear of the great army of the living God? Individually, they were thankful to know that many were joining in the march, and not a few in the front ranks, most of them preferring to be undistinguished from the others. But was that all that could be done? Had they even begun to realise that it was their religion that was needed to solve the problems—their simple faith in the Fatherhood of God, the brotherhood of man, and the intrinsic nobleness of human nature? When she heard M. Wagner in the Cathedral at Geneva preach with burning eloquence on the words "Show us the Father," it was borne in upon her that that was their mission as a church—to be living witnesses of the everlasting love of God. Faithful in that, they might in very deed redeem the world. Some of their friends said that they preferred to work with people of other denominations in public matters. That was very natural and right to a certain extent, but why should they always go to others and not invite others to come to them? Two or three weeks ago, in THE INQUIRER, there was an instance of a piece of genuine work done for the whole of Manchester, touching hundreds of young lives, and that uplifting influence was placed to the credit of one body of workers in their own household of faith, the Lower Mosley-street Schools. She alluded to the Manchester Social Club, which she had the pleasure of visiting lately, and was very much struck by what she saw. That was a piece of social work which could be done, and was being done, without in any way being open to the danger of falling into the clutches of the two monsters supposed to be lying in wait, viz., party politics and sectarianism. There were many others she would like to mention. One in which they were particularly interested there was the inspiration of the Conference on Social Questions at Liverpool three years ago; she meant the Leicester Women's Friendly Society, of which there was an account in last week's INQUIRER. What they needed was a fresh outburst of that zeal on behalf of suffering humanity which led sixty or seventy years ago to the founding of their Domestic Missions, in which they had been pioneers. But men who were devoting themselves heart and soul to the service of the poor in great towns would be the first to tell them that, far from being satisfied and resting on their oars, they ought to be up and doing and making their way again to the front. This she believed could not be done without a frank recognition of the powers of the democracy, which were bound to increase. With this recognition must come sympathy, and with that a desire for help. As the greatest need of the democracy was education, she thought they ought to be prepared to do all they could for it, especially in their Sunday schools and among their young people. The Friends did this very thoroughly in their large boarding schools, and the children were brought up to know accurately the story of William Penn's dealings with the North American Indians as an instance of the successful working out of the Christian law of love. They were sadly in need of guiding principles to-day. In the matter of arbitration, how many of them had been taught anything of the history of the 177 treaties of arbitration that were concluded during the nineteenth century? She had heard the Bishop of Hereford, preaching in Bristol Cathedral, express a fervent wish that all young people could be put through a course of Channing as the greatest modern apostle of peace. Why should it not be done in the elder classes of their schools and in their guilds? The Friends recognised that knowledge of such things did not come by nature, and provided for definite study and instruction in their admirable adult schools and elsewhere, and those instructed persons were always ready to strengthen the cause of peace and all true civilisation. But were they not already instructed sufficiently by experience to do something? She suggested, as a practical step, that all their churches in the Midlands should this year send a delegate to the National Peace Congress to meet at Birmingham on June 13 and 14. And they might carry this further. Supposing there was a Temperance Congress in a town, or a conference on housing or on the question of the unemployed, why should not the churches be glad to join in conferring if they really felt the necessity of thinking on these questions. And why should they not be the ones to lead the way and invite others to follow? She believed that would be one way to do something to com-vince the non-churchgoing masses that the churches really cared for things that concerned them so much; and there would be plenty of scope for the business faculty and sympathy of which Mr. Wicksteed spoke. Matters like this might come within the purview of the Union which it was proposed to found, a union of those within their borders who felt that it was their duty to take collective action. She thought very much good might be done, and that it might even have some influence on the national life. They believed that ideas ruled the world, and if they valued the ideas of God and man, and Christ and human destiny, which lay at the foundation of their liberal Christian faith, it behoved them to work together to make them prevail; not in any sectarian or partisan spirit, but with reverent and loving hearts, and with the one object of forwarding, by all the means in their power, the coming of God's kingdom on earth.

The Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED proposed the following resolution:—

“That this Conference approves the formation of a Union, the object of which shall be to develop the consciousness of social responsibility among the members of our churches, and to press upon them the urgent need of (1) a careful study of the social problems of modern civilisation, and (2) the undertaking of definite practical work towards their solution.”

He was glad that Miss Gittins had particularly mentioned the Society of Friends or Quakers, because he had been very much impressed during the last few years, when he had been in one way or another associated with them, by the fact that all the difficulties and objections that were raised in these matters were purely academic and imaginary, if there was a body with any real spiritual cohesion and spiritual passion. The Friends were as much divided as they were, and as passionately convinced on the question of the right or wrong of England's action in South Africa; they received circulars directly challenging consideration and resolutions. They met in a very little room with few people, with all the aggravation of family ties super-imposed on religious fellowship and passionate diversity on matters of immediate political action; they met under such pressure to consider such matters, and they expressed their opinion and took whatever step that was decided upon without any explosion, because there was a superimposed pressure of spiritual tradition, of intense spiritual earnestness, a spiritual fellowship which was equal to all this, and was not afraid of it. The Society of Friends had proved that it had a profound conviction that everything that concerned the national well-being or national righteousness, everything that concerned the well-being of man, was its concern. Things of that kind would happen to them any time if they went to a Friends' meeting; they would find part of what they met to do was to consider a letter which had been received that came from somebody challenging the attention of Friends to the subject, say, of peace in time of war, or calling attention to the evils of [gambling or anything else, and they there and then assembled as part of their religious worship to consider it. They might say little or nothing; they might or might not take some definite action; but in any case, as part of their worship, their attention was called to these things; it was their concern. Now, what were they at that Conference going to do? To say that to take action in these matters would destroy them was to say they were dead already. To be afraid because they thought it would interfere with or imperil their spiritual life was absurd; it could do no such thing if they had any life or energy at all. The churches might undertake definite practical work in their organised capacity as time and place suggested, they might undertake definite practical work as individuals in societies already existing, or they might form societies; but at least it was their concern, and he asked them to do what they could. He was happy to find himself in harmony with the reader of the paper in believing there was no danger of this involving arrogance or any breach of the meek and lowly spirit of their Master. But he was bound to say the claim had been put exceedingly modestly and moderately; he told them to be meek and lowly as their Master. They must, then, do nothing more violent than go out and upset the tables of the money-changers; and they must do that as he did it, not in a spirit of rage or petulance, but very truly and firmly, in the spirit of humility and in the spirit of prophetic earnestness.

The Rev. HENRY GOW seconded the resolution, and said there were three ways in which work might be done in their churches in connection with social questions—Domestic Mission work, Sunday school work, and work outside the churches on social or political lines. Many of their congregations were afraid of the social gospel, not because they were dead, but very often because it was misunderstood. If, as was sometimes the case, there was more of opinion than principle in the social gospel, he held their congregations were rightly afraid. They had escaped, thank God, very largely from the continual dwelling on differences in theology, from preaching negative opinions, from onslaughts on other churches, or even on unbelief, and they did not want the odium theologicum, out of which they were emerging, to be replaced by an odium sociologicum. He fully recognised that a religious gospel implied a theology. It was intellectual inertia and religious agnosticism to believe they could preach religion in which there was no theology. And, further, a religious gospel implied a reasoned conviction not only of God but of man, a sociology of some sort. Anything, therefore, that encouraged their young people, and ministers and congregations, to think of these things, seemed to him of great importance; they would do well to encourage social study circles in their churches, and he welcomed that resolution because he hoped it would, amongst other things, recommend, urge, and develop that kind of work. There was a great deal too much social agnosticism amongst their young people. They were willing—not too willing, not as willing as one would sometimes wish—to help in mission work or to put their hands to this or that definite practical piece of work, but as in theology so in economics, a great many seemed to think it was not possible to come to any definite reasoned conviction. He felt that in addition to theological discussion the consideration of social and economic questions ought to find a place in all their churches, and it was because that resolution, as he understood it, would assist in that direction, he had the greatest pleasure in seconding it.

Mr. EDGAR WORTHINGTON said that the proposer and seconder had splendidly supported the first part of the resolution that these things should be debated amongst their churches, but he perceived the danger of undertaking definite practical work, and there were agencies outside which they could join without setting up another. If the resolution was put in its present form he should be forced to vote against it; but if the second part was dropped he would cordially support it.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON supported the resolution. Was it possible, he asked, to divide the worship of God from the service of man? Was it not perfectly clear if they were to worship God really they must all engage in the service of man, and how could they better do that than by taking counsel together as to definite practical work on these matters, which this resolution called upon them to do? They who were supporting the resolution, and were anxious the Conference should approve of the formation of such a Union, desired that they should have behind the individual work the collective inspiration and force of the church life which they all united in. They believed, as Mr. Wicksteed so finely put it, that was the best and strongest force to attack and defeat the evils which had been so eloquently exposed. They were, most of them, aware that in addition to social movements, most other religious communities had formed associations of this character, and he thought their own had a part to play in this second to none of them. He hoped the Conference would pass the resolution without a dissentient voice.

The resolution was then put to the Conference and carried.

Of the Rev. J. H. Weatherall's Sermons Preached in Bank-street Chapel (G. Winterburn, 65, Deansgate, Bolton. 1d. each.), Nos. 8 and 9 are on "The Book of Life" and "Self-Development." These sermons are printed in good type and in novel form, with a long narrow page, so that the sermon will slip easily into one's pocket. "The pages in the Book of Life wherein Pain and Death are written, teach us then to think of our life in terms of God and Immortality. In them we learn to know that neither life nor death can separate us from the love of God; and we know that love deepest through the very affections that made death seem most terrible. Our untrained human nature feels acutely the anguish of loss, the pain of parting, the certainty, too, that we must go hence; for we walk by sight more than by faith; affliction is the pressure of actual experience, and the spiritual interpretation is less vivid, a faint and distant glimpse of a happy hope. Yet though sorrow endure, it is for a night only, and joy cometh with the morning."

THURSDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

On Thursday morning, April 19, came the news of the appalling calamity which had befallen San Francisco. The morning devotional service in the hall of meeting was conducted by the Revs. J. Crowther Hirst and J. A. Kelly, the former of whom gave the address. At the Conference which followed, on "The Outlook of Liberal Religion," the chair was taken by the Right Hon. William Kenrick.

Dr. J. EDWIN ODGERS, immediately on the chair being taken, spoke a few words, deeply moved, concerning San Francisco. The city, he said, was a mass of burning ruins, shattered by earthquake, and their first thought must be of sympathy with those who were waiting tidings from the doomed city, not knowing whether their beloved ones were dead or alive. San Francisco had been a home and the pioneer station of Liberal Faith in the Far West. With it was associated the great name of Starr King, commemorated in one of the giant peaks of the West. He trusted they might be able to get a message through to one of the Unitarian Ministers of America. He proposed on behalf of the Conference to send a message of their profound sympathy, and at once left the meeting and telegraphed to the Rev. Bradford Leavitt:—"To Leavitt, First Unitarian Church, San Francisco. The Conference of Liberal Churches, Oxford, mourns with you." The telegraph authorities could promise nothing as to the delivery of the message, and it was probably some days before it reached its destination; but the hand of sympathy was stretched out, and our brethren would know at the earliest possible moment that in the Assembly of our National Conference, we had thought of them.

Mr. KENRICK in introducing the readers of the three papers for that morning's conference, spoke with satisfaction of the marked improvement in the tone of religious discussion as now carried on, without the polemic acrimony which characterised it a hundred years ago. Men who engaged in controversy were now like brothers seeking for the truth, not opponents wishing to discredit one another. That was an impression he gained from a study of the Hibbert Journal in which they had representatives of the West and the Far East side by side, each temperately and reverently expounding his own view of truth. And he noted also how those who still held to the ancient formulas of the Church desired to put into them something of the spirit and feeling of to-day. That also was a sign of life and progress.

The first paper, on "The Outlook of Liberal Religion," was read by the Rev. L. P. JACKS, of Manchester College, Editor of the Hibbert Journal, who said that the title of his paper as set down in the programme had been given under a misapprehension of the scope of that morning's discussion, and he should deal with the subject as a whole. The second paper, on the "Present Relations Between Theosophy and Philosophy" was by the Rev. Dr. HASTINGS RASHDALL, Fellow and Tutor of New College, one of the contributors to Contentio Veritatis. The third, on "The Liberal Movement in the Free Churches," was by the Rev. T. RHONDDA WILLIAMS, minister of the Greenfield Congregational Church, Bradford.

THE OUTLOOK FOR LIBERAL RELIGION.

By THE REV. LAWRENCE P. JACKS, M.A.

WHEN we consider the outlook for religion at the present day, it seems to me that our habit is to confine ourselves too exclusively to the academic side of the question. We are apt to look only to the world of pure ideas, as though upon them alone depended the fate of the beliefs and the hopes that we cherish. We ask what the philosophers have been recently saying; we consider the great books which have just issued from the universities; we study the last phases of liberal or other theology; we recall the utterances of leading churchmen, and putting all these things together we survey the tendencies of thought, and according to their direction we cast the horoscope of the faith. Now I would be the last of all men to under-rate the immense importance of everything that belongs to the world of pure ideas. To deny the power of pure ideas is to show our ignorance of history, which is nothing less than culpable. But the changes that pass over the thoughts and ideas of men are only symptoms of deeper changes going on in the substance and structure of human life itself: the intellectual history of the time, where we are wont to look exclusively for the key to our problem, is after all but the index of a much vaster process in human affairs. And it is to these deeper and wider things that we must look when we ask about the prospects of religion. We must not reason as though the question were affected by changed conditions of thought alone; we must remember, also, the changed conditions of human life in its widest sense, and seek in these for light upon the problem before us.

Now of all the changes in the general conditions of human life which our times have witnessed, the greatest and the most hopeful change, the change which it most behoves the churches to ponder, is that religion and virtue are both being democratised. The custody of the moral ideal has passed from the exclusive care of the churches, and become the acknowledged charge of the whole social body. As men of the churches the most we can claim is that we share in a general concern for righteousness, in which politicians, men of science, captains of industry, artists and artisans enter on equal terms with ourselves. Enter the world along the line of any of its great social activities, and you will find no point at which the church is justified in gathering up the skirts of its self-esteem. That world has passed the stage of moral infancy; it is attaining unto manhood, and embarked with splendid independence on a thousand enterprises for the things of the Spirit; it asks no longer for the consecration of official religions; it has its own ideals, and is confident in its own resources for realising them. What wonder, then, that it often treats the churches with scanty respect when it finds their spokesmen still addressing laymen in the language of childhood, still offering them the spoon-meat of moral platitudes, still teaching them to walk in the go-cart of obsolete dogma, still birching them with pulpit denunciations against the vices and abuses of a wicked world. The churchman still persists in his laudable attempt to teach the world, often ignoring the tremendous fact that in some respects the world has actually passed beyond the range of his teaching. The church still goes on judging, not perceiving that its turn has now come to be judged.

I submit that the outstanding feature of our times is the deepening moral earnestness of the masses of the people. "I am disposed to think," said the late Professor Bruce, of Glasgow, "that a great and steadily increasing portion of the moral worth of society is outside the organised churches, not by godlessness, but rather by exceptional earnestness." It is not only the worse elements of society that drift away from the churches; that would be intelligible in any case; but the better elements are drifting with them. They are drifting from the churches because they have become infected with a moral idealism with which the churches themselves are scarcely keeping pace. It is the faith of the present speaker that moral idealism is a growing, and not as some faithless hearts believe, a declining factor, in the life of Society. Character is tending towards higher levels; the moral arm is gathering to itself new increments of force; the enterprises of goodness are becoming more daring in their scope and more successful in their issues. Virtue itself is being democratised; the masses of the people are organising themselves for justice, temperance, and other ethical ends, and instead of waiting passively for others to do them good are themselves intent on doing good to others.

I truly grant that this is not easy to prove. It would be no difficult task to draw up a terrible indictment against the vices of the present age. The facts are so complex and the field so wide that room exists for any number of vague generalities on either side. You may espouse optimism and pessimism, and whichever side you take enough evidence will be at hand to justify your choice. Nevertheless, one may note with satisfaction that the best and most vigorous minds of the age are no longer employed in pouring out the vials of their wrath upon a wicked world. When we compare the prevalent note of leading thinkers to-day with what it was when Carlyle wrote Past and Present, or when Ruskin began his great jeremiad, we feel a change like that from winter to spring. There is a great stirring of hope in the world. The crying of "Woe to Jerusalem" is becoming more and more the function of the minor prophets. The great ones among us are sounding another note. They plead no longer for the obliteration of the past; they cry out no longer for a second deluge to drown the work of the ages. That work they tell us is the work of Reason, and as such a sure and true foundation on which Reason may continue to build. And the building is going on—going on with greater ardour and speed than ever before. We have not to begin the work of progress all over again. We have only to continue in the sure and certain hope that the next phase will be better than the present, and the next beyond better still.

But still, my proposition that noble living is on the increase is hard to prove. I might indeed appeal with some confidence to your personal experience. Do not the instances of human goodness seem to multiply upon your vision in whatever direction you look? Can you live a single day without being astonished by some fresh tale of human heroism? Can you associate with any class of men in politics, in science, in arms, in industry, in medicine, in law, in art without being impressed and perhaps put to shame by the richness and variety of lofty characters that abound in each. It is only a jaundiced eye that can find nothing but self-seeking in the familiar activities of the world. To a healthier vision these will be found rich in examples of self-devotion, public spirit, noble idealism, patient endurance, and splendid courage. Take up any of the great biographies of recent times—Huxley, Burne-Jones, Henry Sidgwick, Gladstone—and remember that these men are not outstanding exceptions from their class, but types of that class, representatives of thousands and tens of thousands like-minded with themselves, who live their lives in narrower circles, and leave no biographer to tell the world their virtues, and surely you then must feel that the human race has no reason to be ashamed of its latest fruits.

But all this, you will remind me, is not argument, and proves nothing. I am but appealing to a partial impression, which might be offset by a partial impression of another kind. Let us then try another, and perhaps, a safer line. I am one of those who feel, and feel more deeply as I grow older, that the most wonderful thing in all our experience is the mere carrying on of the world from day to day. Of all the works of man society itself is the greatest and most astonishing. The simplest community of men is, in the inner structure, a miracle of contrivance, in the complexity of its inner relations, in the balance and adjustment of its parts. What shall we say then of the social world as it exists before our eyes? Viewed as a mere mechanism—though the figure is far from adequate—human society is the wonder of wonders. What maintains the mighty fabric? What keeps its myriad activities in some kind of harmonious movement from day to day? Where shall we look for the secret of its stability and its conformity? What is the source of the energy that flows into its thousand channels? What is the welding force that saves its countless units from instant and irretrievable dispersion? I am as certain as I ever can be of anything in this world, that the answer to all these questions lies in the moral attributes of man. Who doubts that society depends for its very existence from moment to moment on the characters of good men and women? The bare fact that society does exist, that the world is carried on, is a standing proof that selfishness and its kindred vices are not supreme. When I come down in the morning and learn from the newspaper on my breakfast table that society is still going on, I have all the evidence I want to prove not only that moral reason is still alive, but that it still triumphs over all its foes. The counterpart to the maintenance of these activities, in all the complexity and fine harmony of their inter-relations, is the existence somewhere of a vast and indefeasible fund of probity, justice, sincerity, unselfishness and love. And when, further, I notice how the total mass goes on increasing, how the streams of social energy add to their volume day by day, how as the years go by hundreds of new purposes start into action, how the inter-connections become ever more complex, how the fate of the whole becomes dependent on ever-subtler conditions, how the range of social activity is for ever widening, how new enterprises for human welfare are continually coming to birth, how, in a word, the problem of carrying on the world is hourly becoming yet more stupendous, and yet more exigent in the demands it makes on the moral fund—what can prevent me from drawing the inference that character, and all that character implies, is a waxing and not a waning force in the affairs of men?

These, then, are some of the changed conditions which confront the Liberal Faith to-day. Society has passed beyond the stage of its moral leading strings. There is a Christianity which stands outside the churches altogether. For thousands of the best men and women religion has ceased to be synonymous with going to church. It is not that the church is becoming less Christian, but the world, thank God, is becoming more Christian. Vast spiritual developments are going on in society at large, in which the church may share, but which she cannot claim as exclusively her own. The work of moral reformation is becoming less and less the work of the church considered as a separate institution, and more and more the work of the universal institution, which is constituted by the social organisms and into which the church enters as a component member. The notion that the church stands as the solitary witness for righteousness, in a world given over to corruption and wickedness, is a notion we should dismiss from our minds, for it will lead us into serious errors.

In face of these conditions, what is our policy? I submit that it remains substantially what it was. We have not kept pace with the times. In an age when the higher life is becoming more and more independent of churches, we still continue to do our work through the conventional apparatus of church-life. The agent by whom we work is the settled minister: the scene of our operations is within the same walls our fathers reared; it is the pulpit on which we still mainly rely. Nothing that I am going to say must be construed as involving the least breath of disparagement in regard to the settled minister and his work. As holder of the fort he has filled, and is still filling a part, for which no terms of honour are too high. But in those days, when the whole world is opening before us, and the great secular activities of education and social reform marching on ahead of us, I contend that a policy of holding the fort, no matter how heroic the defenders may be, is not enough. I shall contend that in order to cope with the conditions before us, we need a greater freedom from what I call, without the least disrespect, the conventional apparatus of church life.

But first let me illustrate the position by referring to that central problem which has now become so serious for every church in Christendom: I mean, of course, the supply of ministers. We all know and feel this problem to be fundamental. We know that unless we can solve this we can solve none of the rest; but that if we solve this, all the rest will solve themselves. If the best men are attracted into other vocations, and the church becomes a profession for mediocre ability, for tepid enthusiasm, and for character cast in something lower than the grandest and most heroic mould, then I do not see how it is possible for any church to maintain its position in the modern world, and all those phenomena of failure, disappointment, and languishing life of which we hear so much, instead of being perplexing or unintelligible, are precisely the phenomena we ought to expect. On one condition only can the churches carry on—that the best men offer themselves to the service of the church. In the absence of this condition it really makes little difference what form of theology, orthodox or heterodox, is in the ascendant for the time being; for no form of theology will make much impression on the modern world unless it can find an exponent in the noblest character of the time.

Now, if the case were that moral idealism were still the exclusive property of churches, the problem would solve itself. Every ardent youth in whom the spirit of moral idealism was a living force would tend towards the ministry as his natural vocation. In bygone ages this has been the actual state of the case. When the spirit of Christ was first contending with the barbarism of Europe, there was practically no other way in which the life purpose of a lofty soul could be fulfilled. And in times much nearer our own, when the ardour of Christian faith and love had cut many a deep channel into the heart of the secular world, it was still in the church that "men of good will" found their sublimest opportunity. But the world of our day has witnessed a great change in these conditions. There has grown up in what are called secular spheres a vast unformulated religion, which, though it has no official expression, no organisation, no self-consciousness even, is yet nurturing the finest characters and producing perhaps the richest harvest of good works the human race has ever seen. "Why do not the best of our young men give themselves to the service of religion?" is a question constantly heard. I answer that they do give themselves to the service of religion in greater numbers than in any previous age, but the religion to which they give themselves is not the official religion of the churches. Upon that religion many of them look askance, and I am bound to confess the opinion that not infrequently they have excellent reasons for so doing. They observe that the churches are spending a large portion of their energies on matters which are not relevant to the highest interests of mankind. They are offended by language which seems susceptible of equivocal values. They shrink from a position in which they would have to prove their sincerity. They will not face the moral casuistry suspected in the situation. And so they turn away from the service of the churches, not because they have been seduced by what is lower, but because they feel the attraction of what is, or at least seems to be, higher. The day is gone for ever when noble character found a solitary vocation in the ranks of the churches. We are not living in the age of Ignatius Loyola. We are living in the age of Arnold Toynbee. Of the splendid succession of gifted youths who came under the influence of the late Master of Balliol, what a small proportion found their way into the official ministry of religion! I quote this solitary example, but it is an example of which one may truly say Ex uno disce omnia. We may enlarge the scope of the words I have quoted from Professor Bruce. It is not by indifference but by moral earnestness that many of our best men decline the service of the church.

I have alluded to this burning question of the ministerial supply, because it seems to afford the best illustration of the general theme I am anxious to bring before you. If it be true, as Professor Bruce says, that the masses are outside the churches more by moral earnestness than by indifference, it is also true that moral earnestness is the ultimate reason why the best of our young men are declining the vocation of the ministry. The fact is that the churches are falling behind the highest levels of moral enthusiasm and power; the secular world is passing on ahead of the church; and this has come about, not so much because the church has slackened her pace as because the secular world, thanks be to God, has quickened hers. It might, indeed, be urged with considerable truth that all those activities, such as education and social reform, which are now attracting the highest character and intellect in society, are themselves the offspring and creation of the churches. But even if that be the whole truth of the matter, it makes no difference whatever to the facts we are considering. The case would then be that the church is failing to keep up with the movement herself has created; the pupil has surpassed the teacher; the children have outstripped the parent.

What then shall the churches do? How shall they meet the new conditions? Must they regard their work as done; must they pass on their mission to the ethical forces newly born in the secular world, and, with a cry of "These must increase, but we must decrease," must they silently acquiesce in their own extinction?

That is not my view. I think that this is the weakest and blindest solution of the problem that could possibly be offered. At the same time I must confess that the problem as a whole seems to me to lie beyond us: human contrivance is inadequate to its perfect solution. What the churches need is a re-baptism "with the Holy Ghost and with fire," and it is beyond the reader of the present paper to tell you how this may be procured. If, therefore, you hold a pistol to my head and bid me produce a formula which shall lay the ghost I have raised, the only answer I can make is to bid you pull the trigger, for I cannot respond to your challenge.

But while I cannot produce this formula, and while also the formula would not be worth your attention even if I could produce it, there are many directions in which we may bestir ourselves with advantage.

The policy of the churches need not be one of mere inaction. If we cannot find the perfect remedy for our difficulties, we may perhaps do something towards removing the obstacles which prevent the perfect remedy from finding us. For the life of the church is beset by obstacles, many of them of its own creation, and it is just because of these that she is forced to lag behind in the race of spiritual evolution. Many of the channels by which increase of spiritual life might come to her have been blocked up; the wheels are clogged in many places; the flues want sweeping; and the fires are being stoked with very questionable coal. Let us address ourselves to these humble problems, and then perhaps we shall be greeted one day by a happy surprise. We shall feel the good ship beneath us begin to move; we shall hear once more the throb of her engines; we shall see the great propeller churning up the waters of the deep.

Of the obstacles at present impeding us I shall mention only two. In the first place, I shall submit that religion is overburdened by establishments; in the second place, the churches, including our own, are too much in bondage to the letter.

First, then, religion is overburdened by establishments. No religious awakening has ever proceeded, or ever can proceed, from a basis of vested interests or of worldly cares. But—and here let me say I am speaking not of any one church, but of them all—vested interests and worldly cares are the great heritage of the churches of our day. These interests and these cares produce a crop of secular ambitions more or less respectable; but, far from producing new spiritual life, they divert the vital force from religion altogether. There is so much property to manage, so many privileges to guard, so many fabrics to maintain, so many organisations to work, so many institutions to keep up, so much money to provide, so many machines to keep going, so many committees to attend, so many speeches to make, that the wonder is that any life or thought should be left over for the great central business of religion. I have made some inquiry among various denominations, and I do not find much difference among them in this respect. Everywhere you find the same conditions—a powerful army whose energies are used up in looking after a huge and cumbersome baggage train of more or less irrelevant concerns. Such conditions produce busybodies; but the prophet ariseth not. Religion has to be satisfied with the leavings of the committees. It is idle to plead that these activities are the natural and necessary expression of the religious life. We who have had to do with them have not found it so. We have seen the soul of the churches frittering itself away in a day of small things; and against our own wills we have ourselves been swept into the stream of tendency, and compelled to join in the process. We have "groaned within ourselves, being burdened," but we have looked in vain for the deliverer.

Secondly. We are still too much in bondage to the letter. In saying this, I am not blind to the degree of emancipation already attained. In all churches, not excepting the Roman Catholic, the tendency is to attach less and less importance to what is called "mere dogma." Indeed, there is reason to fear that in some quarters the tendency has run too far, the disparagement of dogma having become a parrot-cry. Be that as it may, there can be no doubt that ministers of religion generally are less inclined to emphasise theological differences; the laymen in the churches are even less concerned than their ministers; while the great mass of laymen outside the churches regard the whole question with a contempt it scarcely deserves. They look upon it as a kind of nuisance which good manners require them to tolerate. This spread of "Liberal Views," as they are called, is a fact so obvious that it would be a waste of labour to demonstrate it. At the same time I think we are in danger of placing a wrong estimate upon the meaning of this phenomenon. Regarded by itself, I see no reason to expect that the spread of liberal views will lead to any great moral reformation or to any re-awakening of the religious life. Liberal views considered merely as such have no competence to save the world. You may convert the whole of society to Liberalism, but it does not follow that you have done society any good. Unless liberal views come to us charged with some positive life, which the term Liberalism does not describe, they have little effect as either moral or spiritual forces. This is the point at which our insight seems frequently to fail us. In discussing the relation between religion and theology, we are generally right when the theology under consideration is that of other people; but with regard to our own theology our attitude is not always so just. We accept the principles of "Sartor Resartus." Theology, we say, is the mere cloth garment of religion. What we are apt to forget is that, however liberal our theology may be, it remains a cloth garment still. We flatter ourselves that if only we make our views liberal enough they will pass out of the category of clothes and be transformed into some kind of living thing. They will do nothing of the sort. When our liberal education is complete, we shall still be confronted with the question, "what is the kind of inner life which these views of yours strive to cover and to express. Is it a thing of power? Or is it some sort of stuffed image?" Nay, these questions are more pressing for us liberals than they are even for others. To adopt liberal views is to involve oneself in vast obligations. For whereas under other conditions the problem often becomes the very simple one of making the clothes fit the life, for us it assumes the far more formidable character of making the life fit the clothes. We liberals sometimes overlook the obvious fact that religion needs feeding as well as clothing. We are so pleased with these new garments of ours, and spend so much time in showing them off before the gaze of an admiring world that we forget the first principles of good husbandry. The larder remains empty, and religion languishes for want of daily bread. Holding liberal views does not always mean that we are emancipated from bondage to the letter. There is a liberal letter as well as a dogmatic letter, and it is as easy to become a slave to the first as to the second. Nay, it is easier, and for this reason: These liberal views of ours are so splendid in their class, they embody such "grand ideas," they are capable of such noble expression, they use so little of the dry language of the head, and borrow so much from the deeper language of the heart that we are apt to take them for something more than "views," and to fancy that they possess the charm which can remove mountains and still the angry waves. It is a dangerous delusion, and one which has already caused us to suffer. Of one thing we may rest perfectly assured. The great mass of thoughtful laymen who now stand outside the churches do not attach the same importance to our liberal views that we do. They do not feel more attracted to us merely because we hold liberal views, and no mere extension or development of our Liberalism will ever avail to bring them back. "Views" are not what these men want, and it makes very little difference to them whether those we have to offer are liberal or anything else. These men want power, they want inspiration, they want spiritual life. They are in search not so much of ideas as of ideals which shall speak to them with authority. And if they cannot get these things inside the churches they will get them elsewhere, for have them they must and will. Yes, they are getting them now. Let it not be supposed for an instant that these men, who, as Professor Bruce says, are outside the churches, not by indifference, but by moral earnestness: let it not be supposed that they are suffering their souls to starve. They have meat to eat that we churchmen wot not of.

Here, then, are two of the causes which seem to me to be retarding our work. First, there is the overburden of establishments; and, second, an excessive concern for the theological apparatus. Thanks to these two, the position of the churches to-day is not unlike that of a man in armour on a modern battlefield. The best men of our time, the men who are willing and anxious to fight God's battles, are nevertheless reluctant to place themselves in a position where that cumbrous armour would have to be worn. That is one reason why many churches are so empty and many pulpits occupied by men who are scarcely fitted for their position. The time has therefore come when it behoves churchmen to seriously consider whether the traditional mechanism of church life is always essential to their work. I would plead that the two ideas—the idea of religious life, on the one hand, and of church mechanism on the other—should be held in greater detachment from one another than has hitherto been the case. Without prejudice to these aspects of religion which need a church and a settled ministry we must learn that under certain conditions, which are exceedingly common just now, the church apparatus is far more of a hindrance than a help.

Some such idea as this seems to have been present to that remarkable man who founded the Salvation Army. Whatever we may think of its methods, there is no denying that the Salvation Army has known all along what it wanted, and succeeded in getting what it wanted beyond any religious movement of modern times. What is the secret of this stupendous success? It lies mainly in the fact that the movement proceeds from a conception of Christian duty and not of Christian doctrine. It has sought to prove the redeeming love of God in the only way in which it can be proved, viz., by exercising it towards those whose need of it is greatest. It has been concerned with the souls of men and not with the abstract problems of theology. While we have been debating the relations of religion with science and culture, as though the fate of religion depended on such things alone, the Salvation Army, leaving all these controversies on one side, has been engaged in a great work of reformation, and has left a mark on the social and religious history of the times which will never be blotted out. Consistently with these aims General Booth started upon his victorious march with the lightest possible equipment. He disembarrassed himself from the outset of that huge baggage train of views, creeds, and establishments which the churches insist upon dragging with them into the field. Thus disencumbered, the Army has been able to push its advance all along the line; and, instead of acting on the defensive, or waiting "for things to come its way," as so many of us are doing, has penetrated deep into the enemy's country, and has delivered a ringing attack on the evils of its day and generation. I am told that these conditions have recently changed, that here also a great establishment is coming into existence; and, if this be true, I should doubt whether the future of the Army will be quite as splendid as its past. But have we of the liberal faith nothing to learn from all this? I do not suggest that we should make a parade of religious soldiery or march up and down the streets with drums and trumpets. But I do suggest that we may learn from the Salvation Army to study and to practise the art of attack. It is my firm belief that we must attack if we would win; an attack is precisely the operation which our present encumbrances make it so difficult for us to accomplish. You may think that I am pleading for aggressive theological propaganda. I assure you that I mean nothing of the sort. There has been no aggressive theological propaganda about the Salvation Army. There has been none about those splendid domestic missions which my own communion has instituted. These also are attacking agencies, and they constitute, in my opinion, the most important and successful part of our work. As originally projected by Dr. Tuckerman, they were designed simply and solely for the purpose of attack—attack not upon divergent theologies, but upon the vice and misery of the world. And has not the result justified the method?

But this is only an isolated instance of what might become a far more general policy. Some years ago I threw out a suggestion, which, at the time, created more amusement than serious belief, for the establishment of "preaching brotherhoods," who should do the work of evangelists up and down the country untrammelled by the conventional apparatus of a church. The address I gave was printed, and if any one should yet feel the slightest interest in the matter, I believe that plenty of copies exist among the waste paper in the lumber rooms of Manchester College. Beyond a few personal friends with whom I talked the matter over, I have scarcely heard of a single person who was in the least impressed by the idea. But that this is what we shall ultimately come to I am as fully persuaded as I was when the idea first shaped itself in my mind. Into the details of this proposal I shall not enter now; for are they not all written down on the waste paper aforesaid? I am not in the least discouraged by the alleged impracticability of the scheme. The fact that this scheme would have no attraction to brilliant young men anxious for a career is not worth a moment's consideration. There are plenty of noble youths in the land who rate such things at their proper worth; young men deeply touched with the religious spirit, to whom the bare idea of making a career out of religion is perfectly odious, and who for that very reason will have nothing to do with the ministry of any church. If there is one form of faithlessness more pitiable than another, it is that which condemns a scheme as impracticable merely because it puts too high a demand on the powers of goodness and self-denial. You can find men good enough, brave enough, self-denying enough for anything, and never were there so many of them as there are to-day. The reason we do not find them is that we have not the courage to appeal to them. And that is why I yet continue to hope for the advent in these latter days of a new form of Christian ministry, a ministry equipped for attack upon the powers of darkness and the sorrows of the world, a ministry whose form shall be as old as it is new, for it shall return to the conditions which were at the beginning, when the Lord sent forth the seventy two and two before him, into every city and place whither he himself would come, saying unto them, "The harvest is plenteous but the labourers are few. Go your ways; carry no purse, no wallet, no shoes; and salute no man by the way."

THE RELATIONS BETWEEN PHILOSOPHY AND THEOLOGY.

BY THE REV. DR. RASHDALL.

LIBERAL Theology has two sides—a positive side and a negative one. As far as the negative side of it goes, I do not imagine that anyone could well wish that its progress should be much faster than it has been during the past few years. The work—the necessary and inevitable work—of getting rid of unreasonable and impossible beliefs has gone on apace. But I shall assume that what we are all most interested in is the question how far the place of the old and impossible is being taken by other beliefs equally positive, equally religious, equally practical, but truer, more reasonable, more durable; and how we are to secure that shall be the case in future. There are two principal forms which the needful reconstruction of Theology must take. Firstly, we have got to ascertain the historical facts connected with the Old and New Testaments, the life of Jesus Christ, and the early history of Christianity. That is the task upon which most of those usually designated by the term "professional Theologian" are engaged; and assuredly I have no desire or intention to disparage the importance of that task. But on the present occasion I would venture to direct your attention to another side of Theology with which my own studies have been more especially connected. I would ask you to consider on what basis that central and fundamental belief in God which is the presupposition of all other Theology is henceforth to rest. I will not waste time in showing that it cannot henceforth rest, if it ever could do so, upon the authority of an infallible book, or an infallible Church, or upon the evidence of miracles historically proved. The most unqualified and uncompromising believers in miracles at the present day are eager to assert that even the specific doctrines of Christianity cannot rest primarily upon the evidence of miracles—still less the belief in God. Nor can the belief in God be treated now, as it could be in the days of Bishop Butler, as something which was not seriously doubted by anyone. It is precisely about this fundamental belief that most doubt is likely to be felt by minds which have moved at all far from traditional moorings.

It becomes, then, a matter of vital importance to consider on what this great belief in God is ultimately to rest. In the future, as in the past, the belief of individuals will always rest to a large extent upon tradition or authority of one kind or another. But the belief of communities cannot. The belief of those who think in the long run extends itself to those who do not. Theism can only survive if it commends itself to the Reason and Consciences of individuals. No doubt by some the claim will be made for a direct and immediate knowledge of God.

It can hardly be contended that such an intuitive knowledge of God is universal in presence of the fact that thousands of Burmans and Chinamen and Japanese (to say nothing of lower stages of culture) do not appear to possess it. It will hardly be contended that it exists in most European minds which are not decidedly religious; and some minds to which the name religious will hardly be denied are unconscious of its presence. For John Henry Newman and James Martineau the belief in God rested upon inference, not upon immediate intuition. And even for minds which do claim an intuitive knowledge of God, that apparent intuition does not always permanently exclude doubt. For minds once opened to speculative objections, the difficulty is precisely this—how far such apparent intuitions can be trusted, how our strong personal conviction of a truth can be a reason for believing it true. And the answer given to that question, whatever it may be, must involve some sort of reasoned inquiry into the nature of the Universe and the nature of our knowledge of it. In other words, the answer to such doubts must constitute a Philosophy.

Where, then, it may be asked, are we to find the Philosophy which we desiderate as the basis of Theistic and therefore of any form of Christian Theology? Sir Leslie Stephen has pointed out that the theistic belief of most thoughtful and emancipated minds in the eighteenth and early nineteenth centuries rested mainly upon that argument from design of which Paley's Natural Theology is the classical exposition. I need not point out the well-known difficulties which the Darwinian doctrine as to the origin of species has created for that form of theistic argument. I do not think that anyone who reads the early chapters of von Hartmann's Philosophy of the Unconscious will be disposed to say that that argument has been destroyed by Darwinism, and few who accept von Hartmann's demonstration that the Universe is purposeful are likely to agree with him that the purpose is that of an unconscious Will, which created the world in a momentary fit of bad temper. But certainly Darwinism has compelled us to reconstruct the argument. It has destroyed its ready availability and popular effectiveness. Taken by itself, it is hardly likely to convince a mind otherwise satisfied by a materialistic or naturalistic account of the Universe.

A line of argument which is less affected by recent scientific advance is the argument which may best be described as the argument from Causality—the argument which, starting with Hume's demonstration (if I may venture to call it so) that in Nature we discover nothing but succession, not causality, goes on to assert that in our own wills we do discover such a real causality, and to infer that the ultimate cause of the phenomena which are certainly not caused by our own wills must be something like our wills—a Being who is conscious and rational and purposeful like ourselves, however inadequate those terms may be to describe the nature of that ultimate source of all reality. This argument, of which Berkeley is perhaps the most famous exponent, will be best known to many in the form given it by Martineau. It has been out of fashion of late years with thinkers who, after Kant, try to reduce causality to a relation of necessary connexion between phenomena. It is, to my mind, of great importance to the interests of rational religious belief that the idea of causal activity in Mind has again found champions of whom it is impossible to speak disrespectfully—such as Professor Ward of Cambridge and Professor Stout of St. Andrews, to name only two representatives of a very general tendency.

The doctrine that Will is the only true cause does not necessarily and immediately require Idealism as its basis. In Martineau himself it is found, as everyone knows, in conjunction with an uncompromising belief in Matter—in the existence of a Matter which is quite independent of any and every mind. And yet the unsatisfactoriness of Martineau's position seems to me to lie just in this element of his thought. To maintain that matter can exist without a mind, but that it cannot do anything without being acted upon from without by a mind seems to me to involve a sharp distinction between matter and its properties which in the present state of Physical Science is peculiarly difficult. The whole tendency of modern Physics is to make the idea of Force inseparable from the idea of Matter, if not actually to merge the idea of Matter in that of Force. Materialism has been called the Philosophy of an abstraction. Martineau assuredly was no Materialist, but he seems to have retained to the last this abstract idea of matter as a blind, inert thing, almost without any properties, at all events without inherent force, which he had inherited from an empirical Philosophy very uncongenial to the real tendencies of his matured thought.

The argument from Causality points to Theism; but I doubt if that argument can be made absolutely complete and irrefragable for anybody who is not prepared to go a step further and say not merely that without mind you cannot explain movement or change or life, but that the very idea of Matter without Mind is unintelligible and self-contradictory. Berkeley, I believe, with all his mistakes and inadequacies, has laid down for all time the true basis of the Theistic argument. I recognise the truth of much of the criticism which Kant and his followers have bestowed upon Berkeley. I recognise the mistakes into which his Lockian antecedents led him—the impossibility of reducing space or the objective world of things in space to a mass of sensations—the importance in the constitution of the world which we know of the “categories” or forms of thought discovered by Kant and of others which he did not discover. I recognise that the Idealism of modern Philosophy is not and cannot be the sensationalistic Idealism of Berkeley. Nevertheless, I believe Berkeley to be the true Father of Idealism. Without Berkeley Kant and Hegel and Lotze would have been impossible. The truth which Berkeley saw, and of which nobody had more than glimpses before Berkeley, is the real reply to Materialism and to Naturalism, though that reply requires to be restated in the light of other truths which Berkeley did not see. Idealism, as it has become for post-Berkeleyan thinkers, leads directly to Theism. If Matter cannot exist without Mind, if the world is made up of a content which is supplied by feelings and relations which can exist only for thought, if (in the words of Mr. Bradley) nothing exists but experience, it certainly cannot be your mind or mine that constitutes a world that existed so long before we were born, and of which we even now apprehend so small a part. There must be another mind, a universal Mind, in which and for which alone the world can exist.

If those who have most clearly seen this truth have not always avowed Theism of a type which will satisfy the genuinely theistic mind, that has been largely because they have stopped short with the argument which leads up to the idea of God as a universal Thinker, and have not combined it with that other argument from the idea of Causality which led Berkeley and Martineau to the idea of God as a universal Will. This was eminently the case with the great Oxford teacher, to whom the higher religious thought of the present day owes so much, my own revered teacher, Thomas Hill Green. The world, as he conceived it, was the thought of God; but God did not make or cause the world, except in the sense in which your mind or mine may be said to “make” that limited portion of the world which we know. He was full of the idea of final causality, of the idea that the Universe has a meaning and a rational purpose; yet he saw insuperable difficulties in the way of thinking that God wills the course of things to be what it is. When I was an undergraduate, the Philosophy which I desiderated was a sort of re-writing of Martineau in the light of what I had learnt from Green, or of Green in the light of that causative conception of God which I found not indeed in Martineau (for his great book on Religion was not then published), but in older writers to whom Martineau owed, on this side of his thought, his inspiration. Fortunately, the defects which I noted in the then prevalent Idealism have largely been corrected by later thinkers. Lotze has come to exercise in England the influence which he had already exercised in Germany. Even thinkers otherwise more or less Hegelian have begun to recognise that the Will cannot be reduced either to mere feeling or to mere thought. When I read Professor Ward’s “Naturalism and Agnosticism,” I felt that, though the book is chiefly devoted to criticism and the constructive part of it is somewhat slightly sketched, here was the genuinely theistic Philosophy which I had been in search of.

You will excuse the appearance of dogmatism which such a personal confession of belief, almost unsupported by argument and undefended against criticism must, I fear, inevitably wear. But it was necessary to bring me to the point of my paper. I know that not all the philosophy of the present day is Theistic, but I think it may fairly be said that as against Materialism or a Naturalism of the kind which is but a veiled Materialism we are able to point to a very general consensus of the experts, and that the tendency of the majority is towards an Idealism which implies more or less distinctly a theistic view of the universe. And that brings me to the practical suggestion which I want to make to you, and that is the importance to teachers of Religion of being—up to the level of their leisure and opportunity—students of Metaphysic. Moreover, they cannot promote the interests of reasonable Religion better than by promoting the study of Philosophy of the kind to which I have pointed among the more educated and intellectual men and women whom they can influence. Philosophy, more than any other study, undermines superstition and credulity, while it fortifies the mind against Materialism and Agnosticism. The time was, perhaps, when those who valued above all things continued attachment to traditional beliefs might have had plausible grounds for discouraging serious thinking as the best means of saving faith. I am quite sure that for very large classes at least that time has gone by. Scepticism can be picked up now without much thinking. Among undergraduates, for instance, the unsettlement which used to begin—at least, so it was supposed—with the reading of Litteræ Humaniores, has generally begun, for those who are that way inclined, long before that period. No doubt we cannot by any possibility secure that thinking will always end in the adoption of the opinions which we ourselves think true. But, for people above a certain level of culture and intelligence, I do hold that we are justified in expecting that to promote serious thinking is more likely to build up than to destroy. It was a sagacious remark of Liddon’s, in 1868, that “the real battle-ground in modern Oxford is not so much Theology as mental Philosophy.” He need not, perhaps, have limited his remark to Oxford. Since his time, Mill and Bain, who were his bugbears, have ceased to dominate the philosophical Lecture-rooms of Oxford and of the English-speaking world. Orthodoxy of the type which Liddon would have approved is, no doubt, weaker at Oxford even than it was then, if it can be said to exist at all; but, if we have not sunk altogether into the quagmire of Agnosticism and Materialism which Liddon dreaded, it has not been through a policy of Obscurantism and a refusal to face difficulties, but to the influence of men like Green, who have united the religious spirit of Liddon with a determination to follow the argument wherever it led them; and of some even who, without much sympathy with what ordinary men call Religion, have been forced by the sheer requirements of Logic to take the anti-materialistic side. It is possible to cease to be a Materialist without becoming a Theist or a Christian; but in the long run, I believe, whatever intellectual influences make against Materialism make for Christian Theism.

It must be admitted that it is only for the comparatively few—though for more people than is often supposed—that much study of formal Philosophy is possible or desirable. Berkeley, however, might very well be read and understood by at least many of those who think that Spencer—perhaps even Haeckel—has said the last word upon ultimate problems. But we do, no doubt, want a reasonable treatment of the evidences for Theism of a simpler kind than is to be found even in the most lucid of professed philosophers. The real difficulty of the intellectual situation is this. On the whole, Spiritualism has the upper hand within the circles of the trained, professed students of Philosophy. The problem is, how to make it prevail in the sphere of intelligent popular thought. Materialism and Naturalism are easily mastered: the replies to them are difficult, and demand serious study. There is no subject which better deserves attention from religious teachers than this—how to popularise theistic Philosophy without using arguments which we know not to be valid; how to popularise (I personally should say) Idealism, or whatever other philosophy may seem to anyone to constitute the true basis of Theism.

What I have been contending for is strongly opposed to one of the main tendencies of Protestant Liberal Theology on the Continent. One of the notes of the great Ritschlian school, best known in England, perhaps, through the writings of Harnack, is a systematic depreciation of Philosophy and of philosophical Theology. That is a natural, perhaps on the whole a healthy, but an exaggerated reaction against the Hegelian tendency to turn Christianity into a speculative Philosophy which does contain some reminiscences of the Athanasian Creed, but has very little in common with the teaching of Jesus of Nazareth. As regards their interpretation of Christianity and of distinctly Christian doctrine, I feel myself very much in sympathy with the Ritschlians. The Ritschlian influence is the most powerful and the healthiest force at work in the world of Continental Protestant Theology. Much of the advance of Liberal Christian thought among ourselves during the past decade or so has been due to the growing influence of Harnack and others of that school. But the mistake made by some of them (Wendt is a notable exception) is the attempt to base not merely Christianity, but even Theism, on what they call value-judgments. I understand the Ritschlians when they contend that a belief in a revelation through Christ, in whatever dogmatic forms we may express that conviction, must rest upon the value which our Conscience recognises in his character and the ideal which he set forth; but I cannot understand how any value-judgment should prove to us the existence of God. Given that existence, the knowledge of his nature comes to us, as it seems to me, wholly from Conscience. It is our judgments of value that assure us of the truth of the ideal set before us by Jesus. But I cannot see how we should be able to assert that those judgments reveal to us the nature of God apart from the general metaphysical argument which justifies the assertion that all our judgments are partial disclosures or communications of a knowledge which in God is perfect. But to say in one breath that Religion has nothing to do with Metaphysic, and then in the next to declare that the central doctrine of Christianity is the Fatherhood of God, is mere intellectual trifling. The Fatherhood of God is a metaphysical doctrine, though it comes home to us so much more effectively when expressed in that simple form, than it does in the technical language in which the Philosophers express the same truth. And that truth, if it is to be rationally held, must in the last resort rest upon rational grounds. Religion in all its forms, from the highest to the lowest—the crudest Animism, the Polytheism of the Greeks, the Atheistic or Acosmic Religion of the philosophic Buddhist, no less than the Christian Theism of the Ritschlian Philosopher—is essentially a Metaphysical belief, for it is essentially a belief in something which cannot be touched or tasted or handled.

And there is another mistake in which, as it seems to me, the Ritschlians are involved by their antipathy to Philosophy. They unduly depreciate the importance of doctrine, ancient and modern alike. There is a sense, no doubt, in which it is true that by wisdom the world knew not God. Bare Philosophical Theism has never appealed to the mass of men, or produced the moral effects which have resulted from the great historical religions, and pre-eminently from Christianity. I believe that Ritschlians are right in supposing that the main source of the influence which Christianity has exerted has been due to the personal influence of Jesus. I believe they are right in thinking that that will be so in the future. So far, I do not quarrel with the Ritschlians for making their theology Christo-centric, though they sometimes disparage unduly the teachers and the religions which have most in common with Christianity. But when they virtually repudiate all development in Christian doctrine in Ethics, in the outward forms and manifestations of the religious life, as well as in the region of Theology proper, they are surely fighting against absolutely inevitable tendencies of human thought. Doubtless the practical following of Christ is more important than a correct Christology; but a man cannot give over thinking because he becomes a Christian.

The difficulty was put thus to me by a rising young philosophic teacher who is an ardent, if very liberal, Catholic in a very Protestant University. Harnack, he complained, makes Christianity consist in the "ipsissima verba" of Christ: "Aber es gibt kein ipsissima verba Christi," "There are no ipsissima verba of Christ." That represents perhaps, an extreme and unduly sceptical critical position. But it is true that nobody would be prepared to accept all the utterances of Christ as an equally accurate picture of his thought. To pick and choose among them is already a kind of development. It is impossible that Christianity should be confined forever to the "ipsissima verba" of Christ. The Christian consciousness must have some way of expressing to itself both its view of God's nature and the value which it sets upon the teaching and work of Christ; and that sense of value must express itself in the language, and adapt itself to the thought, of each succeeding age. Whatever the true answer to the problems inevitably raised by the effort to reconstruct the intellectual universe in accordance with Christian ideas and to assign Christ his proper position in it, the result is Christian doctrine, whatever that doctrine be, Athanasian or Arian or Socinian; whether it be one of the very numerous forms of thought commonly included under the term Trinitarian, or one of the equally numerous forms embraced under the term Unitarian. Technical formula apart, belief in the present work of the Spirit of God in human souls is, I think we shall all agree, an essential element of Christianity. The Ritschlian Theologians, some of them at least, go near to denying that truth. In so far as he asserts it, we ought, I think, to recognise the value of the new influence which the teaching of Loisy has introduced into Christian thought, however much we may regret the shackles under which his position compels that very radical thinker to work. Protestant theologians—men like Harnack, or still more, a man like Wendt—I think understand the historical Christ and his true importance better than Loisy. But we may recognise that Loisy has a truer sense—truer from the historical and philosophical point of view, and truer from the point of view of practical religion, of the work of the Spirit of God in human society, and of the part which has been played in that work by organised religious communities.

The rise of Loisy is, as it seems to me, by far the most important fact in the theological situation of the moment. Biblical criticism has invaded the Roman Catholic Church; the more or less avowed, more or less thorough-going disciples of Loisy are numbered by the hundred, if not by the thousand, among the French priesthood. Whether they will eventually succeed in leavening the Roman Catholic Church from within, or whether the movement will end in some kind of disruption, no one can say yet. But I cannot believe that the effects of that movement are destined to be small. I believe that the ideas of Loisy may well serve as a valuable corrective and complement to the Ritschlian influence in Protestant communities. They may for obvious reasons exercise a peculiarly healthy influence upon Anglican theology. And they will extend the influence of Liberal Theology to whole regions which have been almost untouched by it hitherto.

But I must return to my main topic. The idea which I would venture to suggest to you is this. The real struggle of the future is not between competing forms of Theistic—or what, at least for the Western world, is practically almost the same thing, Christian belief, but between those who believe that God is a Spirit, and a Materialism or Naturalism which denies that truth. Those who are agreed in this matter should regard each other as allies in the greater conflict, without pretending to a greater measure of agreement than exists in the not unimportant, but still less important sphere of Christological doctrine. The absolute necessity of concentrating attention upon the defence of the most fundamental beliefs—belief in God, in morality, in immortality—will make both for liberality and for charity. It is because I so strongly feel this that I have accepted and greatly appreciated the honour you have done me in inviting me to address you to-day.

THE LIBERAL MOVEMENT IN THE FREE CHURCHES.

BY THE REV. T. RHONDDA WILLIAMS.

THAT there is a liberal movement of great significance in all Free Churches, none can deny. There is a much more liberal theology and a much more liberal temper than formerly prevailed. There is also a wider recognition of the absolute necessity for applying the principles of the Gospel to the social problems of our time. And it is along these three lines I expect the liberal movement to proceed—a broader theology, a more catholic spirit, and a wider and more direct application of the truth to life. The teaching of the Bible in most of our colleges is in the hands of men of the liberal school; the great majority of students for the ministry find the old views impossible, and are facing their work with an entirely different equipment from that with which men did thirty years ago. The attitude of the Churches towards the historical interpretation of the Bible has changed greatly in the last fifteen years; and may now be described as generally tolerant and widely sympathetic. It is possible to-day for the President of the Free Church Council, though a Wesleyan, to say that the worst use we can make of old systems of theology is to be satisfied with them. In the Free Church Council, the sects have an intercourse which once would have been impossible. It is true that this is not all it should be. The exclusion of the Unitarians is a sore point with many of us. Dr. Clifford has said that it was a concession to the Wesleyans. Well, the sooner the better the Wesleyans clear themselves from an ignorant prejudice, and the rest of the Council from the weakness of bowing to such prejudice. But it is something to have come so far on the road that we can now commune with a Baptist without a splash, and with a Presbyterian without being committed to a covenant we do not believe in, and with a Congregationalist without having to argue for ever that Presbyterianism and governing synods are unscriptural. We hope we may proceed on that road until the Wesleyan lion, large and magnanimous, and the Unitarian terrier, keen and clear but not over-humble, shall learn to dwell together.

And I want to use my time to-day in urging the duty of helping on the liberal movement to what it ought to be, rather than in describing what it is. That the spirit of orthodoxy and the spirit of sectarianism are still alive we are only too well aware; that their presence is sometimes subtly at work in ourselves at the very time we are engaged in casting them out of others is a fact that should make us watchful.

The liberal movement, properly understood, must emancipate from the notion that the religious teacher is a conveyer of finalities, into a clear vision that all that one man can do for another is to sow seeds in his life; that what to one is the word of God—the ripened result of an inward experience articulated—is to another no more than seed which, if it is to come to anything in that other life, must lose its form and die. Even the word of Jesus, which to him was the ripe fruit of trust in, and communion with the Father, when given to other men could be only germinating seeds of a new life which must die to live. The church has too much forgotten Jesus' description of Himself: "A sower that went forth to sow."

Those who take the full scope of that truth have slain the spirit of orthodoxy—the spirit, I mean, which imposes upon others any set of propositions as final statements of truth; a spirit, by the way, which is often incarnate in heterodox people. No doubt that spirit will die hard, but the forces operating against it in all churches are very strong, and Doctrinal Trust Deeds, its last houses of refuge, are becoming forts of despair. Their days are reckoned, and they are as sure to disappear as the horse omnibuses on the streets of London. It is coming to be recognised more and more that we cannot have a stagnant theology in a developing universe and an unfolding mind; that we cannot guarantee the permanence of any creed or any church order by any prescriptions of ours; that all we can do, if we insist upon being stupid and not reading the plain lessons of history, is to put unnatural strains upon the consciences of men, and artificial difficulties to retard a progress which they cannot prevent.

Freedom is essential to integrity; no man knows whether he is sincere until he knows that he is free, though those who insist on living in freedom should beware of supposing they can live upon it.

Morality calls upon us to be true to all the truth we can discover, and to be bound by nothing in the past; that is the primal demand, and there is no integrity if we disobey it. If legal obligations contracted by pious founders come up against that, we must ignore them if we can, get rid of them if we cannot, and in any case get rid of them at the earliest possible moment. Power to deal with trusts is essential to the liberal movement in the Free Churches, and must soon be secured. We have been true in the wrong way to our ancestors too long, and it is time to remember that we have souls of our own and that we have children: The cry: "Be worthy of your ancestry," might now be replaced by another: "Be worthy of posterity." But it is not only the spirit of orthodoxy that needs to be got rid of, but also the spirit of sectarianism.

Denominationalism is to some people a thing to be always championed; in reality, it is a thing to be often watched. If to belong to a denomination tends to make one narrow in outlook, and exclusive in sympathy, and unjust in judgment, we are either taking it wrongly, or it is so far forth a bad thing in itself. It does not follow that it would have no good in it even then, no human institution is either wholly good or wholly bad, but the good in such a case needs very much to be dissociated from such serious evil.

In the history of religion, narrow intellectual outlook, exclusive sympathies, and unjust judgments have not been regarded sufficiently as sins. The importance attached to creeds has tended to circumscribe the intellect, and, curiously enough, the importance attached to denying creeds has not infrequently done the same thing; the theory of the church and the sect-consciousness have too often barred the flow of sympathy, and distorted judgment. This is too true of all churches.

It is quite true that these vices are closely related to great virtues, and the outside world in judging the churches does not always understand that. I admit some truth in the plea that, if bigotry has been specially prominent in the history of religion, it is partly because religion is such a profound interest that men feel as if their eternal being is at stake. But we have said that enough, and inside the church what we need to say now is that this bigotry need not be, and should not be; that the vices do not cease to be vices because they are related to virtues; that a narrow intellectual outlook is an impoverishment of life for which even strong convictions do not make up, indeed convictions are all the more mischievous for being strong if they are not intelligent; that exclusive sympathy, sympathy that accepts ecclesiastical boundaries, is at best a poor measure; and that unjust judgment is an utterly unchristian thing.

It has been asked whether Nonconformity supplies a stimulus to the "universal view." The question means, of course, whether our denominationalism does not rather tend to shut us up too much within the confines of our sect, or at least fails to inspire us with broad views of the world's life, and put us into sympathy with the wider currents of thought and aspiration. It is a fair and very important question, a question which we ought to be willing to look at and consider.

I should say that the spirit of Nonconformity in itself, and the spirit of Conformity in itself, are alike unfavourable to the universal view. Take the conformist spirit first. What does it aim at? What is its ideal? One church in which all men shall subscribe to one creed and worship in one way. Surely, it might be said, here is the universal view, here is an all-inclusive conception, here is a church for the world. Yes, it may be answered, if the world were made for such a church. But it is in its failure to grasp the diversity of the world that such a view fails to be universal. The man who seeks a universal form, either of creed or worship, fails to reach the universal view. The desire to gather the whole world under my banner is not catholicity, it is essentially sectarianism. However large the church may be, and however old, and however imposing and majestic its history, if it makes this claim, it is just as sectarian, though not as ridiculous, as if the smallest sect made it. Just because the universal fact is diversity, diversity of education, of temperament, taste, and need, so the universal view must be a frank recognition of that diversity, and not the imposition upon it of one custom, however good. Nor do I think that this diversity is adequately met by latitude in the interpretation of common symbols, it must extend to freedom in the choice of symbols.

Again, the spirit of Nonconformity in itself is also unfavourable to the universal view. To dissent for the sake of dissenting is certainly narrowing. And there is such a thing. The small Nonconformist is very small, and I confess that I dislike him very much. There is also a temper sometimes met with which is always suspicious of the Catholic and the Anglican, especially the Anglican. It comes partly from our history. We have had to fight so much for our liberty that we have developed a somewhat suspicious temper. But, however it came, it is not Christian, it is not neighbourly, and it is sure to be often unjust. The liberal movement in the Free Churches must be liberal towards the older churches, or it is not complete.

We cannot deny that the various Nonconformist sects have often shown too exclusive a spirit both towards the Church of England and also towards one another. Nonconformity came into existence, not for the sake of nonconforming, but to express life realities which the formularies of the old Church would not allow to be expressed. If Nonconformity had kept to that and allowed the same principle to work freely everywhere else, it would have been an entirely expansive movement, making for the enlargement of life through the ages; but, alas, the tendency was for each sect to set itself up as a standard, and almost claim a monopoly of truth and right. It is a tendency that attaches to strength of conviction, but it is a divisive, blighting tendency all the same.

We need to be careful how we hold our denominationalism; it is so easy to make it a poor paltry thing. I have often listened to an address on Free Church principles, and felt, if I only believed it true, I would not like to be a Free Churchman. I have heard the phrases "Evangelical truth" and "Unitarian truth" so often that it would be quite a relief to think that they had gone for ever. And I doubt whether any greater service could be rendered to the liberal movement in the Free Churches than to obliterate these two words: "Evangelical" and "Unitarian." When will men rejoice in truth as such, and have their souls so lifted by it as to forget their little labels? It is a pity when men cannot stand in God's wide plains, or climb His great mountains without the impertinence of waving their little flags over them and being more interested in the flag than in anything else, dreaming themselves proprietors of the vast estate. Those who are truly in the liberal movement know the unsectarian character of truth; they know that the modern advance is not the victory of any one church, nor indeed of all the churches together, because it is the result of the manifold labours of many workers in many fields; they know that if the liberal thinkers in different churches to-day are much nearer each other than their respective churches are, it is not because some have moved towards the position of others, but because all have moved to new ground where old controversies, including, I venture to say, the controversy between Trinitarian and Unitarian, are dead. We should not lack reverence for the past, and a sentiment of respect for old battle-grounds is harmless enough if it is not allowed to perpetuate useless feuds. We may have full appreciation of the way we have come, without falling into the glorification of ruts as things to be pursued for ever; we watch theological sunsets with gratitude for the light of a closing day, but we must be allowed to greet the rising dawn with cheer and with confidence, believe in the ever-enlarging revelations, and in the greater day that is yet to be.

Denominational zeal of the right kind is no doubt good, but it is very necessary to see that it is of the right kind. The zeal that tries to prove that Congregationalism is the right kind of church is of no use. Every kind of church is good which does good, and every church is right which serves the cause of right. The zeal that would strain every nerve to prove that Unitarians have always believed what all the world is now coming to believe is simply a piece of unenlightened partisanship, a hindrance to progress wherever found. To use one's denomination to minister to the world is the best way to defend it. To train the young in church principles is less important than to train them to take large views of life, and cultivate wide sympathies.

Many have left the various churches in years of maturity because they found that it was there they had nursed their prejudices and narrow views. Let those who grow up about us feel, in the after years, that in the church they learned to take generous views of men and matters, that there they were taught to be large-minded, to be open to truth on all sides, and at the same time consecrated to high purpose, and noble service, and we shall win their respect for life.

I have no ambition in my own church to nurse champions for Congregationalism, and I do not like the Presbyterian or the Unitarian who is always trying to make Presbyterians or Unitarians. We want champions for justice, for freedom, for purity, for love, and for social reform. We want to nurse children of God, servants of the common weal. The only sense in which I recognise denominational zeal is the departmental sense. Every department must do its best, not to prove that it is better or wiser than some other department, but to make its own contribution to the effectiveness of the whole, like departments in a factory, like regiments in an army. There is something that is defective in every church, and also much that is necessary. One denomination may excel in its intellectual contribution, and another in heart-glow and worshipful spirit, and still another in social service.

And I should not hesitate to take from any church anything that would enrich my own, and make it more effective. Let us go for the largest views of life; for the cultivation of the widest sympathies; for the broadest culture; for the most comprehensive social service we can render; for the richest worship; let us recognise all good men in every church, and outside all churches, as our brethren; yea, let us yearn over the evil too with a heart of compassion like God's. I must confess that it is not the denominational aspect of religion that appeals to me, but the catholic aspect. There is pasture for the alive mind and the devout soul, in the literature of all the churches, and that of any one would be poor fare. In the interpretation of the personality of Jesus, of the Atonement, and the work of Redemption generally, we need the help of all the churches, and something more. I do not think that any church can look back and say concerning any of these: "We were right." There was truth in various conflicting positions, and, the truth, there is little doubt, was greater than any of them. The old controversies are not settled, they are lost. The Atonement, the Incarnation, Salvation are all larger than men had thought; the assertion of them, in their limitation, as the truth was wrong, the bare denial of them was also wrong; but they remain more largely and richly conceived, whose meanings give us unlimited fields for the discoveries of experience, as we pursue our religious life away from the paltry cries of parties in the ampler spaces of the divine life. As much zeal as you like in building up our own church and our own denomination, if we remember that all this is but an instrument, and only one of many, for working towards the large end of human progress, and the coming of the kingdom of the eternal good for men.

At the conclusion of the papers and a warm word of acknowledgment from the Chairman, there was time for only one speech.

Dr. C. HERBERT-SMITH said that in venturing to speak after those three able papers he felt rather like Daniel in the lions' den. He could not attempt to discuss the papers, it would be impertinent for him to do so, but he was bound to admit that he disagreed greatly with many of the things he had heard. As a Yorkshireman who hated sailing under false colours, he stood there as an out-and-out Unitarian, and thought there was danger in excessive liberalism of thought, which seemed necessarily to belittle denominationalism. The average layman must have something clear and definite to induce him to fight for it. That was what he had found in Unitarianism, and he intended to fight for it. He had been greatly struck by Dr. Rashdall's paper, and the extraordinary advance in the philosophical outlook of religion of which it was a sign. Dr. Rashdall had said that the fight of the future would be between belief in Theism and Materialism and Naturalism; but, for his own part, what astonished him was that, in spite of the increase of education and liberal thought, the Roman Catholic Church continued to extend its influence, and he thought that in 100 years they might have another conflict such as they had in the time of the Reformation. He did not agree with Mr. Jacks that the best work of the world was now done by men outside the churches. No doubt there were such men, but they were exceptional, and wherever any great organisation for good in the broadest sense was at work at the back of it were numbers of men within the churches. He had been impressed at the time by Mr. Jacks' suggestion of a Brotherhood of Preachers, and was now more convinced than ever that it might do good. The example of the Salvation Army had been referred to, and he recalled the earlier instance of Dominic and Francis, who, in the early Middle Ages, had found the Roman Catholic Church much in the condition of the churches of to-day, and had reformed and rejuvenated it. The higher life of to-day suffered from the unfortunate increase of wealth, which killed aspiration. What they needed was such a fresh impulse of unselfish life and endeavour as that to which Mr. Jacks' suggestion pointed.

After lunch a meeting of the Guilds' Union was held, under the presidency of the Rev. F. K. Freeston, and at the same time, at Manchester College, a meeting in the interest of the "Van Mission," called by the Rev. T. P. Spedding.

At 4.30 the Business Meeting of the National Conference was held, and in the evening there was a religious service, conducted by the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., of Glasgow, who had that afternoon been elected a member of the Conference. He preached the sermon on "The Religion of the Cross," which we must reserve for publication next week. Before the service a selection of music on the organ was given by Mr. John Harrison, who also played at the service. There was a very large congregation.

THE BUSINESS MEETING.

The President, Mr. W. B. BOWRING, took the chair at the business meeting on Thursday afternoon.

Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE presented his statement as treasurer. In former years, he said, the funds required had been obtained from a few friends, and had been under £100, though in Conference years an additional £60 for printing, &c., was needed; but with the appointment of a secretary more would be required. He had a balance of £80, which, with a few additions, would, he hoped, see them through that Conference. Since 1903 the number of congregations contributing to the funds had increased from two to six, and there should be many more.

The Rev. JAMES HARWOOD, secretary, presented the Committee's report, with two alterations in the printed copy which had been previously circulated, and which appeared in last week's INQUIRER. The alterations are:—p. 242, col. 2, in (b), on Mr. Wood's suggestions, lines 2 and 3, strike out "at present, at all events"; col. 3, add to last par., decision of the Committee at Oxford: "That this meeting, in view of the replies received, is of opinion that the scheme is not at present practicable."

The PRESIDENT moved the adoption of the report and accounts.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER seconded, and congratulated the Conference on having secured the services of a permanent secretary. With Mr. Harwood's administrative help they looked forward to a considerable development in their work, and had every confidence that it would be efficiently performed. They were parting with old and tried friends. Mr. A. W. Worthington had been one of the earliest promoters of the Conference, and secretary from the first. Through the earlier Conferences he was the leading acting hon. secretary, and to his fidelity to Conference aims and principles, and his executive knowledge and ability they owed a deep debt of gratitude. They were glad to be able to place his name on the list of Vice-Presidents. Mr. Charles Fenton had succeeded to the work as acting hon. secretary, and for fifteen years, since 1891, had taken the leading share of the business. He had organised five Conferences to 1903, and to his unfailing courtesy and fidelity they must bear the warmest testimony. He much regretted that Mr. Fenton's extreme modesty would not allow them to add his name also to the list of Vice-Presidents, but they must make that acknowledgment to him. Three years ago, two large questions had been committed for consideration, one affecting the possible relation of the Conference to the churches as their business or administrative organ (as to which no step had been taken) the other arising out of Mr. Wood's paper, in which he pointed out the danger of inequalities of administration in their trust funds. Though it might seem from the report that very little had been done, a great deal of trouble had been taken, and though last Tuesday a scheme very carefully drafted had been laid aside, and they had to be content with a less ambitious scheme than that first entertained, he did not think the time had been wasted. Matters had been brought to the knowledge of various trusts, and the foundation laid for more harmonious relations than had been possible in the past.

The resolution having been passed, it was agreed, on the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., to make the alterations in the rules of which the committee had given notice. They were slight verbal alterations, the chief being entailed by the appointment of a paid secretary.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON moved, and Mr. Edgar Worthington seconded, the best thanks of the Conference to the retiring officers and committee, and the appointment of the following officers for the ensuing three years:—President, Rev. Joseph Wood; Vice-Presidents, Mr. James R. Beard, J.P., Mr. Wm. B. Bowring, J.P., Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., Mr.

Howard Chatfield Clarke, Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C., Rev. S. A. Steintal, Mr. A. W. Worthington, B.A.; Treasurer, Mr. J. W. Scott, J.P.; Auditor, Mr. Sydney Jones; Secretary, Rev. Jas. Harwood, B.A. The following twelve members were elected by ballot, according to rule, to serve on the committee. There are 28 societies represented in the Conference, each of which may appoint a member to serve on the committee, which thus constituted can co-opt six further members. For the ballot 259 voting papers were given in, but seven were unsigned, and so not counted, with the following result:—Revs. Dendy Agate, J. W. Austin, F. K. Freeston, H. Gow, Messrs. G. H. Leigh, P. H. Leigh, A. Nicholson, Revs. J. Collins Odgers, F. W. Stanley, J. C. Street, Messrs. J. C. Warren and J. Harrop White.

Mr. Dowson, speaking to the resolution, said that, if the committee and officers had done nothing but provide for them that week, they would have reason to be grateful, and, as Chairman of Manchester College Committee, he thanked them for coming to Oxford. He then spoke in warmly appreciative terms of Mr. Wood, their new President, the Vice-Presidents, and other officers.

Dr. DRUMMOND moved the election of Dr. John Hunter as a member of the Conference. Dr. Hunter, he said, was known to them all, and his adhesion would be a welcome addition to the width of their fellowship. He would bring a fervour of spirit not always found in connection with what were known as liberal opinions. That was due, he supposed, to the fact that often opinions arose from the side of scepticism rather than of inspiration. But with Dr. Hunter it was otherwise. His breadth of view was due to clear perception of high spiritual truth.

The Rev. HENRY GOW, who seconded, said they were not asking Dr. Hunter to come out from anything and take up a new position, but they were glad and proud that he was willing to associate with them in their free fellowship.

The resolution was cordially passed.

Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE moved:—"That the congregations on the roll be urgently requested to make an annual contribution towards meeting the ordinary expenses of the Conference." It was necessary, he said, that they should have an income of from £300 to £350, to carry on the work.

The Rev. C. HARGROVE, who seconded, said the triennial meetings had never failed, but as a Conference representing churches they had failed to interest the churches. He hoped every congregation would be appealed to to make some contribution, and then they would care more for the work.

Reports were then presented, of the Ministers' Sustentation Fund, by the Rev. J. E. Carpenter, of the Guilds' Union, by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, and of the Pension and Insurance Fund, by the Rev. C. J. Street, all of which had their origin in meetings of the Conference.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER moved:—"That this meeting of the National Conference, having heard the Report of four years' work of the Ministers' Pension and Insurance Fund, earnestly commends it to the support of the Churches, and especially urges on their attention the importance of maintaining its efficiency by regular Congregational Subscriptions." That resolution, he said, was rendered necessary by the very success of their work. They had originally expected some 50 ministers to join, and they began with 70, a large proportion of whom were over 40. This had entailed greater annual expenditure, and they had not been able to put by accumulated income as they had anticipated. All the present members were safe, but the power of accepting fresh members would be seriously limited if they did not increase their income and bring it at least up to £300 a year. They would easily get the extra help required, if congregations would consider that the cause of the insurance of ministers was their cause.

Mr. H. CHATFIELD CLARKE seconded, and the resolution was adopted.

The Education Bill.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE moved:—"That this meeting welcomes the provisions in the Education Bill introduced by Mr. Birrell, which place all rate-aided schools under public control, and secure teachers against the imposition of ecclesiastical and theological tests."

He regretted there was not more time to consider that very important national question. The resolution selected two fundamental questions. The Bill was very elaborate, but if they could only secure for the nation as a whole the control of every school receiving public money, they had secured what would involve many improvements in the future. He did not say the Bill was perfect even on that score, but it was framed with an honest desire to meet the needs of the nation as a whole, and that was what they had always contended for. They had no desire as a special religious community for any favouritism, but every school with public money must be under public management. The other fundamental principle they had always striven for was that teachers should be free from ecclesiastical or theological test. He did not say that the Bill absolutely provided for the full carrying out of that principle, but for the first time the principle was laid down in a Bill before the Commons. And he felt very strongly that in view of the tremendous opposition organised against the Bill, those who had worked for these great principles should welcome that honest statesman-like attempt to settle the gravest issues of education in the country. He hoped the resolution would be carried. He was satisfied that if Mr. Birrell or the Government could poll the masses of the people of England, without any interference of clerical or anti-clerical parties, the fathers and mothers would say the Bill provided just about what they wanted. He was satisfied, so long as they got public control, to go on agitating for juster views of education. Since 1870 they had not had before the people a more far-reaching, larger, fairer measure for the improvement and management of public education in that country.

Mr. W. WALLACE BRUCE seconded, as one who would have something to do with the carrying out of the Act. Far too much time in the past had been occupied with machinery, they wanted to get to education.

The Rev. J. M. LLOYD THOMAS moved as an amendment:—"That this meeting, while welcoming the provisions of the Education Bill introduced by Mr. Birrell, which are designed to place all rate-aided schools under public control, and to secure teachers against the imposition of ecclesiastical and theological tests, regrets that the Bill perpetuates the State Endowment of Religious Instruction, and declares its conviction that only secular education should be given in schools maintained by compulsory public payments." It was an issue, he said, which they should face quite calmly and moderately. They must show their conviction on the Bill, and would be lacking in self-respect, if they failed to make it perfectly clear. The resolution was right so far as it went, but it did not say exactly what they felt. It evaded the really religious question. They ought to take a vigorous, unanimous stand, and declare that no religious education ought to be paid for out of public funds.

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH seconded, and said they must confess to their shame that they could not find any common ground on which they could continue common religious instruction in the schools of the people. They could not have religious instruction in their elementary schools without injustice to themselves, and to the teachers. The resolution was untrue. The Bill did not secure those results, and did not attempt it. There were over 1,100 Roman Catholic schools, and 11,000 schools in the National Society, and half of these would be in districts which might bring them under the fourth clause, and so provisions might be brought into effect by which they would have the teachers giving religious instruction. Thus they could not staff those schools without inquiring into the teachers' religious beliefs, and they would be perpetuating theological tests. There were two other strong objections. The Bill did not modify the present authority, and it allowed for the indefinite extension of the sectarian system. It seemed to him more reactionary than Mr. Balfour's Act.

Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., opposed the amendment. Six years ago, when he was President of that Conference, he had protested against the assumption that Unitarians as a body were in favour of secular education in their Board schools. He knew how well the compromise had worked, with the conscience clause and a syllabus, and he welcomed this Bill because he hoped it would make an end of the religious controversy. He should deplore the expulsion of religious instruction from the schools of the people, for where else would the children get any such teaching? The children would grow up devoid of the noblest spring of action.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON said it was a scandal that the religious difficulty should have been allowed to put back the clock of education for generations. He wanted a message of peace, and would sacrifice much to secure it. But he could not give as much as the Bill asked. He could not accept the fourth clause, which showed that tests would not be abolished, nor submit to the erection of denominational schools under public control. But he did not wish to see undenominational religious teaching out of the schools of the people of England. Yet, if they were driven to it, he would accept secular education under one condition, that of giving the right of entrance to all the schools of the country at the expense of those who wanted to give special religious instruction, if the parents demanded it. But where parents were spoken of in that controversy it was the parson and the priest who were meant.

The amendment, being put to the meeting, was carried by a large majority.

The Rev. H. RAWLINGS moved a further amendment, to read: "Declares its conviction that only secular education should be paid for by public money." That, he pointed out, maintained their principle, but secured the right of entry for special religious teaching at the expense of those who wanted to give it, which would be impossible under Mr. Thomas's motion.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON seconded.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE said that, while he had always been in favour of secular education, he thought they were in danger of forgetting that they were not the only people. He pleaded for the Jew, and the Roman Catholic, and the High Churchman. To refuse them facilities would be an unworthy act of dogmatism and intolerance.

Mr. Rawlings's amendment was carried by a considerable majority, and, becoming the substantive motion, was adopted.

The following further resolutions were passed:—

On the motion of Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON, seconded by the Rev. N. ANDERTON:

"That this meeting, rejoicing in the prospect of a second Hague Conference to strengthen and increase the facilities for the peaceful settlement of international disputes, urges the British Government to take advantage of the present favourable opportunity to propose simultaneous reduction of the heavy military burdens borne by the principal nations."

On the motion of the Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, seconded by Mr. JOHN HARRISON:

"That more effectual help is still needed for our poorer Ministers and Congregations, and that the means of effecting it be again recommended to the consideration of the Conference Committee."

Dr. C. HERBERT SMITH then made a statement as to his scheme for enabling ministers to attend the International Conference at Boston, Mass., next year. He urged it in the interest of the denomination as a whole, from his own experience of the inspiration of last year's international meeting at Geneva. London had responded well to his appeal. He had already £200 in the bank, and promises of from £400 to £500; but, unless the churches in the provinces would also help, his scheme could not be carried through. The meeting then terminated.

During the afternoon a telegram was received from Darmstadt, sent by the President and Committee of the Protestantverein, which was meeting in that city, with hearty greetings and good wishes for the Conference.

FRIDAY'S PROCEEDINGS.

The devotional service on Friday morning was conducted by the Revs. John Davies and Matthew R. Scott, the latter giving an address of exceptional power and beauty, which will remain one of the most vivid memories of the week.

At the closing session the chair was taken by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, in the absence of Mr. Charles Jones, who was to have presided.

The Rev. C. J. STREET proposed a comprehensive resolution, thanking in the warmest terms all who had contributed to the reception of the Conference at Oxford and to the great success of the meetings, and especially the officers of the local committee, Dr. Edwin Odgers, Mr. Carpenter, and Mr. Cock, and also Mr. Charles Jones and his friends for their generous provision of hospitality.

Mr. BYNG KENRICK seconded, and said votes of thanks were plentiful as blackberries, and could only be a very partial return for all the expenditure of thought and effort which had contributed to the success of these meetings. He recalled the old saying: "Faith was a noble dame, but in her train should ever follow the attendants of good works." By those meetings they had been lifted into an exalted faith. Let there be also good works to follow in the train, strenuous effort to realise a good part of the aspiration put before them, by co-operation with those who would be engaged in organising the work, and that would be the best expression of their gratitude.

The Rev. J. EDWIN ODGERS, chairman of the local committee, in acknowledging the vote, referred to a message sent by an enterprising journalist to San Francisco: "Wire at any cost instances of heroism," and the reply he got: "No heroes here. All too busy." A thought beyond his thought to that telegraphist was given, he said. That would be the ideal of social duty for the coming age, rather than that of individual distinction. So he might say of their committee, there were no heroes among them, but they had all worked together in the heartiest manner, and if what they had done was approved, they were very thankful. Yet he was obliged to mention the strenuous work done all the time by Mr. Cock, and the admirable help rendered by his sister; and he gratefully endorsed what had been said of what Mr. Charles Jones had done for them. They should not forget, either, the services rendered by Mr. Kerry and Mr. John Harrison at the organ, and the ready help given by the students of Manchester College.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER, also responding, emphasised the co-operation of friends in Oxford outside their fellowship. It had rendered that meeting of the Conference memorable.

Mr. J. W. COCK also responded; the warmth of the applause which greeted him showing how much his unselfish services had been appreciated.

The Rev. DENDY AGATE then read the paper on "Advisory Committees and Ministerial Settlements" which was published in last week's INQUIRER.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD then moved the resolution of which he had given notice, dividing it, by permission of the chairman and the meeting, into two parts, as follows:—

"1. That the Conference Committee is hereby instructed to enter into communication with existing Advisory Boards, and to consider the advisability of forming with their co-operation, one Central Board (and at their discretion to form such a Board), consisting of Ministers and Laymen, and having for its object:—

"To receive and examine the credentials of persons other than students from our Colleges desiring to enter the Ministry of the Churches on the Conference Roll, and at the direction of the Board to report on the same.

"2. That the Conference Committee is further instructed to appoint a Ministerial Settlement Board, to assist by introduction, or the furnishing of information, Churches in search of Ministers, and Ministers seeking Pastorates, such Committee to consist of Ministers and Laymen."

At the outset Mr. Wood said how profoundly he appreciated the honour they had done him in electing him President. He felt the responsibility more deeply because he was aware that in some respects he did not march altogether in line with some of his brethren. He hoped during his years of office to bring the Conference and the churches into more living touch with one another, and make the objects of the Conference more widely known. Turning to his resolution, he said he brought the matter before the Liverpool Conference, and he believed that if he had pressed it then, he would have carried his point; but the matter was referred to the committee, and while he was away in America the committee came to a decision adverse to his view. Therefore he was now appealing from the Committee to the Conference. He thought the committee had been led to their decision by a fear that this proposal would interfere with the independence of the churches, but he was as anxious as anyone to preserve that independence. He was keenly alive to the value of the work done by their two existing advisory committees to the satisfaction of the churches, but they did not cover the whole country, and had only partially succeeded in closing the back-door into their ministry. It was of the utmost consequence to have that door effectually closed, to keep out undesirable men, who brought discredit not only on individual congregations but the ministry as a whole. Men of natural gifts and stainless character would not be excluded. They could come in by the front door. He was not in favour of multiplying local committees, but a central board might co-operate with the two admirable committees they already had, that one standard might apply throughout the whole country. He held that a central body appointed by the Conference could do more than others to create a sound public opinion, and it should consist of ministers and laymen in equal numbers. Then, as to the settlement or removal of minister, he recalled what he said at Liverpool three years ago, and said that such a representative board could be of the greatest service to ministers and congregations. The Ministerial Fellowship had done admirable service in that respect; but it was a private society, and the work should be done by a publicly representative body. He was glad to know that some at least of the members of the Fellowship were willing that the work should be handed over to the Conference. They were very grateful to Mr. Street for what he had done, and, if the change were made, he hoped they would have his help.

The Rev. H. D. ROBERTS seconded the resolutions, and urged that the churches were too much afraid of being represented by the Conference, in which they ought to realise their unity.

The Rev. C. J. STREET said that while he had some hesitation as to the first resolution, he was in favour of the second; he had from the first hoped that the Conference Committee would take up the matter of ministerial settlements, and it was only because of their refusal that the Fellowship had taken it up. Experience had shown how much good could be done, but it was a great responsibility for the man into whose hands the work came. He was quite prepared to give it up, but he was quite clear that it was one man's work, and he would willingly hand it over to the Secretary of the Conference, in whom he had perfect confidence. At the same time he had asked for a confidential committee to have cognisance of what he did, and he was sure that Mr. Harwood would wish the same. The President of the Conference should be one, and another should be possibly a layman.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE moved as an amendment:—"That the paper read by Mr. Agate and the resolutions submitted by Mr. Wood be referred to the Conference Committee, with instructions to consult existing Advisory Committees, the Ministerial Fellowship, the Colleges, the District Associations, and others, and that they report to the next meeting of the Conference."

He said that for upwards of fifteen years he had had thrown upon him the double vocation included in the two resolutions. Of the 49 men considered by the London committee, 47 or 48 had come first to him, and of those in Lancashire nearly the half, and, in addition to these, he had probably seen nearly 200 others, who never got to any committee at all. He confessed that he was very much in doubt as to organising any central board. In the matter of advisory committees local knowledge and interest were very important, and he had the gravest suspicion of boards of ecclesiastical authority in any form. They must have rules and regulations, and the human element must necessarily be largely crushed out. He was not prepared to pin his faith on the infallibility of any Conference committee or board, if it would shut out individual freedom of action on the part of their churches and work. He knew how difficult those questions were, and thought they required more consideration, and therefore he moved his amendment.

Mr. FLETCHER ROBINSON seconded, and said the District Associations ought to be consulted before they came to a decision.

The Rev. ALFRED HALL, as secretary of a Union, said that they wanted co-operation in that matter, and such a board as was proposed would be of great service.

Dr. W. BLAKE ODGERS supported the amendment on the ground that the bodies concerned ought first to be consulted. He thought, also, that not the Committee, but the Conference itself ought to appoint.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD, having briefly replied that the matter had three years ago been referred back, the amendment was put and carried by a large majority.

At the conclusion of this discussion the Rev. Henry Gow read his paper on "The Ideal of a Church," and the closing hymn, Samuel Longfellow's "One holy Church of God appears," was sung. Dr. Drummond pronounced the Benediction, and the Conference was at an end.

In the afternoon a service was held in Manchester College Chapel for prayer and addresses on our Domestic Mission work. The Rev. F. Summers took the first part of the service, and addresses were given by the Revs. W. J. Bishop, J. Wain, G. J. Slipper, and J. L. Haigh. The Rev. J. Edwin Odgers concluded the service with helpful and impressive words, and prayer and benediction.

After tea a meeting was held in the Senior Common Room at the College, over which the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter presided, and on his motion, seconded by the Rev. P. H. Wicksteed, a Union for Social Service was formed, as proposed at the Friday afternoon conference. Other resolutions as to membership and committee, moved from the chair and seconded by Mr. Richard Robinson and the Rev. F. H. Vaughan respectively, were passed, and it was arranged to hold a meeting of members in London during Whit-week.

Of the Temperance Association, the Guilds' Union, and the Van Mission meetings, we hope to publish some report next week.

As to the attendance at the Conference, it is difficult to arrive at exact figures, for even the most careful lists of the local secretaries contain names of those who at the last moment were unable to be present, while others unexpectedly arrived, and their names were not always included. We may say, however, that about 180 of our ministers were present, and over 150 delegates of congregations and societies, while the list of other visitors numbered about 220. In addition to these, the friends at Oxford have to be reckoned, so that we may safely say there were over 600 taking part in the meetings.

ERRATA.—In last week's INQUIRER, p. 253, col. 2, par. 6, line 5, for 1900 read 1890. Col. 3, line 19, for such read "each individual." P. 262, col. 2, par. 4, last line, for Mrs. read "Mr. Anderton."

COURAGE, sir! That makes man or woman look their goodliest.—Tennyson.

THE IDEAL OF A CHURCH.

BY THE REV. HENRY GOW, B.A.

THE papers delivered hitherto have been, or have been supposed to be, followed by discussion. This enabled the readers to express their own point of view strongly, with the sense that it may be discussed afterwards. In this closing paper of the Conference no discussion will follow. That fact entails the duty of avoiding strong controversial views, and seeing both sides, which is regarded by many as the last resort of the timid, and by others as the ideal of the scholar, but which, in this case, is due neither to timidity nor scholarship, but to what seems to me the just demands of the occasion.

A church is either one self-contained separate congregation, or a group of congregations; it is either a worshipping community connected with one building, and therefore, in this sense, something of an architectural expression, or it is a union of communities related to one another for some reason; either because of a common past, or a common ideal, or a common creed. I do not know what was in the mind of those who gave me this subject, but I think we should do well to take both meanings into account. You cannot have a strong church in the larger sense without strong churches in the smaller sense; and churches or congregations in the smaller sense of separate individual communities only find their full meaning when there is some union, some bond of fellowship, some feeling of common work and ideals between them.

There is a well-known saying of Goethe that a man ought either "to be a whole, or belong to a whole." I would rather suggest that, as in many other cases, the alternatives are not mutually exclusive, but that both are possible and desirable. Whether as men or as churches, we should in a sense be a whole, and at the same time belong to a larger whole. No man or church ought to be merely a cog in a machine, with no end, no individuality of their own. Every church should be an independent, separate entity; and, at the same time, no church should be self-sufficing and alone, cut off from all relationship with other churches. It is in self-realisation, in being ends for ourselves, and yet being in relation always with others, and with those means to a larger and higher end, that our lives are fulfilled. We belong to God and to the community. The individualist tends to lay a one-sided stress on the first term, the socialist on the second. As men and as churches we have to recognise our relationship to both. We ought each to feel ourselves one, with our own responsibilities, and our own character, and our own life; and, at the same time, to feel ourselves one among many, part of an organic whole, part of a movement, each called to fulfil itself in the life of a larger whole.

In speaking then of the ideal of a church, I shall speak of both unities—the smaller unity of the congregation, and the larger unity of an organised fellowship of congregations.

I.—Let us consider, first, the ideal of a church in its narrower and more limited sense.

In talking of ideals, we have to be careful always to remember the different types of character in men or churches, and not to ask them all to conform to one pattern. There is not one type, one pattern, one method to which all living, earnest congregations must conform. The utmost we can say is that there should be one spirit—the spirit of Christ; the spirit of love to God, and love to man, which should be found in all of them. To say that may be the merest verbiage. We may enunciate such general principles in order to evade facing difficulties through cowardice or indolence. But, nevertheless, such general principles truly felt and realised, convey the profoundest truth. A dislike of general principles, and a longing for particular application, because general principles are the refuge of the lazy and cowardly, is to be offended without adequate cause.

"Angels are bright still; though the brightest fell.

Though all things else should wear the brow of grace,

Yet grace must still look so."

Nor will it do to take, what we might call a Greatest Common Measure of all of them, abstracting differences, and laying stress only on what is common to all. A Greatest Common Measure is not an ideal; it is a residuum. Each congregation must follow its own genius; its ideal is dependent on the full development of its own individuality. We don't want our churches all to be of the same type. "It is this apparent paradox," says Professor Caird, "that the most individual is the most universal, which the Stoics brought to light; and by means of which they changed the whole tone and temper of early individualism." I understand this to mean that men or churches who fulfil themselves in the wisest, largest way, instead of trying to conform to a type, are each of them by their own path becoming universal, more truly than by trying to be universal. There is something to be said for denominationalism along that line, if, indeed, by denominationalism we mean fulfilling ourselves by the side of others, and not merely asserting ourselves as against others. There is no doubt something common to all churches, not of action, or of method, or of belief, but of spirit, of devotion, of love: a certain Christian character showing itself in diverse ways under diverse forms; but a spirit of reverence for God and of love to man; a spirit of self-sacrifice, of desire for goodness, and of brotherly love and sympathy.

Now, however, I would call to your remembrance some of the different types of useful, active, living churches which we have. There is the Sunday-school Church, largely based on and living for its young people. There is the Institutional Church, seeking to attract young people apart from the Sunday-school by its activities and its friendliness. There is the Domestic Mission Church for the poor. There is the old, respectable, conservative steady-going Church, in which almost everyone is related to everyone else, and in which, however unconsciously, strangers and new methods are equally suspected. It is a church essentially conservative in its spirit whatever it may be in its opinions. There is the church made by its minister, and dependent almost wholly upon him. There is the intellectual church, the social church, the reforming church. These, and other types I might mention, are, of course, not wholly distinct from one another. They overlap and share something of each other's character. But, broadly speaking, the churches that we know fall into two divisions, and we are each one, according to our own capacity and our own experience, inclined to defend the one and criticise the other. There is the church whose members want little more than Sunday worship, and whose influence is felt by the work they do in the world, by the life they live in their homes, and by the philanthropic and social activities apart from the church in which they engage. And, on the other hand, there is the church whose members want it to be a home, and to provide the larger part of their social life, the chief means for their education, and the main channel for their moral sympathies. I think a minister makes a mistake in trying to turn one type of church into another type. I think, because we like and believe in one type, and find ourselves more fitted for one sort of work, it is not altogether desirable to speak as if the other type were inferior. I love to hear a man expound and defend and speak passionately of the work or ideas in which he believes. We have had delightful, thrilling experiences of this in the last two days. I do not follow a man so happily or securely when he speaks of the work or ideas in which he does not believe. One man attacks organisation, and speaks of the weariness and drudgery and secularity of it. Another can see no good in a church unless it is what he calls organised; unless every one of the workers is actively engaged in doing something for the church to which he belongs; unless he is drawn into the Sunday-school, or the evening clubs, or social evenings, or discussion societies, or is serving on some committee, or, still better, on many. Now, I believe that we all know quite well, when not in an argumentative or irritable mood, that both types of church are good, if only there is the spirit of true religion in them, that they ought both to exist among us, and that the believers in one type ought to recognise gladly the good in the other.

Think, first, of the Institutional Church, which may be taken as a name for the first type. It is marked by extreme sociability, a constant variety, and a certain excitement; and, I must add, by numerous committees. Something is going on every evening; there is something for everyone to do. The minister and his helpers know how to set people to work. Everyone knows everybody else; the young people are given responsibility; they are made to feel that they are believed in and cared for. Their interest and enthusiasm is aroused. The whole place is full of busy, eager life. It is a splendid creation at its best. It demands true statesmanship of its minister, tact, knowledge of men, sympathy, power to rule without tyranny, and persuasive power to get people to do things and to give themselves and their money for whatever is needed. It demands, of course, Christian forbearance and self-forgetfulness, and kindly feeling in every member of the community, and the friction we sometimes deplore tends to cultivate these qualities. The minister must know how to bring the spirit of religion into everything that is done. He has to make his church into a public home; and a public home, in the best sense of the word, is probably the most powerful and effective rival to the public house, and to all the demoralising tendencies of the world. He must never lose the sense of the wood because of the trees, never let himself become a thing of shreds and patches. He must love detail, but keep the one thing needful. He and his congregation belong essentially to the Martha type of character. We should make a great mistake in imagining that Jesus disliked the Martha type of character. His method was to criticise affectionately the characters he admired, because they were so well worth criticising.

The young man who had kept all the commandments from his youth up, and who yet lacks one thing; John the Baptist, who had inspired him in early manhood, "And yet he that is least in the kingdom of heaven is greater than he"; the elder son in the parable of whom his father could say, "Son, thou art ever with me, and all that I have is thine." These are the people he criticises. He is very tender and gentle with all beginners in righteousness, like all great artists and teachers; and very stern with hypocrisy and unreality. But with those full of power and goodness and promise he is a loving critic, pointing out dangers and urging further efforts and higher ideals. Speaking generally, the minister of such a church, as well as the members, can do nothing else. He cannot read much, or think much, or do much active social or philanthropic work. Everything he has and is must be at the disposal of his people; he must live for and with them. But, if he does not read much, he learns to read men, and to know men, and to help men. He is essentially a man of business, of consecrated common sense, immersed from week end to week end in the work of the church or the mission, in touch with everything, and keeping everything in touch with the religious ideals which are the source and spring of all his activities. He is the ruler over a small kingdom which claims all his life. His preaching will be strong, not so much in itself, but because his people know and love him, and because he knows and loves them. It is a friend speaking to friends; it is the fellow-worker giving the spiritual touch to the varied common work of week-day meetings. The danger, of course, is the want of quiet, the oppression of detail, the over-emphasis on organisation, the care for outward things, social reforms, church methods, successful week-day meetings. The close fellowship of many diverse characters with one another tends to produce cliques and misunderstandings, and jealousies and bickerings, which may take the heart out of a minister. But, after all, it is through such heart burnings and failures that men learn to live wisely and work heartily with one another. It is the larger family life in the making. But, while we can all see the dangers which beset such a type of church, we need to feel what a splendid power for good such a united congregation and minister may exert. We are so afraid of being thought limited, and of being called sectarian. An intense, devoted concentration upon the affairs and the life of a small community need not make a man limited, and certainly need not make him sectarian. It may be, and often is, one of the best means offered to a man of building up character, and advancing the coming of the kingdom of God. Such congregations are, so far as I am aware, hardly found in Christianity outside the British Empire and America. They promote a knowledge of self-government, and of mutual give and take. Mrs. Sydney Webb, in an early work on the Co-operative Movement, speaks of such churches in Lancashire as having been one of the means of preparing for the success of the co-operative movement through their training men to work together, and manage the concerns of common life. Such churches are more numerous and stronger in orthodox Non-conformist bodies than in our own circle. But there are many examples of such united churches and such devoted ministers amongst ourselves, and those who know them and understand the work they do can only wish for more.

And then there is the other type of congregation, the congregation whose members are mostly busy at their own perfectly wholesome and right concerns; a congregation whose members have a social life, and a philanthropic life to a large extent independent of the church. Such a congregation wants especially to have religious inspiration and to unite in religious worship on the Sunday. They do not want to be taken hold of by the minister, and managed, and made to work at specifically church affairs. Nor do they want to be told what social reforms they shall engage in, or what methods they shall adopt. They have work of their own, amusements of their own, duties of their own. They want to be stirred to harder, more unselfish work on their own lines; not to be withdrawn from outside interests and relationships, but to be inspired to a fuller faithfulness in whatever work they are engaged. They feel, as we all must feel, the temptations of life, the danger of low views, the need of deeper consecration; they feel the pressure of convention and the fear of man, and a danger of losing high ideals. They want more energy, more love, more hope, more joy, a feeling of the swift and solemn trust of life. The minister of such a church must know when to let his people alone. He must recognise that he and his church are not the all-important things that they are for members of the other type of church. It is not a social circle they want, but a place of worship. They do not desire to be involved in an elaborate ecclesiastical organisation for the salvation of society; they prefer to join the secular organisations for that purpose, and look to the church for inspiration. The minister of such a church ought assuredly to know his people, but he is not in touch with them every day. He trusts them to find their own work, and does not require them to do good under his direction, or in the ways he may prefer.

He does not make the church into the week-day centre of their lives. He takes his part in public work as they do, if he has the chance or wish. He is the minister chiefly on the Sunday and in their homes. Such a minister does not see the results of his labours so easily or quickly as the minister of an institutional church. There is a lack of large meetings and of a varied, rich organisation with which to comfort himself when he feels depressed about his preaching and the services. The danger of such a minister is that he may be too self-immersed, too much apart from the common things of life, too sensitive. He may too easily fall into sloth and call it meditation, and into aimless reading and call it study. He may lose practical grasp on the things of the world. It is not his work to organise and manage, but to inspire. His Sunday services are all-important. It is the one great opportunity given to him, a weekly recurring crisis in his life, a responsibility of the gravest kind. If he fails there, he fails altogether. Such a congregation is not to be condemned for the absence of many organisations and church activities in the week. It is to be judged by other things, by its united Sunday worship and by the character and lives of its individual members in their separate work during the week. We want people to say, if they come amongst us, not "What is this congregation doing as a whole for the poor and ignorant?" but we want them to feel, first, that as a congregation its worship is real and true, that it is in dead earnest about religion; and, second, when they learn to know the individual members that they should feel these are men and women whose lives bear out the meaning of their religion.

The great danger of such a congregation is that it should fail in feeling a responsibility, a unity, a bond of fellowship, because there are so few outward and visible signs of it in common work. Some unity, some sense of brotherhood, some corporate responsibility there must be in every true congregation. It is not a number of scattered units coming together to listen to a sermon. But it is not true that the only way in which unity can be felt and expressed is in common, week-day work. It is the easiest way: it is often the right way. But I can imagine a true congregation in which very little goes on in common work during the week, in which each member does his own work in his own way in the world, in which every member does not know every other member, but where yet there is a spirit of unity, a community of aspiration, a community of worship, a community of sympathy. One aspect of such an ideal congregation may be described by negatives. It is not always interfering with its minister, and it is not supinely dependent upon him. It is not always criticising him and not abjectly admiring him, which I can imagine might be even more deleterious if not depressing. It is composed of independent men and women, thinking, working, praying for themselves, and yet able to subordinate private egoisms and prejudices for the good of the whole. Such a congregation is not over-governed by the laity, and yet it is a congregation in which every member feels some responsibility in the government as in the worship. Our rich laity suffer from two dangers. Sometimes they expect to have deference and great power because they are rich. Sometimes they prefer to keep out of all responsibility and management because they are rich. Our best rich men are able to forget their wealth, and take their part with the poorest in the management on equal terms of the church to which they belong. Such a congregation will allow its minister large latitude in expressing his opinion, and will not expect him always to say what each one of them agrees with. They will not easily be offended with him. At the same time, they will pay him the compliment of taking his opinions and the teaching of the church so seriously that they will not regard teaching with which they do not agree as unimportant because it is merely a pulpit utterance. Ministers assuredly do not want freedom to express any opinion because it does not seem to the congregation to matter much what they say. They want to be judged by the spirit of their teaching and by their power to give vital religious help to the lives of their people.

I have spoken of the responsibility which the minister of such a church must feel each Sunday in the conduct of worship. It is a responsibility which must be shared by the congregation. If there is little united common life during the week, little union in good work, then all the more is it essential that the congregation should feel their responsibility for united common worship on the Sunday. An ideal congregation will fill whatever form of worship they may have with life and energy and joy. Not much, I think, depends on whether the forms are liturgical or otherwise. You may have a tame, lifeless service under either form. You may have a service full of devotion and deep feeling and quiet religious faith with liturgy or with free prayer. But a congregation must sing the hymns, and not let the choir sing for them, and they must pray with the minister, and not let him pray for them. They must come not simply to be played upon, to be excited, to be made devotional, if the minister can manage it. Too often their attitude implies, "Here I am, now it is your business to do something with me." You may or may not do common work for man together on the week-day. You must do common work together on the Sunday if you are to be a church at all.

There is nothing our congregations need more, to whatever type they belong, than to feel their responsibility in public worship. They must not treat their minister as a priest praying for them and thinking for them. The true church is that in which a united people worship together, feeling the needs and burdens of their life, confessing their sins, praying for strength, looking up to God for his help in the stern battle of life.

II.—And now I would speak for a few minutes in conclusion of the ideal of a church in the larger sense of a union of congregations. This is a much more controversial subject, but it would be peculiarly unfitting for me to deal with it in a controversial spirit. I shall speak, then, as I think I ought to do, in a very general and tentative way, not entering into details, not laying down a scheme. Even in dealing with separate congregations some divergence of opinion is implied.

The religion of the spirit is to one man best expressed through the fewest possible forms, without liturgy, or sacraments, or ceremonies, or dogma, or organisation. Some building there must be, and some form—the simplest possible—of worship, as hymn and prayer and lesson and sermon. But anything further would injure rather than help the spiritual effect. I have claimed that this is indeed sufficient, and that you may have an ideal congregation upon these severely simple lines. But a belief in spiritual religion does not compel us to distrust all organisations, all externals. A body of some kind is, after all, in this earthly life a necessary expression, a vehicle of the spirit. The two points of view, the belief in the importance of a church, i.e., a union of congregations and the belief that the religion of the spirit should be as unorganised as possible, is well brought out in the last number of the Hibbert Journal by a Roman Catholic, Mr. Butler, in his criticism of Auguste Sabatier's book, "The Religions of Authority." He quotes Sabatier's description of the rise of the Roman Catholic Church. "In order to realise itself in a popular religious society, the new principle of the Gospel could not remain in its pure spirituality; it was condemned to be cast in the religious moulds of the past. The first step was the formation of the idea of the Church. The first Christian communities arose out of the imperious need felt by the individual believers to group themselves and to unite; these primitive communities or churches came to look on themselves not merely as sisters but as members of the greater community, and so it was natural that over the local churches should appear the idea of the Universal Church, and so the Catholic doctrine of the Church established, in its fulness in the third century, was produced by the internal logic of ideas and things." But while Dr. Sabatier sees in this evolution a logical and political necessity, he dislikes it. It is not merely, as I understand him, that he objects to this particular development into Roman Catholicism, but he objects to any development into a church at all. He does not admit the principle of evolution to be in any case applicable to Christianity. There is to him an idea of degradation, of corruption in the fact that the separate Christian communities living by the religion of the spirit grew together, and formed the ideal of a Christian church at all. On the other hand, Mr. Butler pleads with what seems to me much reason for a more respectful treatment of what, after all, is admitted to be a product "of the internal logic of ideas and things." We may object strongly to the Roman Catholic ideal of a church, and may feel, as we here all do feel, that such a church, with its authoritative dogmas and sacraments and persons, is not at all our ideal of a church. But that wherever you have separate communities filled with a passion for righteousness, with a common ideal, a common discipleship, a common faith, as was the case in the earliest Christian communities, a church fellowship of some kind will tend to evolve, and that such a church fellowship need not be a corruption or retrogression, but a fulfilment, right and necessary, of all that is best in their separate life, this seems to me to be expected and desired. There are and have been some of the best amongst us who are afraid of any kind of development of the Church idea; their fear is partly due to the particular kind of development into Roman Catholicism in which the early Christian communities evolved. There is a great deal more to be said in justification of the Roman Catholicism of the third century than we are always inclined to admit. This does not imply a justification or defence of Roman Catholicism to-day. But, of course, in all development there is danger. At the same time, we have to recognise that where there is a strong religious life in separate communities of a similar kind, there you will find a tendency to unite. We ought to watch and criticise and guide that development; we ought not to wish that it should be rapid, but we cannot without injury to the separate units permanently thwart and hinder "that internal logic of ideas and things."

Along what lines, then, should we look for our Church ideal? Broadly speaking, there are, at first sight, two forms of union. There is the union of defence and the union of attack. The union of defence is essentially trades unionism. It would be a union for defending our civil and religious liberties. Without wishing to criticise trades unionism among artisans or among employers, among whom it is quite as strong, or among professional men, where it is often strongest; while recognising, indeed, its value and importance in many ways, it is not the right basis for a church. It is essentially selfish; it is concerned with its own interests. The trades union is concerned with holding its own against the world. The true church is concerned with giving itself for the sake of the world. The trades union spirit, mingled with a much nobler and truer church ideal, is one of the main defects in the great Anglican community, and in our own little unorganised community it is by no means absent. It is essentially the spirit of sectarianism. It means that a man tends to judge the rightness or wrongness of things by the way they affect his own church; it means prejudice, a want of power to see things as they are, a besieging selfishness which he does not recognise as selfishness, because it is not for himself but for his party. A league of defence, always considering our own interests as supreme, is most certainly not a church, although it may be in many cases a necessary and a useful combination in worldly affairs.

A union of attack is more promising because less selfish, but this, too, is not on the lines of union of the early Christian communities. By a union of attack we may understand an attack on what seem to us false dogmas or on social evils. It may be an attack on social, political, theological, or ethical lines. This is to make the church depend, not indeed on self-interest, but on close agreement in opinions. You cannot have a united attack upon social evils unless you are agreed as to what they are and how they are to be destroyed. You cannot have a united attack on false dogmas unless you are agreed as to what they are, and what other dogmas you should put in their places. But you can undermine social evils and false dogmas, and you can inspire men to destroy particular forms of social injustice and dogmatic untruths by religious fellowship. We shall all agree that every Christian community must strive in its own way against social injustice and in favour of the good of all: it cannot justify its existence unless there is some influence exerted for what is just and right upon society. We should all agree that every Christian community must work for what seems to it to be the truth, and must protest against falsehood and hypocrisy. But if you are going to make the Church ideal depend on a common united attack on social or theological lines, you must demand an agreement in opinions which you will not find among the members of our churches, and which will, if insisted on, exclude many religious Christian men and women. This is not the condemnation of the Christian Church, it is simply to say that it is not a committee or a party, but a Church, not founded on agreement in the letter, but on agreement in the spirit. I would have churches join together in the same way and on the same terms as when individuals join our separate congregations. We don't ask a man, "Are you a Congregationalist, or an Anglican, or a Unitarian?" if he wishes to join our church. We don't ask him if he is an individualist or a socialist. His desire to join shows his general sympathy with the spirit and the worship and the ideals of the church, and that is enough. I would welcome any congregation into a Free Catholic Church union in the same way. The ideal of such a church would not be attack or defence, but self-realisation, and self-realisation for the sake of the world. In Mr. Carlyle's fine essay on the Church, in "Contentio Veritatis," this thought is well expressed. "The Church is, no doubt, in one sense a society selected from mankind, but it is selected in order that men may be trained within the association for the brotherly life inside and outside of the association. It has been by one of the most unhappy perversions of the true Christian conception, that the society of Christian men has sometimes been looked upon as though it was the sole field for the carrying out of the Christian life of brotherhood, and not simply the training-school for the life of brotherhood among all mankind. St. Paul at least," he goes on, "saw clearly that it was not in anarchy, it was not in the want of order that the true hope of society lay, but rather in the full organisation of life." "The full organisation of life," that is, in general terms, the Church ideal. There must be life in the separate communities, deep, throbbing, passionate, spiritual life before you can form a church out of them. But wherever there is such life in separate communities, combined with certain common ideals and certain common principles, as in the early Christian Church, there the desire for a larger church fellowship arises.

In these Conference meetings of ours, which close to-day, there has been, we all feel, with joy and thankfulness, a deepened sense of fellowship with men of various traditions and methods and ideas. There has been a feeling of unity in prayer, in religious ideals, in religious principles. In opinions we vary endlessly from one another. We can build up no church on opinions, and we do not wish to do so. But we are one in our freedom, in our desire for truth, one in our belief in the divinity of human nature, one in our discipleship to Christ, one in our faith in the goodness and the love of God, and, most of all, in our sense of responsibility to others and in the recognition of His call to work for the coming of His kingdom upon earth. It is on these foundations that our ideal Church must be and can alone be built.

OBITUARY.

MRS. SYDNEY COURTAULD.

MRS. SYDNEY COURTAULD, whose death on April 11, at Bocking-place, Braintree, we have already recorded, was the second daughter of the late William Sharpe, of Highbury, and sister of Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe. She was 63 years of age. It was in 1865 that she was married, her husband being the youngest son of the late George Courtauld, of Bocking-place.

"She gave up all her life to work for others," said a memorial notice in one of the local papers, and her loss will be very deeply felt. Mr. R. H. Fuller, M.A., who has been minister since 1895 of the Free Christian Church at Braintree, which was built in that year by Mrs. Courtauld and her husband (in succession to the chapel at High Garrett), writes of her as follows:—

"Her quiet courage was infectious, it was always based upon her belief in the utter value of Truth. As long as her health admitted she took an active part in the social meetings of the church. I was always struck with her singular power of interesting conversation with people of every sort. She was no lady patroness, but a sympathetic member of a community with an unusual power of expressing herself. Her large culture made talk with her at any time interesting, and her criticism of books and men most stimulating. On questions of progressive truth she was always in the van. Herself enjoying it she supported in others, both in their public and private utterances, absolute freedom. Deeply spiritual in her emotional life, she was entirely untrammelled in her intellectual attitude, and always interested in the most advanced thought and speculation. Her many public works were in the promotion of education. The following is an extract from the Braintree local paper; it well sums up her educational work, and gives a sympathetic notice of the memorial service. I had the privilege of working with her for fifteen years, during the whole of which time no jarring word ever passed between us":—

Mrs. Courtauld was a member of the Braintree School Board from its formation to its dissolution. She managed the High Garrett School until it was taken over by the Bocking School Board. She was also formerly a manager of the Gosfield School. She was a member of the Technical Education Committee for the Braintree district the whole time it existed. When the Essex County Education Committee was formed Mrs. Courtauld was appointed on it, and her experience and zeal for the work were always very much appreciated. She remained a member of the County Committee until the end of last year, when, owing to her continued illness, she resigned. Mrs. Courtauld was also on the committee of the Greenwood Industrial School at Halsted, the Executive Committee of the Essex Cottage Nursing Association, and the committees of the Braintree and Bocking Nursing Associations. She was a trustee of the Braintree and Bocking Public Gardens, which were given by her late husband and herself in 1888. She established and has maintained for many years the Free Library at Bocking Church-street.

The Secondary School now in course of erection at Bocking is mainly the outcome of her efforts, and is being built on a site in the Coggeshall-road, adjoining Bocking-place, which she gave for the purpose. In politics Mrs. Courtauld was a Liberal; and she was a trustee of the Free Christian Church.

Mrs. Courtauld left directions that her body should be cremated and an inscription placed on her husband's tombstone in Gosfield churchyard, where many other members of the Courtauld family are buried. The cremation was at Golder's Green on Saturday, April 14, and on the following Tuesday a memorial service was held at the Free Christian Church at Braintree, when all the members of the family and a large number of friends were present. Mr. R. H. Fuller, M.A., conducted the service, which was touching in its simplicity. "Those who pass from this life," Mr. Fuller said, in the course of the service, "are at home in the Eternal; their strife over, they are at rest. But they live with us in tender and blessed memories." And speaking of Mrs. Courtauld, he said: "Her thought, her care, her tenderness, her service, remain a heritage in the hearts of many." Whatever hope might be entertained of future reunion, their great consolation in the hours after a loved one had left them was in the sweet memories which embalmed her spirit in the hearts of those who mourned her loss. The words of Edwin Hatch seemed to sum up her great aim in life:—

"For me—to have made one soul
The better for my birth,
To have added but one flower
To the garden of the earth:
To have struck one blow for truth
In the daily fight with lies;
To have done one deed of right
In the midst of calumnies;
"To have sown in the souls of men
One thought that will not die,
To have been a link in the chain of life
Shall be immortality."

THE GIFT OF GIFTS.

THE day with light its genial self engirds;
The trees are glad with fluty voices dear;
"Thou art my God!" When I say o'er these words,
I see a light beyond the day, and hear
Voices far richer than the song of birds.

Mine eyes with happy tears then overswim;
The thoughts I have are sweetest that can be;
My mind's a cup with love above the brim;
Fine incense circles round where'er I see;
In every sound I hear a holy hymn.

Thou art my God! Thou, Father, Thou my friend;
My Saviour Thou, the eternal Lord of all!
O thought which doth all other thoughts transcend,
Beneath whose stress well may I prostrate fall
In love and wonder which should know no end!

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THIS time, in April two years ago, we had a "Children's Column" about the birthday of our great English poet, William Shakespeare.

I told you about his birthplace, Stratford-on-Avon, in Warwickshire, about his childhood there, his love of flowers, and his love of the country. I told you about Shakespeare's children and his little granddaughter, and also about some of the story-children in the plays he wrote.

I told you how each spring the people of Stratford keep Shakespeare's birthday by decorating the old town with flags, and how the boys of his school began the custom of placing flowers on his grave on the anniversary of his death—April 23—the same day that is kept as his birthday.

And it is not only the boys of the old grammar school and the people of the old town of Stratford who keep Shakespeare's birthday with flags and flowers. Visitors come from all parts of England and from over the sea to honour the memory of the Stratford poet, who became England's poet—our national poet.

Shakespeare loved his native town of Stratford and the country where he had wandered as a boy. And it is fitting that the school-children of Stratford should honour his memory and take part in his Birthday Festival. They all have a holiday on that day, which is a very good reason for remembering him!

And there are other reasons why we should remember him.

Shakespeare loved England even more than he loved Stratford, and he helps us to care for our native land even more than for our native town. We cannot all go to Stratford for the Shakespeare Festival in the spring, and learn to know and love its winding river, its flowers and trees and meadows, its quaint old houses and its beautiful church. But we all know and love beautiful English country, and we can all grow, as Shakespeare did, to take an interest in what is outside our own lives, and take an interest in public affairs beyond our own neighbourhood. We can think of the welfare of those who live in other parts of England, of those who lived before our time, and of those who will come after us.

We all like to know the memory of any man or woman from our own school, who has become famous in the world, who has done some good work for England. Interest in our school and its history may grow to interest in our town and its history and also to interest in our country and its history in the past.

Amongst the plays that Shakespeare wrote three hundred years ago are some that are of special interest to us English folk as a nation, for they are made of stories from the history of England.

I expect you all know something of these stories. Do you know about the young King Richard II., who made such a good beginning and turned out so bad a king? Then there is the story of idle Prince Hal, who made so bad a beginning with his wild companions, but turned out such a hard-working king. And do you remember Henry VI., who became king when a baby, and was not fit to be a king even when he grew up? You will know about the young Prince Edward who was killed after the battle of Tewkesbury, and also about the two young princes who were supposed to have been killed in the Tower of London.

Shakespeare wrote plays on all these stories, and some of these English historical plays, as they are called, are acted each year at Stratford at the time of the Shakespeare Festival. The schoolboys and school-girls of Stratford go to see these plays, and know well how Shakespeare tells the stories of Richard II., Henry IV., Henry V., Henry VI., and Richard III.

If you will read again about these kings in your history books, I will try to tell you some of the things that Shakespeare teaches us to notice in their stories.

LILIAN HALL.

ACROSS GALILEE.

WE had been delayed (it matters not how) and our only chance of getting a clear, quiet day at the Sea of Galilee lay in making a journey right across from Haifa, under the promontory of Carmel, to Tiberias, on the shore of the Lake. In mileage it was comparatively little to do, say, forty odd miles, but here they count by hours, not by miles. When we announced our resolve to go through in one day we evoked wonder, not admiration. The road, we had heard from the English Consul at Jerusalem, was bad for a considerable distance between Haifa and Nazareth, and what it was beyond no one attempted to describe. But, as I have said, this was our only chance, and we took it.

We rose at four¹; a vivid flash of lightning revealed the blackness of a night not yet mitigated by the dawn. By a little after five we were on our way—three travellers, a dragoon, and a driver. Two horses instead of three were all that could be secured for us (we heard), but at Nazareth we should get a third; and the worst of the road lay beyond. So that was all very good. We rattled over the rough stones of Haifa, where scattered lights still flickered in nooks and corners, our driver threading in and out by all manner of impossible gaps and arches, till the long stretch of the eastward straggling town was passed, and the open country reached. On our right rose the round-topped slopes of Carmel, their grey weathered stones looking chill in the white light of day now full over the broad valley of the Kishon. There was no colour about this dawn. Others we had seen warm with flushes and glorious with gold; but here was a sky massed with steel-grey clouds, through which the sunshine, when it came, emerged, bright, radiant, but hueless. There, to the north, lay Acre, but we could not see it through the dark mists that rolled up from the sea to the West Galilean hills. Before us stretched miles of level green, palms, mulberries, fields of grain, narrowing at last to little more than the bed of the river where the hills from the north came down towards Carmel, at a place where tradition says Elijah slew the prophets of Baal.

Our road turned northerly across the river before this point, and began soon after to climb upwards. But we were not to enjoy the uplands long before a long and prophetic experience of the mud. It lay thick on the belt of black which here serves for a highway; it was thick in the fields at each side. We got out and walked, with feet that soon learned the folly of picking the way. The morning advanced much quicker than we did; but by and by we reached firm ground, and had a delightful mile or two of park-like scenery, hills and dales, with oaks in plenty, reminding us of England. Here, too, we caught the first promise of the abundance of flowers that afterwards amazed and delighted us. The birds sang—crested thrushes, goldfinches, and others not known to me; these, too, suggested the glades of Wimbledon, but there the music is fuller than I have heard anywhere in Palestine. These first low hills passed, the great plain of Esdraelon began to open, with its vast carpet of well-cultivated fields. We rise gradually towards a whitened village (Jeida), and when we get there we give the horses rest. Ourselves walk on, feasting our eyes on the ever-extending view to east and south, around us being this and that ancient site, identified as "towns of Zebulun," and so on. In some cases a few stones peeping out of a green mound were all that told of the former busy scenes; elsewhere we saw dull stone or earth-built huts, flat-roofed, with little sign of beauty or prosperity.

So far, in spite of clouds, the morning had proved fine and warm, but now a heavy shower drove us to the poor shelter of one little olive tree, till our vehicle caught us up. A friendly chameleon shared the shelter of the foliage with us. We got back across the field to the road; it was a barley field, and its clay was red and rich. Three thunderstorms the day before, and six the day before that, had well soaked that clay, and had soaked many a mile of similar clay, but more tenacious by far, that we were unknowingly trying to reach. Up, up, climbed the road, now a good one (for Palestine), and we reached a point on the southern spur of the hills where a great view was before us.

To our right stretched the long range of Carmel, its heights dotted with buildings of the monastic order, and the traditional altar place, the summit of the range, showed conspicuous towards its eastern end. There the lower hills began, lying across from right to left, the "mountains" of Samaria (really the tops of the central elevated mass that extends from the plain of Esdraelon to the south of Judea). There, eastward, were the hills of Gilboa, with Jezreel at the foot, where the plain begins to slope down by Beisan into the gorge of the Jordan. Over the gap, where Beisan lay, the mountains of Gilead, of Moab, were blue in the distance. More to the left, hard by, was the pointed mass of Little Hermon, and still more to the east of our point rose the massive dome of Tabor. Below was the great battlefield of mighty nations. Yonder, to the west, lay Sisera's headquarters on the day when from Tabor's slopes the tribal forces under Deborah and Barak rushed upon the foe, and won a victory for ever famed in Hebrew song. On the farther side was Megiddo on the one hand, Gilboa on the other, scenes fatal to Josiah, to Saul and Jonathan. But who shall fully tell the story of that fertile piece of earth, now looking so bright and so peaceful under the April sun? Who will recount the many expeditions that have marched there from ancient Mesopotamian and Egyptian times, to those of Greece and Rome, of the Saracen, and the Crusader, of the Turk, and of the Frank down to Napoleon's day?

Nay, we have stayed too long already, musing, and our own expedition must no longer be delayed. We round one height after another; we pass a garden-like valley, rich in palms and other fruit trees; we swing down a curving white road, and there, at last, six hours from our starting, is Nazareth, where we must halt and all have a meal. The meal encouraged us, but it was not the meal we had ordered by telegraph. This is a leisurely land, and the telegram came in just after we got to the hotel. But how about the third horse? "Impossible." In most voluble German, and with gestures almost violent, we were assured, first, that the road to Tiberias was frightful, would take twelve, ten hours; next, that no additional horse could be had. "You must stay here! You can reach Tiberias early to-morrow"—a daring, indeed an incredible, statement in view of what had just been said. But the undeniable thing was, that with two horses only, and those already well tired with the six hours and more of heavy work done, we must go forward if at all. We gave the animals an hour's rest, and walked through the little town seeing what we could en route, but deferring a fuller investigation till our return journey. We reached the neck of the hills above Nazareth by steep side streets, and now began a journey indeed. The worst road in England cannot equal this, first, for the stony "pavement," where such a thing exists; secondly, for the sticky clay where the pretence of making a road on the broad valleys and uplands is frankly given up. We pass the little Ain Kana (which cannot be the "Cana," I feel sure, after careful study of the place on a later day); we pass Reineh, and then "Cana of Galilee." Fair is that little town to look upon, but its ways are foul in the extreme. We pass it holding our noses, and glad that if we are to be overset (as appears most likely, a score of times) it will not be just there.

Thus we found our way down into a wide valley, to the west of which rose Sepphoris (of ancient fame), far away, and to the east of which rose a far hill, with stone houses and huts on the top, the name of the place being Lubiye. Our dragoman has no good opinion of the people of Lubiye, and brings with him from Cana a rifle with one trigger cocked already for immediate action if necessary. It was not the gunpowder that we needed to keep dry but the earth on which we trod, were it but possible. The poor horses had enough to do with our light, much-splashed wagon; we trudged with clay-laden boots hour after hour. The deep red clay was awful—but the flowers were lovely!

There were daisies (of the white ox-eyed variety) by the acre; there were yellow daisies, large and generous, and everywhere the pale "primrose face" of the wild gourd gleamed upon us; there were lupines richly blue, flecked with white; smaller speedwell-looking gems by the thousand; clovers, mustards, poppies, and others recalling the familiar blossoms of home.

But most beautiful of all the spring flowers of the country side where Jesus rambled in his youth, were the anemones and "wild rose," as it is called, though it is not a rose at all. It is a branching plant, seldom exceeding a foot in height, and bears many blossoms, which when opening look not unlike tender moss-rose buds, but expanded are discs of pink, a little waxen in appearance, with curved edges, very conspicuous among the grass. The anemones, especially fine on one slope, are of various tints, scarlet as poppies, light purple, dark purple, purest white, and as large as moderate-sized tulips. More common is a small, deep red variety, called by the native Christians the "blood of Jesus." These all, amid spikes and stars and bells and spangles of every bright tint, spread their glory over the sad, moisture-laden soil, and still lured us on.

At last, after another long rest, the village of evil repute is passed, and lo! here on our left rise the horns of Kurn Hattin, where, they say, the great Beatitudes were uttered long ago. Tabor had long looked over the ridge upon us at our right. Before us the land now sloped downward to a gulf where we knew the Lake to be; but it was hidden deep beyond our sight, nearly seven hundred feet below sea-level. Lesser hills had yet to be passed or mounted before the final descent began. The rain was over and gone. The glow of western sunshine fell full on the far hills of Bashan directly in front of us. Gorgeous hues bathed the massy clouds. A moon growing to the full came up beyond Jordan while still the sky was full of splendour. Strings of camels laden with grass and other produce passed hither and thither. The Bedouin (with gun on back) looked at us curiously as the wagon laboured through fields of barley and stones of all sizes up to that of a door-step. Once, twice, the vehicle was held fast. This wheel, that wheel in turn had to be taken off and put on again when the obstacle had been surmounted. The evening closed in rapidly. The sun set—two or three of us were far on ahead; we waited a little anxiously for the others in the growing gloom.

"Rajie!" shouted our dragoman to the driver; but Rajie was too far away to hear and answer. The jackals howled; bushes here and there looked suspicious in the gloom. We had left the rifle with the wagon!

Then, by-and-by, the wagon came. We climbed in and began the long, winding descent, about an hour long. We dimly discerned the water of the Lake—there, far beneath, were the lights of Tiberias. But now the driver's heart was glad, and he hummed a song as the wheels dragged through the clinging clay. The moon shone bright, and great stars, Orion being grandly conspicuous. We rattled under the arch of the old battlements of Tiberias at half-past eight. Rajie was welcomed by his driver friends at the hotel steps as a hero. We entered, weary but triumphant, and anticipating a glad morrow on the Lake: a morrow that, when it came, far exceeded our brightest dreams.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdeen.—On Monday evening, April 23, the anniversary social meeting of the Unitarian Church was held in the Union Hall. Mr. Robert Muir presided, and expressed regret that Miss Marian Pritchard had been prevented by illness from being with them, as they had hoped. They were looking forward to entering very soon into their new church. They had had to endure a good deal as representatives of reasonable religion, but were full of hope for the future. They now had a happier place among the other churches, a sign of which was the presence of the Rev. Alexander Brown, of the St. Paul-street Congregational Church, on their platform that evening. The Rev. Alexander Webster, in a brief address, mentioned that he had raised £1,731 for the new church, and they had also £1,000 from the McQuaker Trustees. They would enter the new church with a membership of 300, and have a position they never occupied before in Aberdeen. The Rev. A. Brown cordially congratulated minister and congregation.

Ansdel (Church Opening).—On Saturday afternoon, April 14, the new iron church in King's-road, erected by this congregation, was opened by Mr. G. H. Leigh. It is not yet two years since the Unitarians of the Ansdel and Lytham district began to meet for worship, and such progress had been made that they felt they must have a church of their own. The present building will accommodate a congregation of 200, and is opened practically free from debt. Mr. G. W. Ashworth presided, and, on behalf of the architect, handed a silver key to Mr. Leigh, who then declared the church open for the worship of God, in spirit and in truth, and proceeded to speak earnest words of their ideal of worship and religious fellowship. A vote of thanks, proposed by Mr. W. Bland and seconded by Mr. A. B. Webb, was passed to Mr. Leigh. The collection amounted to £10. After tea a public meeting was held, Mr. Ashworth again presiding, and an address was given by Principal Gordon, who congratulated the congregation on the progress they had made and on having a home for their simple Unitarian faith. Mr. Gordon also conducted the Sunday services next day, afternoon and evening.

Bradford.—On Sunday morning the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones referred to the disaster which had befallen San Francisco, and the large congregation rose in silence, as an expression of their sympathy with the sufferers. A message of sympathy from the congregation will be sent to the leading Unitarian minister of the city.

London: Hampstead.—The following resolution was carried by the congregation of Rosslyn Hill Chapel on Sunday morning, April 22, all standing after the sermon:—"That this congregation, united by many ties of affection with the United States of America, both through its former beloved minister, Dr. Brooke Herford, and by its own feeling of personal relationship with a great kindred nation, expresses its heartfelt sympathy with all those in sorrow and distress through the terrible calamity which has fallen upon San Francisco, and desires that this message of affectionate sympathy and fellowship in grief be conveyed to the minister of our Free Christian Church in that city."

London: Kilburn.—During the month of April four Wednesday evening lectures were delivered at Quex-road by Mr. Amherst D. Tyssen, D.C.L., the subjects being Josephus, Herod the Great, Mohammed, and the Apocryphal Gospels. The chair was taken on the first occasion by the Rev. A. A. Green, minister of the West Hampstead Synagogue, and on other evenings by Dr. Winslow Hall, Mr. E. H. St. Barnes, and Sir Roland Wilson. The lectures were well attended, and each was followed by a discussion; and reports of the proceedings have duly appeared in the Hampstead Advertiser.

Manchester: Broughton.—The Ladies' Sewing Society held a "Sale of Work" on Saturday, April 7, opened by the Rev. J. E. Manning, and during the afternoon and evening an interesting programme of music and recitations was given by various members and friends. The sum of £45 was realised, which may be considered satisfactory for a first effort, the society having only been formed last year.

Ipswich.—The Rev. L. Tavener has been conducting a series of special services. On March 4 the Rev. J. Jones, of Plumstead, opened the series with "The Christ we Love," a very powerful sermon to a large congregation. Mr. Tavener followed on the 11th, "Atonement." A general review of the history and origin of the orthodox plan of salvation was given, tracing its relation to the ancient ceremony of human sacrifice, and concluding with the more reasonable and lovable idea expressed in the prayer of Jesus that they may be one as we are. 18th, "Prayer." The preacher earnestly protested against the selfish and verbose prayer, and compared it with that highest and grandest attainment of man—communion with the Father. 25th, "Sin." Mr. Tavener described the condition of the world prior to man's appearance, animal life with all its savagery being predominant, yet no sin, because of the absence of law and conscience. With man and the giving of the law, the history of the long struggle against sin, evil, and animalism, down to the revelation of Light by Jesus. April 1, "Creeds." An instructive account was given of the history and origin of the three creeds. The preacher loved and taught the lessons of Jesus in preference to the creeds of Constantine and the expositions of the Bishops. April 8, "Worship of God." Mr. Tavener described man as a worshipping animal. The nearest approach to worship in the lower animals was found in the devotion of the dog to his master. In Jesus we have an example of true worship. The services have been very successful, being well attended, owing chiefly to the advertisements about the town. This has been made possible by the kindness and generosity of the B. F. U. A. A large quantity of the literature placed in the vestibules has been taken by visitors, who have shown themselves in other ways interested in the new thoughts given by the preacher.

Manchester (Pendleton).—The church anniversary services were held on Sunday, April 22, the preacher being the Rev. B. C. Constable, of Stockport. The services were largely attended morning and evening.

North Midland Sunday-school Association.—A very successful annual meeting of this association was held at Loughborough on Easter Monday, April 17. The sermon was preached by the Rev. A. Hermann Thomas, of the Great Meeting, Leicester, and the devotional part of the service was conducted by the Rev. D. J. Williams, of Belper. Mr. Thomas, in his eloquent address, dwelt on the importance of definite religious teaching in the Sunday-schools, and on the need of personal sympathy and love in the teacher. Miss Bird, of Nottingham, delivered a very interesting and highly appreciated address on the development of the sense of reverence in our Sunday-schools. Delegates were present from the Midland S.S.A., from the Manchester District S.S.A., and from the Yorkshire Union. About 120 people sat down to an excellent tea, provided by the kind hospitality of the Loughborough friends. The meetings were characterised by a spirit of earnestness and enthusiasm, and those present could not help feeling the stimulating influence of such a large sympathetic gathering.

Park Lane, Nr. Wigan (Welcome Meeting).—On Monday evening, April 23, a tea party was held in the Shaw Memorial School to welcome the Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, B.A., as resident minister. About 120 sat down to tea. Afterwards a public meeting was held, when Mr. Britton presided, and was supported by the Revs. J. C. Street, Harvey Cook, R. S. Redfern, R. P. Farley, R. C. Moore, Hy. Wilson (Congregationalist), and Mr. Peter Gorton, secretary. The meeting was opened by hymn and prayer. Letters of apology were read from Principal Gordon, Revs. G. Fox, A. W. Fox, Peter Holt, John Moore, F. T. White (Baptist), Wm. Williams (rector), and Father Smith. Mr. Britton and Mr. Peter Gorton, having cordially welcomed Mr. Higham, the Rev. J. C. Street gave an eloquent address, speaking highly of the work Mr. Higham had done in Wales and at Wolverhampton. The other ministers present also spoke, and Mr. Higham, in acknowledging the welcome, said he would endeavour to carry out the old traditions and the good work associated with that congregation. Music and a drama by the young people brought a very pleasant meeting to a close.

Saffron Walden.—The 69th annual tea meeting was held in the General Baptist Chapel on Good Friday, followed by a religious service conducted by the Rev. J. A. Brinkworth. The chapel has recently been improved by some structural alterations and redecorations.

Whitchurch.—Mr. Groom resigns the office of secretary of the Church of the Saviour at the end of the present month.

Wimbledon.—At the request of several of those who attended the special services lately held in the Worples Hall, another series will be conducted by the Rev. G. Critchley, B.A., in the smaller hall, commencing on Sunday evening, May 6. Unitarians living in the neighbourhood are earnestly invited to co-operate in this movement to establish a church at Wimbledon.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

IN the two enlarged numbers of THE INQUIRER, April 21 and 28, we have published all the papers read at the National Conference meeting at Oxford, and as full a report of the proceedings as was possible. This has been done by arrangement with the Conference Committee, and the report will not be re-issued in any more permanent form. We shall be greatly indebted to ministers if they will kindly make this fact known to their congregations, and draw attention to the great value of the papers. Friends who wish to secure extra copies should send in their orders at once.

IN this week's INQUIRER will be found Dr. Hunter's National Conference sermon at Oxford, and the address given by the Rev. Matthew R. Scott at the Friday morning devotional meeting. Also some further reports. We have still the Guilds' Union report to complete.

THE annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society is to be held on Tuesday evening next at Wandsworth. The chair is to be taken at eight o'clock by Mr. Herbert Lawford, and among those who are to take part in the meeting are the Revs. J. Estlin Carpenter and W. G. Tarrant, and the three missionaries, the Revs. F. Summers, S. H. Street, and Dr. Read; Mr. P. M. Martineau (President of the Society), Mr. Philip Roscoe (treasurer), and the Rev. H. Gow (hon. secretary).

THIS is the first time that the annual meeting has been held at Wandsworth, and a full attendance of members and friends is hoped for. For North Londoners we may note that the church in which the meeting is to be held is in East Hill, a few minutes' walk from Clapham Junction, or a halfpenny fare by tram or the green Putney 'bus, both of which pass the door. From Hampstead, we fear, it must be an hour's journey each way, but this is a meeting which ought not to be neglected. The train is: Hampstead Heath 6.32. leave Addison-road, Kensington, 7.17, Clapham Junction 7.28. And to return:—

Clapham Junction ...	9.50	10.5	10.40
Addison-road ...	10.2	10.16	10.51

SUNDAY, May 13, it will be seen from an advertisement in another column, is to be "Association Sunday" for the Churches connected with the Provincial Assembly of London and the South-Eastern Counties, and the Rev. Frederic Allen writes on behalf of the Committee, pleading for generous collections throughout the district, as an increase to the funds of the Assembly is greatly needed.

OUR readers will be interested to learn that Dr. S. M. Crothers is now safely installed in Birmingham. The subject of his Essex Hall lecture in Whit-week is "The Making of Religion." The members of the B. & F.U.A. are each entitled to one free ticket (not transferable), if application be made not later than May 29. Non-members may procure tickets at one shilling, if there is room in the Hall. The seating accommodation is limited to 550. Early application for tickets is desirable.

THE April Cornhill contains the last of a series of striking papers, "From a College Window," which Messrs. Smith, Elder & Co. announce to be published this week as a volume, with the name of the writer, Mr. A. C. Benson. This last paper is a plea for the simplicity of religious faith, after the mind of Christ, faith in the fatherly Heart of God.

"To express the religion of Christ in precise words," says the writer, "would be a mighty task; but it may be said that it was not merely a system, nor primarily a creed; it was a message to individual hearts, bewildered by the complexity of the world and the intricacy of religious observances. Christ bade men believe that their Creator was also a Father; that the only way to escape from the overwhelming difficulties presented by the world was the way of simplicity, sincerity, and love; that a man should keep out of his life all that insults and hurts the soul, and that he should hold the interests of others as dear as he held his own. It was a protest against all ambition, and cruelty, and luxury, and self-conceit. It showed that a man should accept his temperament and his place in life as gifts from the hand of his Father; and that he then should be peaceful, pure, humble, and loving. Christ brought into the world an entirely new standard; he showed that many respected and revered persons were very far indeed from the Father; while many obscure, sinful, miserable outcasts found the secret which the respectable and contemptuous missed. Never was there a message which cast so much hope abroad in rich handfuls to the world."

If any partiality was to be detected in Mr. Charles Booth's immense work on "Life and Labour in London; Religious Influences," it was in favour of the Baptists. When the author came to describe the work of these churches, with their membership mostly drawn from the lower middle class, he allowed some glow of admiration to touch the usually severe style of his volume. The Spring Assembly of the Baptist Union does not reflect the rather forlorn mood of hope with which the little congregation in the suburbs must confront the daily problem of existence. The men are the same men, but no longer as units in a small, isolated fellowship. They share in the impulse and uplift of a national gathering; and this is always a large part of the value of such assemblies. When we remember that the President for the year is the Rev. F. B. Meyer, we understand the tone of high enthusiasm which characterised the meetings.

MR. MEYER's presidential address was on the world and the church, and it was marked by the speaker's consuming zeal for two ideals—the ideal of a rather narrow and harsh evangelicalism, and the fervour of social reform and social service. Of the two the latter is the more prominent. The Christian idea of the Son of Man is contrasted with feudalism, or, as we may say, the antithetical forms of humanity and property. But feudalism is largely a thing of the past, and Mr. Meyer was quick to fix on the modern representative of feudalism, which he finds in commercialism. Against this, with its instrument of competition, he erects the banner of Co-operation. The speaker illustrated his general contention by reference to particular evils, such as the absolute inadequacy of women's wages. The oration was distinguished by a rare and noble passion for righteousness that probably is the most essential note at present in any great religious assembly. The intolerable wickedness of industrial conditions needs to be graven in the Christian conscience. We may doubt whether the precise remedies proposed are adequate. The black list of firms which underpay their workpeople has been tried without much success. But then we do not look to a presidential address for searching economic analysis, although the analysis must follow, and must be searching, if the fervour and moral idealism are not to remain idle.

AMONG the questions discussed when a great religious denomination meets in council some will, naturally, be chiefly of denominational interest, but we are impressed on this occasion by the prominence given to thoughts of larger, and especially of social range. Before referring to some of these, we may notice a doctrinal proposition which we cannot but regret. Notice was given by the secretary, Mr. Shakespeare, of an amendment to the constitution. One clause, which at present reads, Our Lord Jesus Christ is the sole and absolute authority, is to be altered to Our God and Saviour Jesus Christ is, &c. Surely, it is an untimely proposal thus to raise the question, in itself an empty piece of intellectual dialectic, of the deity of Jesus. We have recognised the growing attraction of an indefinite and emotional Christology; but we had hoped that even among our orthodox friends the time for fresh credal definitions had gone by.

WE turn now to subjects of thought which do not separate churches. Just as the front place was given to social reform at our own Triennial Conference, so was it in the case of the Baptist Union. "Our responsibility in relation to the child," "Our responsibility in relation to the youths," "Our responsibility in relation to young men and women," such are the titles of a connected series of valuable papers. They deal with questions of deep interest and deserve careful study. At present, however, we can only draw attention to two leading features. The critical importance of the environment gains full recognition. This is one of the directions in which religious discussions have gained most from the accumulating scientific knowledge of life and its development. There is at present a disposition to contest anew some of the particular dogmas which seemed scientific common-places half a generation ago. Be that as it may, and be the issue what it will, the religious mind has come almost imperceptibly to treat the problems of life and religion in the positive spirit. We notice also the deep impress of recent psychology. A great deal of what was said at the Baptist Union on youth sounds like an echo of Starbuck's "Psychology of Religion." For practical purposes the orthodox churches never have overlooked the incalculable importance of the years from 14 to 18. They have even over-emphasised it in respect of a single type of conversion. The general value of the critical period of adolescence for all purposes of life and character needs ever and again to be insisted on. We trace this broader outlook on the meaning of youth in this discussion.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

THE judgment we form of the Education Bill introduced by Mr. Birrell on behalf of the Government will be largely determined by the point of view from which we approach its consideration. If we measure it by our individual conceptions and standards, some of us would have preferred an Education Bill which, so far as the State is concerned, would have established a Secular system; others would grieve to have the Bible and all religious teaching absolutely excluded from the schools of the people.

In framing resolutions embodying general principles, or in setting up a private institution, it is natural and right to give utterance and form to our personal convictions and desires. In seeking to provide for the needs of the community, many of whom take a very different view from ourselves, it may be necessary to sacrifice, or at least to waive, some of our personal views in our desire to promote the common good.

There are, of course, certain fundamental principles of justice and right which we cannot and will not tamper with, even though it could be shown that we might thereby promote the common good. It seems to me, however, that in welcoming Mr. Birrell's Bill as offering an equitable and practical basis for the establishment of a national system of education in England and Wales, we are not guilty of transgressing any broad principle of justice or right, and we are placing ourselves in harmony with the feelings and desires of an overwhelming majority of the parents whose children attend the schools.

Many of the people (including most of the bishops and some Unitarian ministers) who are crying out aloud against the Education Bill, and indulging in very unparliamentary language, appear to be so engrossed in their own institutions or ideas, that they seem to forget about the children, the parents, and the teachers. If only the people of England would be governed by the principles and ideals of any one of the controversialists, the path of the statesman would be smooth and straight. It is largely because Mr. Birrell does not satisfy either the Bishop of London or Mr. Keir Hardie, but simply seeks to meet the needs and desires of the bulk of the parents whose children attend the schools, that the Education Bill becomes a statesmanlike measure.

The Bill is long and complex, consisting of forty clauses, several of which doubtless call for amendment. Its most important provision is contained in the first clause, which enacts that "on and after the first day of January, 1908, a school shall not be recognised as a public elementary school unless it is a school provided by the local education authority." This clause abolishes the dual system, and secures that all schools which receive State and rate aid shall be placed under public management. This is a great and far-reaching reform, and establishes for the first time in English history a truly national system of elementary education. It will, of course, still be possible for church organisations or private persons to carry on efficient schools, but it must be at their own expense, without State or rate aid. I should myself like to see the clause extended so as to bring schools other than those usually classed as elementary under public management, especially as in recent years there has been a tendency to circumscribe the term "elementary." All schools in receipt of public money should be subject to public control.

In regard to the teachers, the abolition of tests is secured by section (2) of Clause 7:—"A teacher employed in a public elementary school shall not be required as part of his duties as teacher to give any religious instruction, and shall not be required as a condition of his appointment to subscribe to any religious creed, or to attend or abstain from attending any Sunday school or place of religious worship." Unitarians may well rejoice that a principle for which they have contended so long should now be embodied in a Parliamentary Bill backed by the Prime Minister. I am well aware that there are other clauses and sections of the Bill which appear to render the words I have quoted inoperative; but if this be so, they can be amended in Committee, for there can be no doubt that the Government have determined that religious tests for teachers shall be abolished.

In regard to the parents, it has not been sufficiently recognised that they are under no legal obligation to send their children to imbibe either undenominational or any other religious teaching. Clause 6 reads thus:—"The parents of a child attending a public elementary school shall not be under any obligation to cause the child to attend at the schoolhouse, except during the times allotted in the time-table exclusively to secular instruction." If, therefore, the parents really desire secular education they can have it, if Mr. Birrell's Bill becomes law. In view of this clause, it seems absurd to say that the Bill enforces and endows undenominational religion. The Bill puts no obstacle in the way of every school becoming secular in the future, if the people concerned so wish.

The reason why secular schools are made permissive and not compulsory is because the great mass of the parents, I believe, desire that their children should continue to have simple Bible lessons without catechism or creed. It is easy to be critical or even scornful about these lessons. They are often poor and weak, and some astounding dogmas are taught in the name of undenominational religion. But the common instinct or desire of the parents is sound: they do want their boys and girls to grow up with the love of God and man in their hearts, and they like to know that their children can repeat the twenty-third Psalm, the Beatitudes, and Paul's sermon on charity.

If the clergy of the Anglican Church and the priests of the Roman Church would take a prolonged holiday, and if a few militant Nonconformists would accompany them, I should not despair of Mr. Birrell obtaining the support of ninety-nine parents out of every hundred for his simple Bible lessons. The facilities for denominational teaching seem to me generous, and I have serious doubts whether in a large proportion of Anglican schools at the present time more than two mornings a week are devoted to dogmatic teaching.

Clause 4 is designed to meet the peculiar needs of Jews, Roman Catholics, and other people who wish to keep their children cribbed, cabined, and confined within the boundaries of their sect or creed; it is not one that I personally like; indeed, I dislike it intensely, because it robs children of wholesome companionship with other children, and has a blighting and narrowing influence upon life. But it is an intolerant liberalism which refuses to recognise the facts of life, or withholds consideration and sympathy from people whose principles and ideals run counter to our own. There is no gainsaying that a considerable minority of people in this country cannot or will not appreciate the principles and ideals which seem to many of us so clear and noble. The Clause as it stands provides for extended facilities where the parents of four-fifths of the children desire denominational teaching, and it is open to serious objection: it cannot be reconciled with the principle of public control, and in attempting to carry it out, religious tests must be applied to teachers. I cannot believe that this clause will survive the criticisms which will be directed against it in Committee. Some wiser and safer plan of meeting the Roman Catholic difficulty must be devised.

There are several directions in which the Bill requires amendment. It is very important that the present unwieldy areas and system of administration should be replaced by a more direct and effective system, otherwise public control will become a name and not a reality. Into these questions, however, I do not propose to enter.

In spite of what bishops and archbishops are saying to the contrary, I am satisfied that the Education Bill is an honest and statesmanlike attempt to do justice to all sects and creeds, while its chief aim is to supply the needs of the community as a whole. It is not a Non-conformists' but a Citizens' Bill. The people who receive preferential treatment are the denominationalists; and I venture to say that if a Conservative Government had proposed such generous terms for the hire and upkeep of school buildings, with facilities for denominational teaching, many Liberals would have made a great outcry. That so many Liberals are prepared to accept Mr. Birrell's Bill is an evidence of a sincere desire to bring an irritating and troublesome controversy to an end, if this be possible.

TO CORRESPONDENTS: — Letters, &c., received from W. E. A., E. P. B., J. L. H., E. C. J., W. H. J., E. W. L., E. M. S., V. S., A. H. T., E. L. H. T.

CHRISTIANITY must continually begin afresh in the congregation of faithful men and women. No matter how much we may multiply congresses, conventions, convocations, conferences, synods, unless the Gospel lives in the congregation, and lives abundantly, its faith every day made perfect in works, our Christianity is dying. In the congregation as in the germ cell, the mystery of the new creation is unfolded, the promise and the potency of the new heavens and the new earth.—Rufus Ellis.

BY THE SEA OF GALILEE.

FAINT rosy bars of cloud lay across the golden flood that rose from the east, fuller and fuller every moment, into the tender blue of a clear sky. Peaceful night was yielding to happy day. The hills across the lake seemed to whisper an echo of the morning greetings that broke from our lips. As we stood on our balcony the little town of Tiberias at our feet took on a beauty before us which, unfortunately, a more intimate acquaintance did not justify. However that might be (and we were already fully prepared for the revelation of dirty byways and much unloveliness of the oriental kind), the two or three minarets, the white domes now gleaming in the sunshine, the few graceful palms, and the long-robed figures already moving to and fro in the open space below us, made a bright picture not to be forgotten. Whether the camera has caught anything like what we saw waits to be discovered, but no accident can mar the memories of that hour of daybreak by Galilee.

This was to be our one full day by the lake. We had come for this; through many a long league we had looked forward to these scenes, already familiarly conceived from descriptions and pictures. Would the realisation fail us? To one group of weary travellers whom we saw late in the afternoon sitting vacantly on the shore there seemed to have come a bitter disappointment. This was all—a large lake, deep among green hills, a broad, shining expanse, shut in to itself, to be shone upon daily and visited by but few sails, bordered by but few places of human habitation. To us, happier and (I trust) more grateful, it was one of earth's most eloquent scenes, its beauty in part obvious, in part suggested by what we knew, and by what we longed to know better. Jerusalem had told us the tale of struggle—should we say defeat? There, pathetic piety, as well as repulsive chicanery, had marked this and that spot for the traveller's pity and pain, telling again the traditional incidents of sorrow and martyrdom. Those city walls, too, and all the hills around them, were so saturated with stories of strife and bloodshed that the mind had to listen very closely to catch, as it were, the strains of that temple music which has witched the hearts of the generations. But here, by the sea of Galilee, the marks of war and outrage had long been covered by nature's gentler growths. It was easier to picture the once teeming villages and towns that fringed the lake, to recall the thousands of boats that, north and south, gleaned the harvest of the waters, or carried the busy traveller from side to side. The morning stillness, the freshening air, the glad sunshine, the rippling water, the pure heavens, cloudless for the most part, all seemed to conspire in bidding us remember that Jesus lived and loved here, that here he spoke his word of cheer and inspiration, that his soul here communed with the Eternal, his Father and our Father, his God and ours.

The activities of the day began soon. We filled a large boat, three of us being travellers, seven boatmen and attendants. There was not much help from the sail, and our strong oarsmen pulled lustily with many a laugh and jest, far on to the breast of the lake. Our programme (perhaps I ought in fairness to the other two to say "my" programme, but they were very patient with me) included several points of special inquiry, as well as the general inspection of the northern half of the shores. First, then, we made across for "el Mesadiyeh," a place on the north-east bank, about nine miles, perhaps more, from Tiberias. As we got away from the western side the generous proportions of the lake became more evident, and the panorama of the hills around opened more clearly before us. The grassy heights to the east rose to a general level, suggestive of their once forming part of a great plain, but now the mass is scored by valleys and wadies running down, often steeply, to the water's margin. There, says one, lay the "land of the Gergasenes"; there was Gadara, and the guileless young dragoon, himself a native of Nazareth, forthwith gave us chapter and verse for the accounts of the demoniacs in the tombs and the herd of swine. Our unappreciative ears must be excused for the sake of our never-inattentive eyes. See, there is Hermon, far in the north, broad, majestic, some amount of cloud, it is true, upon the summit, but the snowy flanks glorious to behold. Up there is the northern valley of Jordan; the exit from the lake is far behind us out of sight over the silvery waters. To the left as we go, high up, we see Safed, the "city set on a hill"; farther round are the crags of Kurn Hattin, and the cliffs of Arbela. These are high up, and Hattin, "the mount of Beatitudes," indeed, far west from the shore. On the shore itself are hardly discernible points of interest—spots where solitary and much diminished ruins lie, the subjects of scholarly debate. Is this or that the site of Capernaum? Was Bethsaida there or here?

We had come in an hour and a half, or so, to "el Mesadiyeh," about two miles to the south-east of the Jordan's entrance to the lake. According to one authority, the name "Bethsaida" has been heard applied to this place. I cannot think this other than a mistake; and it struck me, as the natives were talking, that the European's ear had been deceived by a rapid utterance of the real name of the place. However that may be, the site appears impossible for any town of the importance of the ancient Bethsaida. The village "el Mesadiyeh," stands on the outer (lake) edge of a wide, marshy flat, the first rising ground being a mile and a half or more away. In rainy seasons the huts can hardly escape flooding. They are rudely stone-walled, for the most part, with mud roofs; but a narrow scrutiny did not reveal any worked stones in the walls, such as ancient buildings might supply, nor were there any signs of old walls or loose stones, or even of mounds, anywhere on the flat expanse around. I feel pretty confident in my negative verdict therefore.

As we pushed along to the Jordan's mouth and up the river a mile or two, we saw many an object of interest: plants, birds, beasts, and a few human beings, yet the scene was, on the whole, as lonely as a creek in Essex. Jordan, when entered, flowed swift and strong around the reedy headlands, where buffaloes grazed, and fishing folk watched their solitary lines.

By-and-by we came to a large Bedouin encampment on the west bank, where we went ashore to barter for eggs (not forgetting to use our camera among the dusky, tattooed "children of Ishmael"—we were assured they were such by our Nazarene). There a little to the north-east lay "Bethsaida Julias"—not to be confounded with the Bethsaida we sought to identify. It is little more than a field of great stones. We got by-and-by into the boat, and went swiftly down stream again under the hot sun.

Three or four miles brought us to Tell Hûm, on the north-west shore, where a welcome surprise awaited us. We were aware that conjecture had long fixed upon this spot as the site of Capernaum, where Jesus lived after leaving Nazareth and beginning his public teaching. We knew, also, that a certain patch of sculptured stones had been spoken of as the "synagogue," where he taught. But we were not prepared for the scene that greeted us after landing and walking through a strip of garden to the little white monastery which is seen from far over the lake:

The so-called synagogue has lately been very thoroughly explored by German investigators. Dr. Torrance, of Tiberias, told me that evening that the more important discoveries were made as late as last year, and that no account of them has been published as yet, nor are any photographs permitted. It was as well that I, expecting but little, had left my camera in the boat! The excavation is truly most interesting. The pavement and boundary walls of a rectangular building, facing the south—some forty-five feet by thirty, I judge—have been laid bare, with the bases of the columns, six on each side, and some of the columns unbroken. There are some smaller pillars also, beautifully carved. The stone is a slightly reddish marble (quite unlike the local rocks), and the sculptures are, in many instances, rich and finely wrought in the Greco-Roman manner. The columns are round plain shafts, about eight or nine feet long and perhaps twenty-four inches in diameter. The bases would add considerably to the total height, of course, and capitals, portions of which are plentiful, have to be added. But the impression given is that of a building of modest dimensions, however skilfully adorned. Ten steps at the south-east angle lead down to what I judge to be the level of the lake. The corner pillars are doubled so as to show a heart-shaped section—a feature novel to me. We saw wreathings, leaves, birds, and other ornamental work, and something like limbs. Dr. Torrance says human figure forms have been found, and also a sun-disk! These details are all I can now give of this most interesting discovery—they seem to render the "synagogue" notion quite untenable. On the other hand, a building so imposing in character and material implies a town or city of no mean wealth and magnitude. Other excavation is going on, however, both here and on the sites of other supposed "synagogues," and no doubt the story of the explorers will, before long, be given to the world.

Much wondering, we put forth again, taking some produce with us from the monks' fields; and in the sunny noon we came to our rest again, near to the emergence of the "great" stream of "et Tabghah," and there we lunched under eucalyptus trees, by the side of a white beach, composed of small, smooth stones and tiny shells, the water being delightfully clear. The full-flowing stream of "et Tabghah" takes its rise up a little valley not far away, and had time permitted I had hoped to visit the tower where the water's head is found. As it was I had to leave the critical question of its height untouched, and content myself with a careful examination of the so-called "aqueduct" that lies along the hillside close to the lake, a mile or so to the south at a place called "Khan Minia." In the vexed question of the identifications of Capernaum and Bethsaida, respectively, this "aqueduct" plays an important part, but I cannot offer to discuss its bearings now. Simply as a matter of evidence it must be said that if ever the rock-cut passage was a channel for water, the present contours of the hillside, with a track leading to it on each side, are entirely out of level, and I failed to see how any stream of water could have been conveyed that way. On the south side, too, where the ruins are (now enclosed by a Crusaders' wall, as I suppose, a wall which contains abundance of old worked marble) there is no trace of the continuance of the "aqueduct," but the track, cut wide enough through the rock above for a loaded mule, drops easily downward on the stony hillside before reaching the "Khan."

I am afraid much of this will be intelligible only to experts, if to them, and I must hasten on. We came back to our boat by stony yet flowery slopes, by a barley field, and through a drying-up marsh, and set sail for Tiberias as the afternoon sun was low down on the western heights. Literally, set sail—for a wind had sprung up on our starboard. The boatmen hoisted to it, and away we spun at a good pace southward, heeling over, now and again, to the stronger gusts, away past the green and fertile plain of Gennesaret, past the grassy slopes that lead through the valley of Hamam up to the eagle-haunted heights of Hattin, past the tiny hamlet of Magdala at the foot of Arbela, up whose sides the caves, famous in the story of young Herod, were seen. Great Hermon, cloudless now, shone upon us in full glory. The lake took on a deeper tint. And so we came with full heads and hearts to our walled "city" of Tiberias again. But even yet we had an hour before sunset. So away we went a mile or two, first through the dirty little town, and then along the road to the south, through the scanty ruins of old Tiberias, reminiscent of the Talmud and Pliny and what not. We duly felt the hot spring, hot indeed. We tasted it, and here language quite fails.

In the moonlit evening we visited Dr. Torrance's hospital. It was a strange experience at the close of one of life's most memorable days. The sick and fevered inmates slept or tossed wearily in the large and airy dormitories through which we passed, and the man of science, and of Christ-like pity, too, had a word in quiet for this one and that, ordering fresh measures of relief as case might be. We saw the appliances of the surgery, the means of modern miracles, and heard the amazing story of the number of cases, many of them involving serious operations, dealt with at that house of healing, open alike to all, rich or poor, native or stranger. By-and-by we came out upon a moonlit terrace, shadowed by palms and other oriental trees. We gazed long at the lake, sleeping under that serene haze of light. The farther shore lay obscure, the stars shone bright in spite of the fulness of the moon. Through the night faintly glimmered the broad summit of Hermon like a ghostly thing.

THE SHREWD WAY OF GOD.*

BY THE REV. MATTHEW R. SCOTT.

Two summers ago, in the Western Highlands, I came across the phrase "the shrewd way of God" in a book by a new Scotch writer, whose spirit was born among the hills and baptized in the dew of the heather. He tells of a night of pitiless rain and tempest, and the cry of a child new-born in a lonely cottage far up the glen. When the morning dawns the child is there, its cry can still be heard, but the spirit of the mother has taken the long flight far beyond the limits of Loch Awe. With no mother, few playmates, little if any education, what chance can there possibly be for a child thus left? We should answer, None at all. "But," says the writer, "the child grew like a tree in a dream, which is seed, sapling, and giant on one turn of the scythe." Then came that terror of the Highlands, the plague called the "spotted death." Again we should be inclined to say, "That motherless orphan will be the first to catch the contagion." But no; the well-fed and the warm-happed went down before death like hay before the scythe, but "the little one, wild on the brae, neglected, sucking the whey from a tartan rag, gathered sap and sinew like the child of kings." Then comes the significant phrase "the shrewd way of God." It is, indeed, a shrewd way. It does not seem to us the right or natural way. Nay, on the face of it, and at short sight, it seems the wrong way. But the way of the Eternal is not short-sighted; it is keen, penetrating, far-seeing, shrewd. As the prophet put it, "My ways are not your ways, saith the Lord."

We hold in our hand the summer rose. If we knew nothing of the process of how it came to be what it is, so sweet and delicate and seductive, and we were asked to make a guess as to how we thought its beauty was produced, what a romance we should begin to weave of angel fingers and heavenly care! Such perfection, we should say, was never born of earth. It must have been nourished in the bosom of a sunbeam, sheltered, protected, loved, and a spirit from the throne of God must have breathed upon it to give it so exquisite a scent. "But my ways are not your ways, saith the Lord." Not in a sunbeam, but in the dark and seemingly forbidding earth, down through the soil to the cold and clammy clay, there in the clay the rose had its root. Damp and wet and rain gathered about it, the wind blew on it, the sun beat pitilessly upon it, the darkness and blackness of night overwhelmed it, February scowled, March stormed, and when June came, lo! the glory of the summer rose before which the wisest and best are dumb.

† It is, indeed, a shrewd way, the way of God. And it matters not whether it is a rose that is to be reared or a man—man the son of God—the way is just the same. It has often been pointed out that if a line were to be drawn across the earth, dividing it into two, it would be found that the men and nations to the north of that line would be characterised, as a rule, by courage, industry, perseverance, power, enterprise; while the men and nations to the south of the line, as a rule, would be like a different creation—passive, weaker, less reliable, scorning effort, loving ease. Yet look at the difference of opportunity above and below the line. Above, everything against man—frowning hills, winter, ice, snow, the wild and forbidding north. Year in, year out, man is kept at the daily stretch to gain a bare livelihood. He is the son of man with bent back and tense sinews, praying the Lord's Prayer, "Give us this day our daily bread." Below the line man does little, Nature much. She gives him his food, cooks it for him, does everything except just eat it. And the result. The one race is hardy, full of resource, sturdy, independent; the other soft, weak, dreamy, lost to the thrill of purpose achieved through antagonism and opposition. It is the shrewd way of God.

If it lay with us to draw up the programme of the life and death of the highest possible type of man, what a glorious career his would be, and how triumphant his going hence! In youth and boyhood he would carry all before him; as a man he would stride from victory to victory. So impelling would we make his power that none would be able to resist him, and when he came to die, his would be no common passing. We should send him forth in a chariot of fire to be greeted by Cherubim and Seraphim. Isn't that just exactly how men have drawn the pictures of the greatest souls? They were not born as others. A god was their father. They had the world at their feet, and lived lives of miracle working that struck amazement into all beholders, and in death their very bodies rose out of the grave and ascended into heaven. That is our way; and then we turn to the way of God. Jesus is born in a stable. Even at the wayside inn there is no room for him. As a youth he carries nothing before him; he is sorely perplexed by the deeper questions of life. He has much to outgrow, much to attain. The meditation by the lake, the prayer on hill-top and garden, tell their own story to the hearing and sympathetic ear. When the light comes, he goes to his brethren with the larger message, and for a moment it looks as though their hearts were his. It is but for a moment, for one by one they turn away. Heart-weary, he appeals to the few that still remain—"Will ye also go away?" Scribes, Pharisees, priests, people, all against him; and then the cross on Calvary between two thieves. "God in heaven," we cry, "not that way, not that way!" "My son, my daughter, my ways are not as your ways, saith the Lord." The shrewd way of God.

In the physical world men seek certain definite and palpable results, and in rearing roses, and in growing corn they have learned to adopt the way of God. They plough up the earth and take the seed by handfuls and literally throw it away. They dig down to the clay, and they plant the root of the rose right there—just the least likely place on earth if they did not know otherwise. And, in so far as they are faithful to the way of God, the end they seek is sure and certain. But we ministers and representatives of these churches of ours surely seek in God's great world for other than physical results. Ours it is, not to rear roses, but to rear men; men with souls like the soul of Christ, son at once of God and man. But how we shrink from the process, how we draw back from the shrewd way of God! Our way is to be plain, and smooth, and easy; every difficulty is to be cleared away; no rough winds are to blow, no baffling storms are to be encountered. Young men and women are sometimes invited to join the church, because in doing so they will be bettering themselves and adding to their pleasure and happiness. One church tells us that it wishes to keep its young men, and for this purpose a billiard table is absolutely essential. Another stands forth as a rival to the club, and is up-to-date in its sports and amusements. Now, there is nothing wrong with pleasure and amusement. Happiness has its own divine lesson to teach us, as well as sorrow and pain; but, as an inducement to follow Christ, can we conceive of anything so trivial and shallow? Wherever do we find Jesus inviting any soul to become his disciple on grounds such as these? On the contrary, if a man would be his disciple, "let him deny himself, and take up his cross every day." "Leave all and come, follow me. Whosoever cannot leave father and mother, and comfort, and fireside, is not worthy of me." And the end of it all? Jesus did not hesitate to answer—"In the world ye shall have tribulation."

"Is there diadem as monarch

That his brow adorns?

'Yea, a crown in very surety:
But of thorns.'"

"If I find him, if I follow,

What his guerdon here?

'Many a sorrow, many a labour,
Many a tear.'"

Ah! we say, the demand is too high; men will never rise to it. But what is the simple, historical fact? Men did rise to that very call, and they doubled and trebled their moral and spiritual stature. They had sufferings on land and sea, they were persecuted and sawn asunder, and the world that with its lips seems to despise them, in its heart of hearts pays them its deepest homage. There is a latent heroism in every human soul. The flesh shrinks, but the spirit leaps and responds. It is to call that heroism forth, and keep it forth, which is the great function of the ministry and the church. In doing so we are working in line with the divine order. It is the storm that makes the sailor, the battle that makes the soldier; and it is not self-indulgence, but self-denial, that makes the Christian. Not to please ourselves, but, as one of our teachers said at the Liverpool Conference, "to win souls from hell," is the real call to follow Christ. Poverty, drink, ignorance, moral and spiritual death—these are what appeal to the soul of chivalry to redeem a man from self, and his fellows from sin. It may not be an easy way, but it is a sure way, and it is the shrewd way of God. It rears roses and it rears men. In the Kingdom of God, we ask, whence are the noble and lovely lives, the fruits and flowers of the human race? And prophets and martyrs, and our own hearts, answer, "These are they that have come out of great tribulation, and who were led in the shrewd way of God."

MARTINEAU'S DOCTRINE OF MATTER.

SIR,—Will you allow me to ask what is the evidence for ascribing to Dr. Martineau the view of Matter which Dr. Rashdall did in his recent paper read to the Conference at Oxford? His statement at the time seemed to conflict with my remembrance, and on turning to pp. 406-7 of A Study of Religion, Vol. I., I find that Dr. Martineau argues very much on the lines that Dr. Rashdall himself does, against a causality partly in God and partly in Matter, and gives a distinct preference to the view of Boscovitch, which "assuming only space which can do nothing, and Mind which can do everything, excludes all controversy between two self-existences, and leaves the total causality with God."

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION.

A MEETING was held at Oxford, on Wednesday afternoon, April 18, in connection with the meetings of the National Conference.

The president, Rev. Frederic Allen, was in the chair, and among those present were the President of the Conference, Mr. W. B. Bowring, and the Revs. J. E. Carpenter, C. C. Coe, C. Hargrove, P. H. Wicksteed, H. S. Solly, and others. Dr. Drummond wrote, regretting that he was unable to be present.

Miss Alice Lucas read the paper on "The Development of the Temperance Movement" (published in full in the INQUIRER of April 21) by her sister, Miss Clara Lucas, who was prevented by illness from being present.

The CHAIRMAN expressed their gratitude to the writer and the reader of the paper, and noted with satisfaction such points of progress as the issue of the physical deterioration posters by the boroughs; the growth of the number of prohibition areas, the Royal Commission. Even the decline in value of brewery shares indicated that temperance reform was waking up. The best sign of all was in the legislative chamber itself, where there were known to be two hundred abstainers.

Rev. P. H. WICKSTEED remembered hearing the orator, J. P. Gough, forty-six years ago, and reminded the audience of the taunt, and scorn, and social persecution under which teetotalers suffered in those days. At the present there was need of some courage in order to be consistent. We ought to be able to offer our guests that drink which we advocated, but social customs often defied that principle. Many were prepared to stand the social odium brought upon them by refusing to supply alcoholic drink to their guests. He would advise each advocate to do enough to make himself "distinctly uncomfortable" in society.

Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER said he was always deeply interested in all that affected student life in the University. Last autumn the Bishop of London preached a sermon condemning the drinking habits and customs at universities. The sermon was misunderstood at the time, and had aroused some criticism. For his part, he found enthusiasm among students for temperance work—a sign of the distinct growth of the movement, which made it easier for a man to be known as an abstainer. As to the possibility of an undergraduate entertaining, without providing intoxicating drink for his guests, he thought that a man should not provide "that kind of poison" the use of which he condemned. At Manchester College dinners wine had been provided, for the Principal knowing that "we are not all of one mind" had thought of all; but, personally, he was (as Mr. Wicksteed had said), uncomfortable about it.

Rev. A. A. CHARLESWORTH thought the paper very interesting. Wise and influential methods of educating the young were always necessary. He should like to suggest that in each Sunday School a teacher should be set apart to specialise in the subject of alcoholic abstinence (he knew it was an ideal for each teacher to be an abstainer), and continue teaching that to the classes in rotation. Thus, we might do more than is at present done in temperance societies and bands of hope for the children.

The Revs. C. D. Badland, C. Hargrove, Rowland Hill, J. H. Wicksteed and J. B. Higham also took part in the discussion.

THE VAN MISSION.

A VERY encouraging meeting of those interested in the Van Mission was held at Manchester College, Oxford, on Thursday afternoon, April 19, in connection with the National Conference meeting.

The Rev. CHARLES ROPER presided, and the Rev. T. P. SPEDDING gave interesting details of the coming tour of twenty weeks in the towns and villages of Lancashire and Yorkshire. He reported that during the Conference many more offers of assistance had come from ministers who were anxious to assist; that churches and schools in the neighbourhood of the places to be visited were offering assistance with choirs, bill distributors, and the like; that since the last notice of the work appeared inquiries had come in from all parts of the country as to the possibility of a similar mission in other districts; that offers of suitable literature were plentiful, the British and Foreign Unitarian Association having been especially generous; that the van would start with sixty thousand of its own hymn papers and leaflets combined; that the Fund also was getting on, being within £30. of the amount required for the season's work. In due course full instructions would be issued to the missionaries, and these gentlemen would be invited to report their impressions, so that the value of the work might be correctly estimated. Mr. Spedding expressed the thanks of the Committee to many friends who had assisted in all kinds of ways, and urged, in conclusion, that subscriptions might be sent in without further applications, so that the time generally consumed in seeking funds might be devoted to the many necessary details for the tour that still required attention.

The Rev. T. PAXTON proposed, and Mr. A. S. THEW seconded, a resolution congratulating the Missionary Conference on this undertaking, and both promising a contribution.

Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE, supporting the resolution, spoke of the warm interest he had taken in the movement from the outset, and the pleasure it had afforded him to receive that first promise of £100 which gave the van its start. He spoke of the help which the Mission was likely to prove to the men taking part in it, and said that up and down England there are thousands who are not reached by the ordinary religious teaching of the time. They wanted really to help men in their perplexity. That movement might lead them out of their "ruts," and on to the broad highway. He wished it all success, and hoped he might be able to take some personal share in the work.

Miss Gittins and Miss Tagart both spoke warmly in support of the Mission, and were followed by the Revs. C. D. Badland, C. Harvey-Cook, and H. Cross. The resolution was enthusiastically carried.

MANY of our friends saw last year the monument erected to Servetus at Geneva. It is now proposed to erect a still more elaborate monument at Vienne, where the last years of his life were spent as a physician, honoured and beloved of the people, until, in consequence of the publication of his Christianismi Restitutio, he was betrayed into the hands of the Inquisition. From the prison at Vienne, indeed, he escaped, but only to fall into the remorseless hands of Calvin, to be again condemned to the stake, and to suffer, October, 1553, his martyr death at Geneva. The monument at Vienne is to be executed by the sculptor Joseph Bernard, and will represent Servetus at the stake, while at his feet a symbolic female figure, representing liberated Knowledge, raises before Youth the veil, which has hidden the secrets of Nature. Youth, in the group, is translated into the image of two beings symbolising Faith in Freedom and Love of Truth. On the pedestal are to be bas reliefs representing episodes in the life of Servetus. The movement for the erection of this further monument has received influential support from the local authorities and men of science and letters. M. J. Brenier, conseiller municipal, of Vienne (Isère), is the treasurer, and M. Albert Monot, also of Vienne, secretary of the committee.

SHORT NOTICES.

A Short Unitarian History, by Frederick Blount Mott, is an attempt, which makes no pretension to completeness, "to give a short account of the historical development of our Unitarian Faith." Most of the chapters are revised from a little book Mr. Mott published in America in 1893, "A Short History of Unitarianism since the Reformation," but there is new material added. The book is written mainly for young people, and it may be found helpful, especially if used in conjunction with Mr. Gordon's "Heads of English Unitarian History"; but it must be used with caution, for it still needs revision. The Christian Life has already noted some points in the chapters on Erasmus, Ochino and Sozzini. It is not accurate to say, in the chapter on Theophilus Lindsey (p. 51), that no change has been made since his day in the regulations regarding subscription. The terms were decidedly modified by the Act of 1865. In his account of Servetus, Mr. Mott speaks of Vienne as in Italy, though it is on the Loire. Servetus was there betrayed to the Inquisition, and after his escape was burnt in effigy; but he did not escape "to France" (p. 31), for he was already there. When we read (on p. 38) that "from the date of the Council of Nicæa the power of Rome held the civilised world in its sway" we thought of the Roman Empire, but then saw that the Roman Church was meant; but the Bishop of Rome had by no means at that time secured the supremacy which he afterwards enjoyed, and which could be with some measure of accuracy so described. It is not a connected story that Mr. Mott tells; what he furnishes is a succession of glimpses of individual teachers, Erasmus, Ochino, Servetus, Sozzini, Bidle, Lindsey, Priestley, Channing, Emerson, Parker, Martineau, concluding with a statement from his own point of view of "The Unitarian Faith." Each biographical chapter has a brief appendix, with the most important dates and a note of important works. As an example of Mr. Mott's manner at his best we quote the opening of the chapter on Theodore Parker:—"That the quickening heat born in the bosom of Transcendentalism should reach the people, an orator was needed. That through all the mysticism its 'heart of truth' should pulse into the veins of common life, an enthusiast must appear. That the new vision should impress itself upon the visible world, a bold reformer must arise. All these was Theodore Parker. If Emerson had been the philosopher, the seer, the source of the new movement, Parker was its proclaimer, its devotee, its realist. Not a metaphysician, not a profound thinker, but with prodigious memory, enormous mental appetite, inexhaustible energy and fulness of life, he carried to the people not only denunciation of the dying creeds, but the magnificent affirmations of the purer faith. Emerson had made revelations; Parker preached them. Emerson had cried, 'Leave behind you all conformity'; and Parker left it behind." THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

LAST week I told you about the Shakespeare Festival at Stratford-on-Avon, and about Shakespeare's English Historical plays.

I expect that Shakespeare's way of telling these stories from English history is better known to the school boys and girls of Stratford than to any other children in England, for each spring they can see one or another. "Henry V." is a great favourite, and "Richard II.," too, is often represented.

More than once Stratford has had, not only one or two of these plays, but a set of them in their historical order, one night after another. Last year there was "Richard II.," "Henry IV.," and "Henry V."

At the end of the first of these plays, Richard who had neglected England, and spent his people's money on expensive pleasures for himself and his friends is deposed by Bolingbroke, and is killed in prison.

At the end of the next play we see Bolingbroke, as Henry IV., remorseful for his share in Richard's death. Then, too, he is afraid that his own son Prince Hal is going to be like Richard, wasting his life and neglecting his duties.

In "Henry V." we see Prince Hal, having turned from his wild life, winning honour as king and leader of his people.

This year there has been a longer set of plays, carrying the story on in "Henry VI.," and "Richard III."

Is not that a delightful way of learning English history?

Of course, it is only part of the history of these old times that we see in these historical plays. Shakespeare picked out of the history books he read just those events that he thought suitable, and left the rest.

Thus Shakespeare shows us Richard II. as "basely led by flatterers," to the harm of all England, and he compares these flatterers to the weeds and caterpillars which ruin a neglected garden.

"Our sea-walled garden, the whole land, Is full of weeds, her fairest flowers choked up,

..... and her wholesome herbs

Swarming with caterpillars."

But Shakespeare tells us nothing of the reformer Wiclif, whose followers were sowing the good seed of his teaching through the land, carrying here and there written copies of the Gospels translated by Wiclif into English.

Shakespeare tells us how Henry Bolingbroke destroyed King Richard and his flatterers, "the caterpillars of the Commonwealth." But he does not tell us how Bolingbroke, as King Henry IV., tried also to destroy the good seed scattered by Wiclif by persecuting Wiclif's followers, called Lollards.

No one who has seen Shakespeare's historical plays one after the other as they have just been given at Stratford could make a mistake between Richard II. and Richard III., as is done sometimes, nor mix up the three Henrys—father, son, and grandson. Shakespeare makes us like one and dislike another of these kings, admire one and fear another, laugh with one and almost cry with another. And he helps us to know them all. Shakespeare makes the people of long ago seem very real to us, very like ourselves, and he shows us that these stories are more than just stories. The stories have a meaning for England to-day, a meaning for each one of us who call England our home, our country—for all of us together who make up the English people, the English nation.

It is because Shakespeare speaks to us now as a nation, as he did to the English of his own time, that he is our national poet. He helps us to think, not each for self only, but also each for all, and all for each.

What each one of us does makes a difference to other people. It is easier to see this in the life of a king. It seems to matter more to more people. So the stories of kings may be specially interesting. Shakespeare tells their stories so that in each play we feel that what the king does matters very much to England. He makes us see how each in turn, by his strength or weakness, cruelty or gentleness, industry or idleness, makes a difference to the whole nation. All "our sea-walled garden" of England suffers from the neglect of Richard II.

And Shakespeare shows also that it matters very much what each one does—other people as well as kings. When Richard II. is in prison expecting death, and thinking how he had wasted his life, he is brought in his last moments to a gentler mood by music beyond the walls of his prison, played, he guesses, by some one who loves him. He is grateful for the music, and grateful, too, for the visit of a poor groom who has leave to come and visit him—the groom who had tended Richard's favourite horse roan Barbary.

It is easy to see how much the life of Henry V. matters to all England.

As Prince Hal he made his father and other thoughtful people very anxious about the future. They dreaded the time when he should become king, and feared lest some more bad government should lead to quarrelling and fighting.

Prince Hal's wildness made England anxious. Later it made France boastful and careless and eager for war with the nation that was so "idly-kinged."

In the later plays we shall see next week how the later consequences in the life of England and of France of Richard II.'s neglect of England led to much quarrelling and to Civil War.

THE SECRET OF STRENGTH.

ONE looks back upon the week of the National Conference meetings at Oxford with a feeling that it has furnished a great wealth of matter for thought and earnest consideration. To this, indeed, our columns, in the last two enlarged numbers bear witness, and this week also we have much to record, and notably Dr. HUNTER's eloquent sermon, here published in full,

This sermon, and Mr. WOOD's on "The Dynamics of Preaching," have a common lesson for our Churches, which they will do well to take to heart. We want to know the secret of strength, and it is to be found in the life of faith and self-forgetfulness, which is with GOD in the world of daily duty, in all true affection, and in secret communion, in the spirit of JESUS. Mr. WOOD reminds us how that spirit searches the deep things of life, and Dr. HUNTER sets before us with great force the truth that the life of JESUS, and above all the appeal of its unselfishness and willing sacrifice, touches us so profoundly because in every feature of it his life answers to ours. He shows us what our life with God ought to be. In his manhood, which must be ours also, we find the secret of strength. And so also with the churches. Their true strength is not in any denominational zeal, or rivalry with other churches, but in self-forgetfulness, in loyalty to truth and justice and brotherly love.

The great purpose of the National Conference is to deepen the sense of common life in the churches, in unity of spirit and true consecration to the highest service. The faculty for business in the Conference, as representing our Free Churches throughout the country, will doubtless be developed, as their common ideal is more clearly apprehended, and the determination to be true to it and work for it grows stronger. At Oxford there was too little time for adequate discussion, but that Free Catholic fellowship, of which Mr. Gow spoke, will yet find fuller utterance, and with the power to speak, the power to work for the Kingdom of God.

By THE REV. JOHN HUNTER, D.D.

Jesus Christ, and him crucified.—1 Cor. i. 2.

LAST week, in a million churches all over Western Christendom, men and women gathered in crowds to re-enact in memory the closing scenes of the life of our Lord. Every resource of dramatic symbolism, of music and speech and silence, was used to impress the lessons which the Cross can teach. The good that is done by this annual commemoration need not, I think, be questioned. It is not wasted time, Mr. Ruskin once said, to submit ourselves to any influence which may bring upon us any noble feeling. It is to be regretted rather, that these memorial days of Christ should not be more widely and intelligently observed, and that by so many they should be allowed to pass entirely unnoticed, save for holiday and amusement.

It is not as ancient history, not as the record of vanished struggles and of sorrows long since comforted, we ought to read the story of the passion and death of Jesus Christ; but as a representation of things which in all their fundamental aspects are for ever true—a revelation of life, of man and of God, which is the same to-day as yesterday. Not merely as fragmentary reminiscences of a few dim years passed long ago in Galilee and Judea, on which we may exercise our critical ingenuity, ought the old, old story to appeal to you and to me, but as suggestion and symbol of universal fact and truth, able to stir within our souls, at each eventful epoch of our days, a new power of life. The temptation in the wilderness, the vigil in Gethsemane, the betrayal, the denial, the public judgment and rejection, the failure and the triumph of the Cross—all these events ought to have for us an immortal significance, and not only, or even chiefly, because they concern the Jesus of history, but because they interpret and express with infinite depth and power, experiences which, on their moral or spiritual side, belong to universal humanity. They have their ideal as well as their historical value. That, indeed, which makes the life of Jesus so inexhaustible in its freshness, so new and wonderful and helpful from age to age, is just the power which it possesses of illuminating our own lives in all their deeper passages. He is ourselves in advance, our representative. The scenes of his life, the closing scenes in particular, only gain their highest meaning when they are translated into moral experiences, and we are able to say with St. Paul, whose source of inspiration was Christ after the spirit, "I suffer, I die, I am buried, I rise, I reign with him."

In "The Secret," a fine but unfinished poem which seeks to represent Christianity as the flower and crown of all religion, Goethe draws a picture of man in his pilgrimage through the world in search of the highest good, coming at last to the Cross:—

He sees, betokening hope and consolation

To all mankind, the sign upraised high:
He sees the Cross, then lowers his veiled eyes,
He feels how great salvation thence proceedeth,
The faith of half a world glows in his heart once more.

In Christendom there is now, as there has always been, no spiritual attraction like the Cross. Not a few here and everywhere, who are proof against many other religious attractions, are drawn by this one. It touches them, some in one way, others in another way, each man according to his temperament, his character, his culture, his experience; but it is only the man destitute of spiritual life, if such a one can be found, who can stand beneath the shadow of the Cross wholly unmoved. We may not make much of it as a visible and material sign in our churches and homes, by our waysides and on our mountain heights. Some things which our fathers thought and said about it, we may not be able to think and say; but in discarding this or that use of it or this or that interpretation of it, we are not of those who wish to make it of none effect. It is still our symbol. The secret of its power is not bound up with any ecclesiastical exposition of it. The men who find in ecclesiastical theory and myth little to attract and much to repel, but who still glory in the Cross, and find the law and inspiration of their life in the faith and spirit of him who consecrated it by his death, are, in our day, a multitude which no man can number. We must not be of that small company of unpoised, unbalanced minds, who are for ever tempted to belittle what has hitherto been be-lauded in ways unreal and extravagant. Let not the exaggerations of men, their dogmatism or their sentimentalism, cheat us for one moment into thinking that we do not revere the Cross, do not love it, and are not loyal to it. Let us do ourselves no such harm! Let us not impoverish our spiritual life and the spiritual life of our churches by slighting this source of inspiration. The supreme office or service of the Cross is to quicken and nourish in the soul certain great emotions, affections, and sympathies; and if, in the solitude and silence of our inner life, and in our associated life as congregations of Christ's flock, it is drawing and keeping us near to man and to God, then assuredly we are not among those who are making it of none effect.

Of all symbols the Cross is not the property of a sect, the monopoly of a school, the badge of a party. It belongs to all as the loveliness of the world, as our great human affections and needs, as our sorrow and sin belong to all. It belongs to all who feel, and rejoice to feel, the healing touch of Christ, to all to whom he is as dear as he was to the disciples who, though they did not understand him, yet followed him, as he was to the women who ministered to him in Galilee, as he was to the outcasts who fell in shame at his feet. It belongs to all who get from it comfort, rebuke, inspiration, some help to holy living and dying. Alas! that men should cover it with their infirmities even when gathering around it seeking salvation. Alas! that at its very foot they should nurse bad tempers, confirm prejudices, and from behind it shoot forth poisoned arrows, even false and bitter words, against all who do not think of it as they do. Alas! that it should ever have been used to keep alive in the world the same intolerance, the same meanness and wickedness which crucified Jesus Christ. It was not differences of conception and opinion, but self-indulgence and worldliness of life, which made St. Paul denounce many of the religionists of his day as enemies of the Cross of Christ. Not differing thought and theory, but subjection to the senses, slavery to appetite, bondage to worldly custom, moral unfaithfulness, spiritual indifference; these are the things which in the present as in the past make of men and women the enemies of the Cross of Christ.

The Cross of Christ, I have said, does not live merely as ancient history, nor as the centre of an ecclesiastical drama, or of a theological system. It has a message, a real and living message for us, upon whom the ends of an age have come, as much as it had for the men who lived in the first Christian days. It only requires to be taken out of the atmosphere of the schools and sects and to be brought back again into the midst of our human life, near to our human passion and need, for men to feel its wondrous charm and power.

(1) You may have wondered at times why one son of man crowned with thorns and stretched out upon a cross should have made such a deep impression on the heart of mankind: why in a world where there are so many tears shed and so much blood, where thorns pierce so many foreheads, and the cross of anguish is so universal, that year after year, for well nigh nineteen centuries, men and women have gathered around this one sufferer and wept over him, as if the crown of thorns and the cross were alone his. In a paper published in the interests of Labour, I read not long ago an article in which the writer said: "There was a time when in Lent I wept for the Crucified on Calvary; now my eternal Lent is for the miseries of man and the suffering and crucifixion of all the best helpers and heroes of the world." There is much in the suggestion of that sentence which must appeal to us all. Again and again, in moments of deep feeling and clear vision, it must have appeared to us to be almost like an injustice to the suffering human millions in every country and age, a slight on the immeasurable miseries and martyrdoms of humanity, to dwell so much on what happened to one son of man long ago. Why just Jesus? Why the crucified of Calvary alone? Why should his passion and cross be so exalted and magnified? It must surely be because this son of man comes to us in his suffering as the representative of all the sons of men, because his sorrow has a universal significance, because his cross is the centre and symbol, the illumination and consecration of all our human crosses. But our Good Friday and Easter meditations would indeed be vain thoughts were they occupied merely with remote things. It would be a waste of precious feeling to muse and weep over the ancient story of Jesus' woe and to linger before his Cross, unless that Cross has a universal significance, and unless by the contemplation of that sorrow we are made more alive to the pathos of life, taught and stirred to bear more bravely our own sorrows, and to cultivate a finer and wider sympathy with our afflicted human kind. We may be sure that he who identified himself so closely and completely with suffering humanity in his native Galilee, and who said on his way to Calvary, "Daughters of Jerusalem, weep not for me, but weep for yourselves and your children," would not have us spend one thought or tear upon what he once endured were we not brought by that meditation and discipline not only nearer to himself, but nearer to men to-day in all their toils and tragedies and needs.

To purify the emotions, it was said long ago, was the office of tragedy—to lift the spectator to such a high level that he will be ashamed to go home from the contemplation of such struggle and suffering to make much of his own little ailments and troubles. The tragedy of the Saviour's life, to which Christendom has just been directing its thought, is surely being used for its divinest work when it is used to arouse and deliver us from our selfishness and to deepen our sympathy with the wrongs and sorrows and needs of living men. It is as the representative of mankind Jesus hangs there upon the cross. The pathos of the sight is in its appeal to that which corresponds to it in universal human experience, in your life and mine, and in the life of the race.

In some shape the Cross enters into every human life. Do what we may it cannot be escaped. Sorrow and pain pass no man by; and no reasoning can reason them out of existence, or reduce our fight with disease and suffering to a phantom battle—an illusion of "mortal mind." Living in a world where the blows of misfortune are constantly falling; where the ravages of suffering are nowhere long absent; where every joy is every moment exposed to blight; where development yields new pain; where increasing knowledge, increasing refinement, increasing goodness and sympathy mean increasing sorrow, and men and women suffer not for being worse, but for being better than their fellows, it is no wonder that the Cross appeals to human hearts everywhere as the symbol of human life, and holds us under the spell of a solemn fascination. Rejoice as we may, and as we ought to rejoice, in all that brightens and sweetens life, yet the fellowship of suffering is wider and deeper than the fellowship of happiness. A German poet has said that the image of humanity, broken in all its limbs, transfixed in hands and feet and sorrowful unto death, has become distasteful to men; but that can only be true of men in their light, careless, self-indulgent hours. In all our deeper experiences our feet tread the path that leads to Calvary, and we seek the Man of sorrows, acquainted with grief.

Christianity has been called the worship of sorrow, and there is much truth in the saying. It blesses those that mourn, and counts the sensitive and wounded heart of sympathy to be the divinest thing in man. It has not diminished the suffering of the world, but it has given it a new and nobler meaning, made it appear to be no longer God's wrath and curse but God's love and blessing. It has altered its expression, changing it from selfish suffering into the suffering which comes from aspiration and pity, and growing sensibility to the wants and woes of the world. Our communion with Jesus Christ, if it is a real thing and not a pretence, means that our natures, with all their susceptibilities, capacities, affections, and our lives in all their relations and interests and cares, have been tuned to a higher note, and brought into union with a diviner idea, and therefore many a burden and battle, and many a pain and pang unknown before. We cannot indeed imagine a Christian life at all without this underlying sensitiveness to the sorrow of the world.

Let us lay well to heart, then, this first lesson of the Cross; its revelation of the reality and power of suffering, of sorrow bravely accepted, borne, and so borne that it becomes a means and moment of development—a divine education. Though he were a son, yet learned he obedience by the things which he suffered. He did not suffer that we might not suffer, but rather that we might learn how to suffer. And did we but take to the inevitable ills of our day as he took to his, meet and bear them in his spirit, then would they lose their bitterness and sting; evil would be the minister of good, our struggles would be a discipline of strength, our pain would quicken and refine our pity, our suffering be a bond of sympathy with suffering everywhere, our sorrow a divine joy in the making, our cross the power of God unto salvation.

(2) We are accustomed to hear the crucifixion of Jesus Christ spoken of as the act of the human race; and such, in a very true sense, it may be regarded. A mind prone to dwell on the mere accident and letter of things may say, "I had no part nor lot in it; not in any circumstances could I have shared in it, or consented to it." That may be quite true; yet we have that in us which did it; that in us which not only admires and loves the character of the Crucified, or certain features of it, but that also which, when left to itself, takes sides against Christ, against the things for which He stood, and for which He stands. The crucifixion was the work of men, and we are men. In the little world of the human heart, your heart and mine, what contradictions we find; what capabilities for uncommitted sins, the very seed and substance of the evil which crucified the Son of God.

In thinking from time to time of the great world tragedy of the Divine death, we must not think of it as far away and strange—not only as happening in the Palestine of the first century, but as an actual horror in the England of to-day. The tragedy of the betrayal, the denial, the desertion, the rejection, we see constantly acted over and over again. In reading of Judas and Peter and Pilate, the Jewish priests and the Jewish mob, we are reading of ourselves. The dispositions and passions, the motives and interests which moved them and determined their conduct, have more or less a hold of us all; and in all the critical moments of life they are tempting us to follow their way and take their side. Our Lents, our Holy Weeks, our Easters would indeed be times of solemn blessing did they but open our eyes to the present reality of what seems to have only an historical significance—to the continual betrayal, denial, desertion, rejection, crucifixion of the Son of God; did they but strip the passion and death of Christ of their antiquarian and merely theological aspects, and make us realise that so long as men and women have weak, selfish, worldly, corrupt hearts the Cross and Passion cannot be confined to one land or century.

We shrink back from Judas with abhorrence—but let us not put away from ourselves the thought of ever being guilty of a like treachery. A divided allegiance is itself a treachery. Does not the love of gain, or the love of place, or the love of comfort often induce men, here and now, to betray truth, to betray love? We do not, as Ruskin once said, disbelieve our Christ, but we still sell him. How we blame Peter for denying the best friend a man ever had! How it fills us with a feeling of half anger, half pity, to see him turn coward and liar! And yet the denial of Christ is a very common form of sin. To deny what we know to be the highest, to live and act in another way in profession and trade and society, in Church and State, than the way which we know to be the best way, is to deny the real Christ.

We talk cynically of the Jewish mob crying one day "Hosanna," and the next day "Crucify," but how often do we see the professed followers of Jesus Christ guilty of the same inconstancy—as if mere lip-worship, idle, holiday adoration and the scattering of dead leaves and branches gathered from our theological gardens could take the place of that deeper and more practical loyalty for which our honest Lord and Master alone cares—the loyalty of the life to his Father's will and work.

We condemn Pilate, hindered from doing what was right by a cowardly and criminal fear of jeopardising his own interests; and yet is not his conduct in essence just what people are guilty of every day? Now and for ever the deadly record stands, repeated in thousands of churches, "Crucified under Pontius Pilate"; but have we not that within us all which can do what Pilate did—sacrifice the highest and divinest things in order to please Cæsar, to advance our prospects, or to keep our place in a snobbish society or a worldly church?

We wonder that the moral and religious people of Jerusalem did not lift up their voices against the crucifixion; and yet every day, in every town and village of the land, the Son of God is being crucified afresh—crucified by the selfishness which prefers private interest or domestic comfort to witnessing a good and brave confession for oppressed ideas, oppressed causes, oppressed men.

Certain philosophers of Greece were accustomed to say that if Virtue appeared on the earth clothed in her own native loveliness, all men would fall down and worship her. It is one thing, however, to love Virtue in dreams and visions of the mind, in poetry and fiction, another thing to love her when she appears in our streets and market-places, in our synagogues and temples, rebuking our insincerities and falsehoods. We may admire and worship the Virtue of dream and theory, and yet cry out, "Away, crucify!" to the Virtue of fact—to Truth and Goodness in the actual world of men.

The Cross may, then, be used to-day as yesterday, to produce conviction of sin, to find out where we are in relation to those evil principles and passions which crucified Jesus Christ. What was done by Judas and Peter, by Herod and Pilate, by the priests and rulers and the people of Jerusalem on that first Good Friday ought to start the question in the minds of each one of us, Lord, is it I? God forbid there should come to us the terrible charge, Thou art the man; thou art a Judas, a Peter, a Pilate, a betrayer, a denier, a crucifier of the Son of God. No, this must never be. And yet we know full well that it is possible to be charmed by the poetry, the music, the sentiment of religion, to be deeply interested in speculative theories of the person and death of Christ, even to feel the profound pathos of the Cross, and yet to be in spirit and life the enemies of the Crucified. Let us ever bring our emotions and moods to a practical test. Let us ever seek to nourish in ourselves and in others that love of the law and spirit and character of Christ, and of the things which were dearer to him than life, which sends a man out into the world to be faithful unto death—to follow the True even though it be to our Calvary.

(3) In the Cross of Jesus Christ we see absolute self-consecration to God in life and in death, the loftiest manifestation of the power of man to give himself to God which the world has ever seen. It embodies, it is true, no new principle, no principle which was not clearly illustrated in the years that led up to Calvary; rather is it the fulfilment and crown of the whole movement of His life—of the one principle, the one law, the one purpose, the one great devotion which dominated his being and doing, all his rejoicing and suffering, all his living and dying. It was the glory of Jesus to obey; apart from the Father he had no desires, no purposes, no interests; in the Father only did he live. This absolute dedication of himself to God, this absolute identification of himself with the will of God—a power, no doubt, which he gradually won and possessed in the silent years which lie behind his public career—gives us the key to the understanding of his influence and his place in history. Whatever prophecies there may have been of the Divine Sonship of humanity in the experience of men, it came forth into clear and complete consciousness for the first time in him who said, "I do always the things that please God." It is this perfect realisation of filial union with God that is the central fact of our religion. The divinity of Jesus is the divinity of sonhood. It is the revelation of the Father in the Son. And the Cross is the proof and sign of his perfect obedience to his Father's will—obedience even unto death. His life was not taken from him. In one wonderful saying—the strongest words, surely, which ever fell from human lips—he tells us that he laid his life down of himself, that he had power to control its events and experience, and was not the victim but the master of fate. He will not precipitate, but he will not avoid his destiny. "Master," said Peter, "save thyself"; but if Jesus had saved himself, saved himself by concessions to popular prejudices, and by avoiding the collisions which his devotion to the will of God made inevitable, he would not be the Christ we love to remember. From much reading of his story and meditating on his spirit we have that idea of him that it disturbs our sense of his dignity to suppose even for a moment that he could have yielded a little, compromised a little, and when his hour was come could have run away from his enemies or have hidden himself. "If thou be the Son of God come down from the cross," but we feel that it is just because he is the Son of God that he cannot come down; it is his filial faithfulness which led him there, and which keeps him there.

If for nothing else but for its example of moveless fidelity, of obedience unto death, we need to place ourselves and our congregations again and again under the inspiring influence of the Cross of Christ—an inspiration which nineteen centuries have not exhausted. In its light, we see at once our defects and failures, our powers and possibilities—that which both shames and stimulates, the mark of our high calling—a glory of obedience and faithfulness which can be realised within the conditions of our common humanity. It is not easy to put all selfish and worldly temptations under our feet, to take and to keep high ground; to say the true word and to do the true thing when it is terribly hard to do it; when obedience and faithfulness mean loss and suffering—a daily crucifying of the flesh with its affections and lusts—but in every tempted moment we see Jesus, the type, the promise, the prophecy of that which we shall yet be, if we faint not.

(4) In the Cross of Jesus Christ we see the revelation and symbol of sacrifice as the law of redemption and progress—as the way of love and redemption always and everywhere. This part of its message to men has been, and still is, much misunderstood and misrepresented; but the abuse of a great truth is no reason for slighting that truth; rather is it a reason all the more commanding for lifting that truth to grounds which are far above abuse and also far above the changing explanations of the shifting centuries of thought. The lifelong sacrifice of Jesus to the will and work of God, and to the good of mankind which culminated in his death, is both the type and the tide mark of the perpetual and universal sacrifice through which the world and man rise ever upward to purer and more perfect life.

It seems at times as though we failed to understand the highest things by seeking to understand them too far apart from our ordinary human experience. The Cross as the revelation and symbol of redemption through sacrifice needs to be brought back to our common life. So far as the principle is concerned, it is right to apply, and we do instinctively apply, all the New Testament phraseology of redemption to parents sacrificing themselves for the good of their children, to patriots suffering and dying for the sacred causes of justice and freedom, to the vast army of labourers who procure for us our necessities and luxuries at the cost of their nobler growth and comfort, and when we do so, all caricatures of the sacrifice of the Cross and all parodies of the Christian Redemption fall away, and we see that Jesus in his living and dying was fulfilling the law to which we owe all our best blessings, that the great fact of historical religion is the interpretation and transfiguration of the inmost fact of life. Without shedding of blood, blood of body, blood of brain, blood of heart there has been no remission of sins, no redemption from evil conditions, no progress from a lower to a higher state of society. Figuratively, if not literally, men have been crucified, their hands torn, their hearts pierced through with many sorrows, in the interest of every onward step and movement of mankind. It is by the way of the Cross light comes, freedom comes, growth comes now as always.

A modern writer, in a volume of weird sketches, tells the parable of an artist who painted a beautiful picture. There was a wonderful glow upon it, which won the admiration of all his compeers, but which none could imitate. They were eager to find out where he got his colours. They sought rare and rich pigments in far-off lands; but when these touched the canvas their richness faded and died. So the secret of the great artist remained undiscovered. But one day they found him dead beside his picture, and when they came to strip him for his shroud they found a wound beneath his heart. It dawned upon them that he had painted his picture with his heart's blood. Yes! the work which really helps the world—work of statesman and philanthropist, work of poet and painter and doctor, work of teacher and preacher, is work into which men put their life, their hearts' blood. It is this power to give without counting the cost to one's self, this power of suffering and sacrifice, which is the secret of all redeeming work. Putting away sin by the sacrifice of himself is what every truly Christian man here and everywhere is doing. The law of sacrifice which is wrought into the constitution of the world, which was the law of Christ's whole life, and which was uplifted and glorified upon his Cross, is the law that is laid upon every one of us. It is not enough that Christ offered himself upon the Cross of the world's salvation 1900 years ago, that sacrifice has to be prolonged and repeated in the lives of his disciples if the will of God is ever to be done on earth as it is in heaven. It can never cease to be offered until the world is redeemed from its evil and reconciled to the divine order of our human life—the true atonement.

In the sacristy of the Cathedral of Notre Dame in Paris, there is a memorial window to an archbishop who was killed in the discharge of his sacred duties amid the tumult of one of those revolutions of which Paris unhappily has witnessed so many. Beneath the window the words are inscribed, "The Good Shepherd giveth his life for the sheep." The application of the text is a most legitimate and right worthy one. The ideal of the Good Shepherd is the ideal of all true and noble leadership among men; and obedience to its heavenly vision is the sacrifice which God exacts as the price of all high and helpful service and influence. How does your work and mine look when judged by this text, "The good shepherd giveth his life for the sheep," giveth his life daily, hourly, year in and year out, puts all that he is and has into his work, and without reserve and without calculation spends himself in it? Can we, dare we say with St. Paul, "I count not my own life dear to myself," "I die daily," "I am crucified with Christ"? The Cross is the symbol of the life Jesus lived, and it must be the symbol of the life we are striving to live. Our work must have in it that same quality which makes the Cross divine. We must not preach self-sacrifice and practise self-indulgence. The fellowship of the Crucified is the fellowship of sacrifice, and the Church of Christ the sacred order of the Cross. Good is it from time to time to be reminded of this; good to listen to the message of the Cross; good to place ourselves at the side of Jesus Christ, and him crucified, and to hear him saying to us: Brothers, sisters! let us redeem the world together; together let us bear its burdens; together let us put away its sin by the sacrifice of ourselves.

(5) It is with truth Pascal says that Jesus Christ "took the way of perishing according to human calculations." The Cross is the revelation and symbol of victory, but of victory in failure and because of failure. There never was such an apparent failure as the Crucifixion. Every form of evil seemed to have won a triumph on that first Good Friday. But things are not always what they appear to be. It was the saying of a high-minded man who had striven in vain against an overwhelming majority in a clerical assembly, "When ye say all is over, then that will be the time when all will begin." The Cross was not the end, but the beginning; the beginning of victory—an endless victory to the cause of goodness in the world. Whatever else had failed, the loyalty of Jesus to the work of his life had not failed. The outward defeat was the proof of the moral victory. Had he been less faithful he would have escaped the Cross. There are successes which are sadder than any failures, and failures that are more glorious than any successes. It was by the way of the Cross Jesus went up to power and influence and glory—to the throne of human reverence and love. And somehow he knew and felt that he was to win by losing, to conquer by failing, to live by dying. And the history of all that is best on this earth is one continuous illustration of this law of the Cross. Let us not be afraid of those noble failures out of which have come all the great triumphs of the world. Let God's great cause be dearer to us than any personal or sectarian success. The lives of not a few of the great religious leaders of the last century seemed more or less a failure—Robertson, Maurice, Colenso—but they are having now a second and a better life—the victory which comes after apparent defeat and because of it. Because they were obedient unto death God hath highly exalted them. The path to real power still leads by way of the Cross. Let us, when we are tempted to measure our work by poor, vulgar, earthy standards, recall "the unfinished life that rules the world," that broken body hanging on a Roman gallows, and we thought that it was he who would have redeemed Israel. Edward Irving, when he commenced his ministry in the city of Glasgow, well nigh eighty years ago, resolved that he would "demonstrate a higher style of Christianity, something more magnanimous, more heroic, than this age is accustomed to." A higher style of Christianity is more than ever our need. Let us attempt it! Let us give ourselves to it. Let it not seem beyond possibility, too great to hope, too difficult to dare. Let courage rise with danger—the courage that will welcome a noble failure rather than be content with a cheap, an easy, a mean success.

(6) In one of the ancient churches of central Italy there is a unique representation of the crucifixion. Behind the Christ on the cross we catch a dim vision of the Eternal Father; the hands of the Father behind the hands of the Son, and the nails which pierce the Son piercing the Father also. We shrink from it at first as coarse and rude, but as we think about it we feel that it is the old painter saying in the only language which he could command, what has been so long and strangely forgotten, if not in form, yet in reality—that God is in Christ, that the Father is in the Son, that His love had not to be won by sacrifice, that it is His love which is embodied in the sacrifice, that the Cross and Passion are the revelation in time and space, in visible and historical form, of the grief and pain of a God who suffers for and with His creation and His children. Little, no doubt did the old Italian painter, or the church of his age, realise the full import of the symbol he used. Mediæval theology was partly Christian truth and partly Pagan and Jewish superstition, and that is still true of much of our theology; but truth is displacing superstition, and the law of the Cross is being seen more and more clearly to be the law of love in heaven as on earth.

It is difficult to account for the strange reluctance to associate the idea of suffering and sacrifice with God. To be Infinite perfection, Infinite goodness and love, God cannot be a mere spectator of sorrow and sin. God and man live by one law. Every man that loveth is begotten of God and knoweth God. Creatorhood and suffering, fatherhood and pain, love and cross-bearing, are joined together, and cannot be put asunder. The Source of all feeling and compassion cannot Himself be devoid of feeling and compassion. It is not a God callous as to suffering, careless as to sin, which the Bible, Old and New, reveals, but a God living in the life of the human race, afflicted in its affliction and bruised and wounded by its iniquity. Everywhere the love of God is seen in suffering and sacrifice. The compassion of man is not the accusation of his goodness but the revelation and proof of it. The sorrows, the sacrifices, the martyrdoms of the world's helpers are his. The sacrifice of the Cross is not made to God, it is made by God, it is part of the universal and perpetual sacrifice God is ever and everywhere making in order to take away the sorrow and sin of the world.

What a Gospel the Cross preaches to men and women troubled by the woes of life! Standing up against the dark sky, it says that God suffers in and with His creatures and His children, that He is the Chief of sufferers, that it is His pity and love and sympathy we see in the pity and love and sympathy of Christ and of all Christ-like souls.

What a Gospel the Cross preaches to men and women troubled by the sense of sin and guilt, tormented by memories of passion and shame! Knowing it to be a revelation of Divine sorrow and sacrifice, we cannot believe any longer that we have any Divine indifference or hostility to subdue: the notion of an angry God to be appeased by blood is abolished for ever. It reveals a love that seeks and saves to the uttermost—not a God from whom we require to be saved, but a God who is Himself our Saviour. Let not your sins, men and women, keep you from God! You may begin a new life at once with the assurance that God loves you, that He has forgiven you, and that neither things present nor things to come will separate you from His love.

Let us members and ministers of the Church of Christ gather again to-night around the Cross of Christ, and find, as we stand under its shadow, inspiration to live a life of love and sacrifice. Let us hear and obey its call to do what we see God in Christ is doing, to be His fellow-helpers and fellow-sufferers in bearing and taking away the sorrow and sin of the world.

MANCHESTER CORPORATION CEMETERIES ROTA.

THE Memorial, a copy of which appears below, was presented to the Lord Mayor of Manchester, on Thursday, April 26, by a deputation from the Manchester Association, consisting of the Revs. S. Alfred Steinthal, George Knight, W. Bishop, A. Cobden Smith, N. Anderton, Messrs. T. Fletcher Robinson (President), John Dendy, G. W. Rayner Wood, A. E. Piggott, and J. Wigley. The deputation was introduced by Mr. Councillor Marsden, and the Rev. S. A. Steinthal and Mr. John Dendy were the appointed speakers. Mr. Steinthal presented the memorial, together with supporting resolutions from the Lower Mosley-street Men's Class and Sunday-School congregation, and from the Manchester Domestic Mission Society, and the Lord Mayor expressed his general sympathy with the deputation in its objects, and promised to bring the memorial before the next meeting of the City Council, on Wednesday, May 2.

The circumstances which led up to the presentation of the memorial are as follows: At all cemeteries there are a number of funerals each week for which the mourners do not bring their own minister. The practice adopted in these cases varies in different districts, and in Manchester, as in many other places, it was the custom formerly that all funerals not otherwise arranged for should be conducted by the registrars of the cemeteries or by anyone they might appoint. In the autumn of 1904 an announcement appeared in the newspapers that the Park and Cemeteries Committee had delegated to the Manchester, Salford, and District Federation of Evangelical Free Churches the arrangement of a rota of ministers to conduct the Burial Service in the Nonconformists' parts of the Manchester Corporation cemeteries. The Rev. C. Roper, then at Moss Side, noticed the announcement, and at once wrote, unofficially, to the secretary of the Federation inquiring whether our ministers would be included in the rota. In the correspondence that followed it was quickly evident that there was no intention to include our ministers, and an official communication from our Association to the Federation elicited a definite reply to that effect (see Section 4 Memorial). The Park and Cemeteries Committee was next approached, which, after months of delay, at length replied that it could do nothing (see Section 5 Memorial). No other course was then open to the Association but to appeal directly to the City Council, and this is now being done. It remains to be seen whether the Manchester Corporation, which has freely received the best service of so many men of our communion, some of whom have adorned its highest offices, and which so far has been uniformly fair to all denominations in the community, as Mr. Steinthal out of his long experience testifies, will stand by its traditions. The present difficulty, to which our memorial directs attention, has no doubt arisen unintentionally in the first instance; but, if nothing is done to relieve it, a slur will be cast upon our ministers through "the setting up of a test in matters of religious opinion as a qualification for the performance of a public duty in the city."

THE MEMORIAL.

To the Right Honourable the Lord Mayor and the Aldermen and Councillors of the City of Manchester.

THE MEMORIAL of the Manchester District Association of Presbyterian and Unitarian Churches

SHEWETH—

(1) That your memorialists are an Association of Christian Protestant Nonconformist Churches in or near to the City of Manchester, of which the following are situate within the said city, that is to say:

Blackley Unitarian Chapel, Mill-street Free Church, Bradford; Wilbraham road Church (Unitarian), Chorlton-cum-Hardy, Cross-street Chapel, Longsight Free Christian Church, Moss Side Unitarian Free Church, Oldham-road Unitarian Church, Platt Chapel, Rusholme; Upper Brook-street Free Church.

(2) In response to an offer made by the Manchester, Salford and District Federation of Evangelical Free Churches, the Parks and Cemeteries Committee of your Council, on June 10, 1904, approved a "Scheme for the Conduct of Burials in the Nonconformist portions of the Philips Park and Southern Cemeteries," which scheme was subsequently adopted by your Council on July 6, 1904, and is now in operation. Under that scheme the said Federation is to be "responsible for, and shall duly provide, ministers to attend daily to conduct the Burial Service as may be required in the Nonconformist parts" of those cemeteries.

(3) The said Federation does not represent the whole of the Nonconformist churches in the city, and in preparing a rota of ministers to take duty at the cemeteries did not take any steps to place thereon ministers of Nonconformist churches not included in the Federation.

(4) Your memorialists brought this matter before the Federation with a view to securing the representation on the rota of ministers of Nonconformist churches who are not members of the Federation. They were informed in reply "that the Federation considers it has no authority under the scheme to arrange for the attendance of ministers of the Association at interments in the Manchester cemeteries. The scheme provides that 'Annually or as may be desired the Federation shall furnish a complete list of the federated churches whose ministers are to officiate at the services.' The churches in the Association are not federated, and, as you are aware, cannot be under the Constitution of the National Council." Your memorialists have no reason to believe that the Federation has taken or intends to take any steps for obtaining such an amendment of the scheme as would remove the alleged difficulty in the way of appointing on the rota ministers of Churches which are not so federated.

(5) Your memorialists then approached the Park and Cemeteries Committee, to whom both in correspondence and at a personal interview they submitted that provision ought to be made whereby the ministers of all Nonconformist churches should be alike eligible for service on the rota. From that Committee they ultimately received a reply, an extract from the minute of its proceedings of January 13, 1906, whereby it appeared that the Committee approved of a report from its chairman and deputy-chairman, in which it is stated:

"The Committee have no responsibility respecting the rota, and it is not possible for them to include the names of any ministers in it. If the Unitarian denomination were included on the Federation they would thereby obtain representation on the rota, but there does not seem to be any other method by which they can be so represented."

Your memorialists desire at this stage (while not admitting the correctness of the term "Unitarian Denomination") to make it clear that they do not claim representation for any denomination as such, but an equal treatment of all Nonconformist ministers of religion whether belonging to any or to no organised denomination.

(6) It now appears that

(1) The only way under the present system of becoming eligible for appointment on the rota is through membership of the Federation.

(2) Membership of the Federation is refused to all who do not come up to a standard which the Federation deems essential.

(3) That standard is not merely one of character, piety, or ability, but also of theological opinion.

(7) Your memorialists respectfully submit that the Manchester Corporation, by making over its powers in regard to the rota to the Federation, has, no doubt unintentionally, become responsible for and is acquiescing in the setting up of a test in matters of religious opinion as a qualification for the performance of a public duty in the city. And your memorialists further respectfully submit that such a state of things is both an anachronism and an injustice.

(8) It has been contended that, inasmuch as there has been reserved to individuals who may wish to have the services of their own minister the right to bring him to the cemetery, no injustice is done. This contention does not touch the question at issue, which is whether the ministers of certain Nonconformist churches are to be branded as unfit and ineligible to hold the official appointment on account of the presumed theological opinions of those churches. It is evident that under such a system the ministers of churches in which opinion is free, and of which it could not, therefore, be properly predicated that as churches they adhered to any particular system of theology, must remain so branded and disqualified whatever standard of orthodoxy might from time to time be set up.

(9) Among the Manchester Nonconformist churches whose ministers are thus now disqualified, and some of which are mentioned above, are some of the oldest in the city. From among the members of those churches there have, from time to time, arisen men who have been judged qualified to fill its highest and most responsible offices, and others who have spared neither time nor labour in working for the public good. The names of many such will readily occur to anyone conversant with the history of the city.

(10) In many neighbouring towns and districts it has been found possible to establish rotas which include the ministers of churches similar to those whose ministers are now excluded in Manchester, but who, if they removed to those other places would be admitted to take their share in this duty in brotherly co-operation with all other Nonconformist ministers. Among such place may be named Bolton, Derby, Gorton, Heywood, Macclesfield, Eccles, and Stretford.

(11) Your memorialists, having exhausted all other means open to them of dealing with this matter, respectfully submit for your consideration the above-mentioned facts, relying with confidence upon you as the Chief Magistrate and chosen representative of this great city and of every citizen in it, to remedy what is felt by some of those citizens—small it may be in number, but not on that account to be less respected or considered—as an indignity offered to their ministers and an infringement of that equality of opportunity and right of public service which is the heritage of all citizens alike.

Signed on behalf of the Association, pursuant to a resolution of its governing body, Dated February 20, 1906.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Ashton-under-Lyne (Stone Laying).—In the presence of a large gathering of members and friends from neighbouring congregations the stone-aying ceremony in connection with the new Richmond Hill Church, was performed on Saturday, April 28, by Colonel J. W. Pollitt, V.D., J.P. Among those present were the Revs. Lawrence Scott, B. C. Constable, E. Gwilym Evans, W. G. Price, H. B. Smith, J. E. Stead, W. E. Attack, W. F. Turland, W. Rodger Smyth and Thomas Hooper (Albion Congregational Church, Ashton-under-Lyne); Mrs. James Pollitt, Mrs. J. W. Pollitt, Mr. G. H. Kenyon (Mayor of Dukinfield) and Mrs. Kenyon, Mr. E. B. Broadrick (President, East Cheshire Christian Union), and Mr. T. Davies (Blackpool). The proceedings commenced at 3.30, with a brief Dedictory Service, in which Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, Principal Gordon, and the minister (Rev. H. Kelsey White), took part, Mr. Dowson reading the lesson, and Principal Gordon offering the Prayer of Dedication. At the close of the second hymn (Mr. Page Hopps's "God of our fathers, hear our prayer"), a bouquet was presented to Mrs. J. W. Pollitt by Miss Doris H. Wilkinson (daughter of the church secretary), on behalf of the ladies of the congregation. Mr. S. Moss (warden), then, in the name of the committee and congregation, extended a cordial welcome to all present, and, in concluding his address, introduced Mr. J. A. Grew (Architect), who handed to Colonel Pollitt a handsome silver trowel in commemoration of the occasion. In the course of his remarks, Colonel Pollitt expressed his pleasure at being present, and his sense of the honour which had fallen to him, and spoke of the remarkable progress which had been made by the congregation since its establishment nine years ago, referring especially to the good work done by Rev. W. C. Hall towards the consolidating of the Unitarian cause in Ashton. He had every confidence in the ultimate success of the movement under the present pastor and his able and devoted band of workers. The stone was then "well and truly laid," and a vote of thanks was passed to Mr. Pollitt, moved by Mr. S. Smethurst, seconded by Mr. Samuel Taylor, and supported (on behalf of the school) by Mr. J. T. Draycott. The hymn, "Come, labour on," having been sung, Principal Gordon pronounced the Benediction. Upwards of two hundred afterwards sat down to tea, and in the evening a largely attended soirée was held in the Richmond Hill school-room, Mr. S. Moss presiding. The programme included musical and dramatic items, one of the latter being given by friends from the New Jerusalem Church, and addresses by Revs. H. Enfield Dowson, H. Bodell Smith, J. E. Stead, and J. M. Craven (Congregationalist).

Belfast: First Church (Farewell Presentation).—On Wednesday evening, April 25, a meeting of the congregation of the First Presbyterian Church was held in the Central Hall, Rosemary-street, to make a farewell presentation to the Rev. Douglas Walmsley, at the close of his twelve years' ministry in Belfast. The presentation consisted of an illuminated address, a purse of sovereigns, and a silver salver. Mr. Bowman Malcolm was called to the chair, and spoke in warm appreciation of Mr. Walmsley's ministry. He called upon Mr. James M'Williams to read the address, and then on behalf of the congregation made the presentation. The address recorded the admirable work done by Mr. and Mrs. Walmsley in the congregation, and concluded with expressions of high regard and good wishes. In a letter of reply Mr. Walmsley spoke of the close ties which had bound him to the congregation, and concluded:—"Love your old Church still. Honour her for the faith she has cherished and for the spiritual freedom she has maintained. And by your spirit of piety and charity still serve the cause she exists to promote. Sincerely and earnestly I pray that through many years to come her work may prosper abundantly, for God's glory, for the name of Christ, and for human good." At the meeting he spoke further in the same sense, and said that while he had life and strength he would wish to be spent in the service of that Gospel in which he so entirely believed. Mr. John Rogers and other members afterwards spoke, and the meeting concluded with a vote of thanks to the chairman.

Braintree.—The annual meeting of the Free Christian Church was held after morning service on Sunday, April 29. There was a good attendance. Mr. B. S. Wood presided. Besides the usual business a resolution of profound sorrow at the loss sustained through the death of Mrs. Sydney Courtauld, who was so true a friend of the congregation, and of sympathy with the members of her family, was passed, also the following resolution:—"We express our sympathy with Mr. R. H. Fuller in the loss of so valuable a helper as Mrs. Courtauld, and our desire to do what we can to make up for the loss by rallying as far as it is in our power to the support of the cause as representing religion untrammelled by dogma. We desire further to express our sincere wish that Mr. Fuller may long be enabled to continue his work in Braintree as minister to the congregation."

Cambridge.—On Sunday, April 29, the first service of the Easter term was conducted by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, at 10, Emmanuel-street. Mr. Carpenter's visit to Cambridge is almost invariably accompanied by a large congregation, but hitherto accommodation has always been provided for all who attended. On this occasion, however, the room in which the services are held was quite inadequate for seating the number who wished to hear Mr. Carpenter, and it is to be regretted that several people had literally to be turned away. In the evening Mr. Carpenter read an interesting paper on the three synoptic Gospels before a large audience at the meeting of the University Nonconformist Union, a lively discussing ensuing after the reading of the paper. Next week the preacher will be the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of Leicester, when it is hoped there will be a large attendance.

Denton (Appointment).—Mr. Herbert E. Perry, of Wolverhampton, has accepted the cordial and unanimous invitation of the Wilton-street Congregation to become one of their ministers. Mr. Perry is already well known in many of our churches, where he has been welcomed as an acceptable lay preacher. He was formerly closely identified with the work of the High Pavement Chapel, Nottingham, especially in connection with the Sunday-school. Mr. Perry is a brother of the late Charles Perry, formerly minister of the Hope-street Church, Liverpool.

Kirkcaldy (Welcome Meeting).—A cordial welcome was offered on Monday evening to the Rev. Charles Sneddon as minister of the Unitarian Church in Hunter-street. Mr. H. Melville, who presided, spoke on behalf of the congregation, and the Rev. J. Forrest, of Glasgow, on behalf of the Unitarian ministers of Scotland, gave Mr. Sneddon the right hand of fellowship. The Rev. H. Williamson (Dundee), R. B. Drummond (Edinburgh), E. T. Russell (Glasgow), and W. Wilson (Kilmarnock) also joined in the welcome. Letters of regret for absence were received from the Rev. A. Webster, of Aberdeen, and Mr. Davidson, secretary of the Scottish Unitarian Association. Mr. Sneddon gratefully acknowledged the welcome so heartily accorded to him, and spoke of the extreme kindness which had been shown to him in a trying time, in coming out from the Church of Scotland, especially by Mr. Webster, to whom he paid a warm tribute. He spoke of his high ideal of the ministry and of his thankfulness for the freedom he had gained in a Church which stood for progress, freedom, and reform. He appealed to the congregation to help him to make their church a power in the town. A programme of music and recitation followed, in which Mr. Sneddon, who has great gifts as an elocutionist, took part. A vote of thanks, moved by Mr. Reeves, to all who had contributed to the pleasure of the evening, brought the proceedings to a close.

Pepperhill (near Bradford).—The chapel in this rural village has been recently renovated and re-furnished at a cost of £620. Towards this amount the Yorkshire Unitarian Union made a grant of £200, and the B. and F. U. A. of £25. The remainder has been contributed by members and friends of the congregation and generous donors in different parts of the country. On Saturday, April 28, a tea meeting was held to rejoice in this achievement, and the extinction of the debt. There was a large gathering—a re-union of old teachers and scholars. Heartiness characterised all the proceedings. Rev. John Ellis presided. A resolution of "sincere thankfulness to all who have contributed to the successful issue of the undertaking" was moved by Mr. S. Jagger, seconded by Mr. J. Teal, and carried unanimously. Earnest and stimulating speeches were made by Revs. A. H. Dolphin, E. Ceredig Jones, W. H. Eastlake, and W. Rosling, Mrs. E. C. Jones, and Mr. F. Clayton.

South-East Wales Unitarian Society.—The annual meeting was held on April 23 at Newport, the retiring president, the Rev. W. J. Phillips, in the chair. The annual report showed that good work was being done in the district, although it is sorely hampered by the lack of suitable ministers to fill the numerous vacant pulpits. The death of Mr. Carslake Thompson and the removal of several respected ministers from the district were the subject of much regret. On the other hand, the starting of the new congregation at Newport and other events were full of encouragement. Mr. L. N. Williams, of Aberdare, was elected president, and the treasurer, Mr. E. D. Williams, showed that the finances were fairly good. A resolution in favour of Secular Education in State schools was carried unanimously at the instance of the Rev. Simon Jones. An inspiring sermon was preached by the Rev. G. Critchley on "A Missionary Spirit the Great Need of our Liberal Churches," and the devotional service was conducted by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies. In the evening a public meeting was held, and was addressed by the Revs. W. J. Phillips, A. N. Blatchford, W. Whitaker, and G. Critchley.

Wood Green—At a musical service on Sunday evening at Unity Church selections from Haydn's "Creation" were given, and Dr. Mummery preached an appropriate sermon on the Divine Order of Nature. At the conclusion the congregation adjourned to the lecture hall, where Dr. Mummery, on behalf of the members, presented a handsome silver salver to Mr. J. Sudbery, a tribute of "love and esteem," as the inscription said, for his untiring zeal in the service of the church during the past sixteen or seventeen years. Mr. Sudbery with much feeling acknowledged the gift.

MEMORABLE UNITARIANS.

BRIEF BIOGRAPHIES OF WELL-KNOWN UNITARIANS.

There are in this volume nearly 150 brief Biographical Sketches of eminent Unitarians. "Many an inquirer," writes the Editor, "wishes to test the tree by its fruit, and to learn what has been the moral and intellectual calibre of the men whom Unitarianism has produced or has attracted."

"In some of these, who were educated in Unitarianism, the reader will see how noble and devout a spirit that education produced. In others, who were educated in Trinitarianism—like Milton, Locke, Newton, Watts, Porson, Paley—he will see by what acute thinkers, even when originally prepossessed against Unitarianism, the arguments in support of it have been pronounced irresistible."

"MEMORABLE UNITARIANS" is an invaluable handbook for Ministers, Sunday School Teachers, and for all who desire to become acquainted with the lives of the men and women who were the founders or products of Unitarianism.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AT our Whitsuntide anniversary meetings the American Unitarian Association is to be represented not only by Dr. S. M. Crothers, who, as already announced, will be the Essex Hall lecturer, but also by the Rev. George C. Cressey, D.D., and Mr. Charles E. Ware, who bears a name ever to be honoured in the fellowship of Unitarians.

DR. CRESSEY, after twenty-one years of active service in the ministry, having held pastorates at Salem and Northampton, Mass., and for the last fourteen years at Portland, Oregon, has come to England for some months of rest, but will be glad to preach in our pulpits as opportunity may arise. To-morrow (Sunday) he is to take the services, morning and evening, at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead.

THE ninetieth anniversary of the Peace Society will take place on Tuesday, May 22nd. The public meeting will be held in the evening at the City Temple, Holborn Viaduct, E.C. The President, Dr. Robert Spence Watson, will occupy the chair, and will be supported by Miss Frances Thompson (Birkenhead), Messrs. J. McCallum, M.P., P. A. Molteno, M.P., Canon Fleming, B.D., Rev. G. Friedlander (Western Synagogue, Haymarket, S.W.), Rev. T. Rhondda Williams (Bradford, Yorks.), Rev. Thomas Yates (Kensington), and others. Holders of tickets, which may be obtained from the Secretary, 47, New Broad Street, E.C., will be admitted from 6 p.m., and there will be an organ recital from 6.30 until 7, when the meeting commences.

THE second reading of the Education Bill has been debated this week. Some opinions upon it will be found in our notes on "Articles in the Reviews." This week we publish an article by the Rev. Henry Gow, and for next week we have an article on the Bill by the Rev. C. J. Street.

FAILURE?

FOLLOW the dead
In his dark-plumed hearse
To his lowly bed:
Is it better or worse?

He had his dream
On hill and lea,
By moor and stream
And sounding sea.

He watched the stars
Across the bay,
O'er crimson bars
Of dying day.

He sang his hymns
In morning hours
By brooklet brims,
Among his flowers.

Follow him down
Through lane and street
Of the big, grey town,
To the country sweet.

No hungry quest
For name or fame
Disturbed his rest,
Or brought him shame.

He searched the mine
Of mystery;
His guide, "Divine Philosophy."

They found him cold
On a bright, warm day;
A locket of gold
Near his verses lay.

"Failure!" one sighs;
Some whisper, "Yes."
A maid replies
"Perhaps success."

FOLLOW the dead
In his dark-plumed hearse
With reverent tread:
Is it better or worse?

IN THE ACADEMY.

THE idea of a jumble sale suggested by the Art critic of the Athenæum in a first notice of this year's Royal Academy exhibition satisfies an emotion which struggles for expression as one contemplates the strange medley of pictures gathered together at Burlington House. It is idle to ask how certain things could possibly have been admitted. There they are, and scores of others, not interesting enough to excite any astonishment. On the other hand, if in places this year's exhibition is decidedly loud, and never stirs one very deeply, there are an unusual number of landscapes, which it is a pure pleasure to see and for which one would only ask happier surroundings, and also some very fine portraits. Last year we noted Herkomer's great portrait group of the Landsberg burghers as the most interesting picture of the exhibition; this year, while we are inclined to give the first place to the landscapes, there is another very striking portrait group. One sees it at once through two open doors, on turning to pass out of Room II; the four Professors of the Johns Hopkins University, Baltimore, standing out vividly from a sombre back-ground, among them being Dr. William Osler, now Regius Professor of Medicine at Oxford. It is Sargent's finest contribution to this year's portrait gallery (257). Among the other portraits we may mention at once Dicksee's "Mrs. Henry Reiss" (67), Sir George Reid's "Bishop of Salisbury" (103), Briton Rivière's "Professor Frank Clowes" (161), where the man is happy with his dog, and Herkomer's "Dr. Malcolm MacColl" (438). Many friends will be glad of this opportunity of seeing Hacker's portrait of Mrs. David Martineau (424).

There are two pictures to which we have returned most frequently with constant pleasure, Peter Graham's "Morning" (40) and E. T. Compton's "Saleinaz Glacier" (460). In the first there is the delicious freshness of the early morning, and the clear deep waters of the sea about some rocks off the coast. The sun is just up, and touches the rocks with vivid light, and the white wings of the gulls hovering round. The Saleinaz Glacier comes down among the northern slopes of the Mont Blanc range, eastward from Argentière, and Mr. Compton's picture is a wonderful presentment of such a scene. So the great field of ice appears, under a sunny sky with great rolling clouds, and it is unmistakable ice. The air is clear and keen, as one looks across the glacier to the rocks, with snow in all their clefts, while in the distance is another range of snow-clad hills. Of the other landscapes we must be content to note a few numbers where we have found the happiest effects, often in quite unpretentious pictures: 63, 70, 209, 292, 294, 344, 473, 579, 598, and 796.

If anyone asks for an example of the loudness of this Exhibition, look at 326, the apotheosis of a motor-car, with some stiff portraits attached; and for the grotesque—unwelcome sign of a decadent art—76, 241, and 414. To get back to real life, look at 32 and 43 in the first room.

Of pictures by artists in whom many of our readers have a special interest, Miss Minna Tayler's "Reconciliation" (386) is deservedly fortunate in a good place. We note also Mr. Wetherbee's two pictures, "A Sleeping Shepherd" (5) and "The Wings of the Morning" (697), the latter especially striking, and Mr. Savage Cooper's "Rose softly blooming" (792). In the Water-colour Room Mr. Ernest Briggs has three pictures, 838, 909, and 940, charming bits of Highland scenery; and there is also Mr. Follen Bishop's "The Road up the Glen" (914). In the Black and White Room is Mrs. Basil Martineau's "Friede" (1281).

Among the Sculpture is a model of Sir W. B. Richmond's memorial to Mr. and Mrs. Gladstone, the recumbent figures side by side, to be placed in Hawarden Church; and F. W. Pomeroy's beautiful recumbent effigy in marble, for Rochester Cathedral, of the late Dean Hole, with some of the roses that he loved at his feet.

ARTICLES IN THE REVIEWS.

In this month's reviews the Education Bill naturally holds the first place. The Nineteenth Century and After opens with six contributions "For and Against the Bill." The Archbishop of Westminster and Lord Halifax each in turn states his own uncompromising position; Dr. Macnamara warns the clergy of the Established and the Roman Churches against the growing fury of their outcry against the Bill, and warns them, if they persist, that they will drive religious teaching out of the schools altogether; and Mr. D. C. Lathbury, who strongly criticises "undenominationalism," avows himself a convert to the secularisation of the schools. Dr. Guinness Rogers also warns the churches that this will come, if they do not have a care, and advises them to "agree with their adversary quickly." Mr. Herbert Paul strongly supports the Bill, and clearly states that there is no alternative but this secularisation. "The old denominational system is dead and buried. It committed suicide when it laid hands on the rates in 1902." His attitude towards the teaching of religion appears in this passage: "The vast majority of Englishmen are Christians, and there are lessons to be found in the Bible, chiefly in the New Testament, which all Christians hold alike. Commonsense says, 'Teach them to all children alike.' Bigotry says, 'Separate little children at the earliest possible age into rival sects, and let priests of all religions in among them to keep them apart.' The Bill follows the lines of common sense, and is odious to bigots.

The idea that it endows Nonconformity is absurd. Nonconformity is not a creed. It is a purely negative description of those Protestants who dissent from the Established Church. Some Nonconformists differ quite as widely from each other as from the Establishment. But they do not differ from the Establishment, or from each other, about the points which have been taught in Board Schools under the Cowper-Temple Clause since 1870, and it is this common Christianity which, if anything, the Bill endows. Nothing can be more erroneous than the statement that only Dissenters approve of this unsectarian, this Christian teaching. Liberal Churchmen are perfectly satisfied with it, and even freethinkers are in many cases willing that on moral grounds their children should receive it. No phrase in the English language is more frequently perverted than 'the Church.' It is sought to be monopolised by a little clique of ecclesiastical laymen, more clerical than the clergy themselves, Tories in politics, and sacerdotalists in religion, whom the mass of the laity regard with abhorrence or contempt. From these men, and from the Bishops, the opposition to this Bill mainly comes. The Church is no more opposed to it than the nation is opposed to it. An Erastian Establishment is best represented in the House of Commons." In this number Miss K. Bathurst's article on "The Physique of Girls" should be also noted.

In the Contemporary, Lord Stanley of Alderley has the first place for an article on the Bill. He would have been glad to see a reversion to a separate education authority, which, he is convinced, must soon come, and he also holds that the secularisation of all public schools is the right plan, with more thorough facilities for religious teaching, at the cost of those who wish to give it, than the Bill provides. He shows in an interesting manner how the Four-fifths clause will not meet the case of some Catholic schools, which ought to be met. Many of our readers will turn with interest to two other articles in this number, that on "The Moral Consciousness of Jesus," by W. J. Mackenzie, and that by Lt.-Col. Pedder on "The Parson and his Flock."

The Independent Review holds that when the strong feelings of the moment have subsided, the Education Bill will be regarded "as a courageous and fair-minded attempt to settle the difficult problem of religious education. To have produced a solution which would have satisfied all parties would have passed the wit of man. It is good evidence of a desire to secure a just and lasting settlement to have produced a Bill which does not satisfy any party completely." On the other hand, Mr. J. M. Robertson, M.P., has an article, following the Editorial Notes, strongly urging that the "secular solution" can alone be satisfactory and fair to all parties. Mr. A. Holden Byles writes on "The Elberfeld System in England," and Dr. Rashdall a very interesting review of the Life of Archbishop Temple.

WHEN the power of imparting joy
Is equal to the will, the human soul
Requires no other heaven.—Shelley.

NAZARETH.

SUNSHINE lit the hill-tops before six o'clock on Palm Sunday. In a few minutes I had slipped out of the quiet hotel, and up the walled lane on the other side of the main road that runs along the valley. Two or three hundred paces brought me out among the fields to the west, where women were already at work. I turned to take a long look at that scene before leaving it, I suppose, for ever. From where I stood to the spring and "St. Mary's Well" at the other (north-east) end of the town was about three-quarters of a mile. At that point the road rises rapidly on its way to Cana. At my left lay the open country side, less steeply graded, where we came in from Haifa three days before. In front and to the right was the little town itself, rising terrace-wise up the side of a long ridge, the summit of which is out of sight from the streets below.

My companions had not been very favourably struck with their first sight of Nazareth. Compared with some villages in Galilee it certainly has a rather modern unromantic look. The buildings, mostly white, being built of the neighbouring limestone, include some large schools and similar structures which appear more useful than handsome. A little British church lifts its modest square tower among the clustered flat roofs; a single minaret imparts but little of the oriental to the view. Green slopes on the hills around, and along the principal ridge, "the hill on which the city is built;" fringes, and groups of grey-green olives here and there; occasional gardens among the upper houses—all help to relieve the picture. But, with but slight allowances, one could almost take this for a hill-side township in Yorkshire. Yesterday, I noticed a little mill-chimney, and a modest but business-like jet of steam!

The people, like the place, have an air of the West about them, at least in their general cleanliness, attention to work, and absence of picturesque beggary. The oriental dress is there, modified (one thinks) by much contact with missionary teachers, into neat sobriety. The narrow streets are the cleanest in Palestine, so far as I can speak. Even Bethlehem, which, by its evident thrift and industry made a gratifying impression upon us, is not so "tidy" as Nazareth; but then it is better placed for a view, and the abundant plantations on the gentle slopes around it make the southern "birth-place" much more attractive to the spectator. Nazareth's great view is from the hill above, three or four hundred feet higher than its main thoroughfare. The town pushes sideways up the slope of the hill—perhaps a third of a mile covers the breadth of the place. It is said to have over ten thousand inhabitants.

Minutes were precious, and I must needs finish my mental picture, if I would revisit old scenes once more, and find out one or two still remaining to be discovered. I turned north-east, following, on my higher ground, the trend of the valley and the town, which was still on my left. Presently I was among fields in a little valley where tracks come in, from the plain of Jezreel to the south, from Endor to the south-east. Beyond were olive-groves, and a hill stretching southward a mile or so, to a steep bluff which an absurd tradition has identified as the rock of intended "Precipitation." I turned in among the houses.

Already the townsfolk were astir. Long strings of laden camels—I counted over forty in one train—strode westward. Services were going on at several of the churches. Mourners in sombre dress were returning from the ancient burial-ground behind the (Latin) Church of the Annunciation. I entered as early mass was being celebrated. The principal structure is dignified, almost beautiful with pictures and coloured marbles. A few women were at worship. Beneath the high-altar is a flight of steps leading to the crypt, where is the "place of Mary's meeting with the Angel Gabriel." The house where Jesus lived with his parents is not here, having been borne away (to Dalmatia, afterwards to Italy) by angels some six hundred years ago—so, at least, I am told, and I did not go down to see. Nor did I visit Joseph's workshop, there being literally no reason for doing so. Piloted by a group of boys, whose English was voluble, if not extensive, I did visit the Synagogue. The present little building is evidently old, though, of course, far later than the time of Jesus. Whether it really stands on the site of the veritable synagogue, where he astonished his town's-fellows by his boldness and words of grace, who can tell? Hereabout, I should say, it must have been. It is near the centre of things, the market is close by; and if in ancient times the town was generally speaking higher up the hill-side, and rather more to the west, the range, after all, is not great. Westward and higher up is a scarp of white rock overgrown on the brow with grasses, and with bushes at its base, which intelligent travellers have supposed to be most likely the "rock of precipitation." It is situated behind the Maronite monastery. The kindly curé spared no pains to let me see and know all about it, when I visited the place the day before. He stood obligingly once, twice, as I took photographs of the cliff, and only asked that a copy might be sent him. (Alas, it may not be! At Jeida—name evermore bitterly remembered—some accident occurred to my camera; a batch of precious films fell out into the open, and my beautiful pictures, like Milton's eyes, were blinded with excess of light.) Hard by is a block of chalky limestone which men say is the table on which Christ dined with the disciples after his resurrection. I did not visit it, and though in company with my companions, I did visit the Greek "Chapel of the Annunciation" (for there are at least two claims respecting this, as in other cases) it was enough to know that the one authentic spring of the town, whose copious waters still supply "St. Mary's Well," is enclosed in the walls; and, for the rest, to wonder, a little mournfully, that the bishop whom we saw—a fine-looking, grave person—had so pitiful a ceremonial to share in, and so poorly, not to say tawdri-ly, decorated a sanctuary.

Astonishment, also, filled our minds, on the first day we saw Nazareth, to find that among the pilgrims were a troop of sturdy Russians, who at the moment we approached, were mounting the broad steps leading to their church, striding upward to a sort of chant, with swords drawn and uplifted. A leader, perhaps a priest, from time to time spoke a few words, being answered in loud responses by the crowd as they followed. The excitement seemed to grow as they got to the threshold of the holy place, and not only shouts of triumph, but guns fired irregularly testified to their emotion. What it would be when they got to Jerusalem for Easter, one can only guess. A very different scene, two days later, was the pitching of a camp of ten or twelve tents, for a large party of American tourists en route for Tiberias and Damascus. It was close to the Well, and there were the girls and women, filling their water pots and bearing them away on their heads, dignified and even stately of gait, the evening sunshine lighting up the scene.

I shall sooner forget all these things, however, than the sight from the top of the hill. We got there on Saturday afternoon, after a joyous and comparatively easy return from Tiberias by the road we had lately travelled with so much difficulty. Other travellers had shirked that return, preferring to take boat down the lake, and then take train for Haifa across the south side of the plain of Jezreel. One bold pedestrian, a young clergyman, notwithstanding an unpleasant experience with Bedouins, who demanded bakshish from him under the shadow of the summit of Hattin (the "Mount of Beatitudes"), risked a long tramp round by Tabor, and did it successfully, coming into Nazareth that evening well-tired with his thirty miles or so. For us, it was good to be coming again over the fields which Jesus must have often walked between Capernaum and Cana, between Cana and Nazareth. These were the hills he saw, these the rivulets of which he drank. Here were the flowers he loved—cyclamens, irises, lupines, daisies; this is assuredly the summit he often climbed, to see the great landscape with the eyes of opening youth, to meditate with the mind of man.

As one stands up there, sixteen-hundred feet above the level of the Mediterranean, that shows blue in two long stretches twenty miles away to the west, the hills of Galilee in complex grouping filling in the picture to the north, white-topped Hermon peeping over them from the north-east, Tabor showing slightly, and "little Hermon" more fully to the east, and blue hills of Moab far to the south-east, there lies in front the great green plain with all the panorama of hills at its back from Gilboa to Carmel again. Who can doubt that this picture was familiar to him? This, I take it, was his playground when, as a boy, he left the village behind and clambered up the bare, smooth and rather slippery cliffs, till the grass and bushy tufts were reached, and he could run about with his fellows, the little Judes, and Simons and Jacobs of his native town, their shouts of glee ringing in the fresh clear air. Here all the patriot in his breast must have stirred as, from the hearing or reading of ancient story in the synagogue down there in the village, he came up to view the scene of battle-field and struggle, and lifted his eyes from the plain to the hills beyond, where lay the road to the city of the great King. If there was the making of a prophet in any young Nazarene, here surely—with Carmel all in sight, and many another storied spot—was his altar of consecration. We plucked our memorial blossoms from that sacred field, and have brought them down with us, down into the levels of our own lowly daily life.

Before the sun set on that Palm Sunday we had left Nazareth far behind. The birds sang brightly about us, as creatures that knew no thought of farewell. In the glowing afternoon we reached the top of the bold promontory of Carmel, and mounted to the roof of the French monastery there. It is a modern building, and, but for a staggering inscription over a cave "where Elijah dwelt," it should please the most exacting. There is evidence not only of wisdom, but of wit in the quotations from Scripture and the Fathers inscribed over the doors of the cells and other apartments; the chapel is noble, and the library has its supplement in an extensive collection of shells, fossils and other objects of natural history. Upon the roof, among the white pigeons, the worthy monk who attended us pointed out this and that in the vast spectacle around us. Below us a great white wall encompassed a wide area of the mount; it had been recently built, at much cost, he said, to prevent further encroachment by the Germans, who, indeed, appear to be a pushing people in various parts of Palestine. We looked south along the back of Carmel over a fertile valley between the mountain and the shore. Along the shore itself we made out Athlit, with its massive crusaders' ruin; Dor (of old, now Tantura—a dirty spot); and perhaps Cæsarea. To us three travellers Cæsarea was well-known; the story of our acquaintance with it is too long for a parenthesis—we shall keep it for long winter's nights. The "Great Sea" shone blue and wide, and the eye glanced round with glad satisfaction at its beauty and fulness. But what is that coming from the north, past the shores of Sidon and of Tyre—nay, steering in across the bay of Acre? That black spot, with its attendant cloud, is the steamer that to-night will take us away. Still, there is time to drink in a great draught of that marvellous beauty—the deep green-blue of the bay, hemmed in by a bright band of shore circling many a mile; the distant roofs of Acre, the near and cheerful town of Haifa, red and white, many-palmed, prosperous-looking. Away, away, more than fifty miles, shines Mount Hermon once again—we had twice bidden him good-bye, not knowing how far he glances; but this is his final greeting to us. We stand watching the sun and shadow on the many hills of Galilee. "Yonder," says our friend the monk, "is the Hill of Nazareth." With keen look we follow, and among the heights to the east we seem to see one a little above the rest.

It was our last glimpse. We went down into the monastery again, lingering awhile in the warm glow on the hill-top, discoursing of Elijah and many other things; and so turned home, down the long slope of the bushy blossomy hill-side, down to the vineyards and gardens. The sun set; the wind roughened the water of the harbour somewhat, and for a lively quarter-of-an-hour we tossed before we reached the steamer. On the morrow we lay restfully off Jaffa, and the next night brought us over a billowy sea to Port Said in time for the morning train to Cairo.

THE BETHSAIDA QUESTION.

SIR,—Mr. Tarrant's two articles on his Galilee expedition are excellent, and increase my regret that one so well equipped with previous knowledge should not have been able to devote a longer time to personal observation of Scripture localities. There is much, however, to be said on the Capernaum and Bethsaida questions in opposition to the views expressed in his article in your issue of May 5. On the former I may, perhaps, be permitted to send you a line on a future occasion; for the present I confine myself to the latter.

The Bethsaida question is not, I think, so easily disposed of as Mr. Tarrant supposes. Thomson, in "The Land and the Book" (ed. 1866, p. 360) says that in 1855 he heard the Bedawin in the Butaiha apply the name Bethsaida to the place generally known as el-Mesadiyeh. Now, I quite agree with Mr. Tarrant that the good doctor's ear may have "been deceived by a rapid utterance of the real name of the place"; but this does not fully dispose of the matter. It has to be remembered that this deceptive similarity of names is really due to the fact that Bethsaida and Mesadiyeh contain the same Semitic root, both having reference to fishing or hunting. Mr. Tarrant goes on to say that "the site appears impossible for any town of the importance of the ancient Bethsaida." But here I think he misapprehends the question. No one now imagines that el-Mesadiyeh is the site of the town Bethsaida. The only town of the name was Bethsaida-Julias, which is by general consent located at et-Tell, a mound covered with ruins nearly two miles to the N.W. of Mesadiyeh. But Josephus says that Bethsaida-Julias was surrounded by fourteen villages, and the theory is that the Bethsaida of Andrew and Peter was one of these villages. Bethsaida-Julias was some way inland, but the fishermen's village must have been on the coast; the relation between the town and the village being something like that between Hastings and the fishing suburb of Old Hastings, as I knew it in my boyhood; or, between the inland town of Bridport and its harbour, which is on the coast nearly two miles away.

I confess to being disappointed to learn that Mr. Tarrant found no signs of "old walls or loose stones, or even of mounds, anywhere on the flat expanse around." I believe it was at my own suggestion that he sought for these; for, at the time when I myself visited the place, I hardly realised the importance of the site, and did not take such careful notes as I should otherwise have done. But I have before me, as I write, an enlargement from a photograph which I then took, and I find it difficult to believe the further statement, that the Bedawin huts themselves contain no worked stones, unless by "worked" Mr. Tarrant means something more elaborate than I should myself mean by the term. It is seldom that either Bedawin or Felahin use stone at all except in the neighbourhood of ancient ruins. For the most part their huts and storehouses are of mud, for they will not take the trouble to quarry and trim the stone, but when they settle near the old ruins, they will form walls of the ready-made building-stones, and cover them with roofs of brushwood plastered with mud. Such stones always have worn and rounded edges, yet they are sufficiently of a size and sufficiently shaped to be usable for building purposes.

Another important point, in which my photograph agrees with my note-book, is that Mesadiyeh is built upon a bank well above the surface of the lake. It is true, as Mr. Tarrant says, that the village "stands on the outer edge of a wide, marshy flat"; it may even be true that "in rainy seasons the huts can hardly escape flooding"; but this would be less true of Mesadiyeh than of any other village in the Plain of Butaiha, so that Mesadiyeh still has the preference over any other suggested site, such, for instance, as el-Arāj; and it is an important fact that it is safe at any rate from flooding by any rise in the lake. Its situation on this high shore struck me, indeed, at the time of my visit, as being much in favour of its being a permanent settlement. I should have guessed that the spot had been selected expressly as being less liable than others to that flooding from which the whole plain of Butaiha more or less suffers.

One fact much in favour of el-Mesadiyeh being the Gospel Bethsaida is that it has a natural harbour. With the exception of el-Arāj, it is the only place at the north end of the lake which has a harbour of any sort. But here the stream which flows down the Wady es-Saffāh empties itself into a broad estuary known as Wady el-Mesadiyeh, which could accommodate a whole fleet of fishing-boats.

On the whole, I may say, that if the view is correct that the Græco-Roman Julius was connected with a Jewish fishing-village called Bethsaida, then Mesadiyeh has the best claim to be the Bethsaida of the Gospels. But there is an alternative hypothesis which I have never seen advanced, and which yet appears to me worthy of consideration. Bethsaida-Julias had fourteen dependent villages, and it is noticeable that at the present day there is in this same district a second Mesadiyeh. It is inland on the West of the Jordan. Is it not possible, then, that Bethsaida was a district consisting of Julius (et-Tell) and the surrounding villages, and that the two places still bearing the name Mesadiyeh are survivors of those fourteen ancient dependents? If this is the truth of the matter, it is perhaps vain to fix upon any one village in the district as that which was visited by Jesus.

DR. MARTINEAU'S VIEW OF MATTER

SIR,—Mr. Solly asks, "What is the evidence for ascribing to Dr. Martineau the view of matter which I ascribe to him in my paper at the Oxford Conference? I find," he says, "that Dr. Martineau argues very much on the lines that Dr. Rashdall himself does, against a causality partly in God and partly in matter." This was not exactly the view which I imputed to Dr. Martineau. I contended that if

(as Dr. Martineau holds) there is no causality except in will, matter, considered as something existing apart from mind, must be regarded as an inert thing, essentially distinguishable from and not necessarily endowed with force or energy. It is this conception which seems to me difficult to reconcile with the modern physical speculations about the nature of matter. So far does Dr. Martineau carry this abstraction of matter in itself from its active properties, from the power of doing anything, that he appears not disinclined to accept the old Greek view of a matter which not only exists independently of the Divine or any other thought, but is not, even in the first instance, created by the Divine will. Here is the passage:—

"If anyone objects to the idea of self-set problems as applied to the Divine mind, he is not obliged by our argument, though he is permitted, to regard matter as created out of nothing. He may let it remain, if he pleases, in some form like the Platonic, ἀνάγκη, as an original datum, under the conditions of which the Supreme intellect works out its designs. Some objective conditions, viz., those of space and time everyone but the pure idealist must admit as present; and that these carry with them also some elementary ἔλνη, though involving difficulties of another kind, at least has the advantage of exhibiting the problem of the world as not gratuitously made but really found." ("Study of Religion, Vol. I., 1888, pp. 330 and 331; second edition, pp. 310 and 311). The whole question is not, as it seems to me, one of "evidence" as to what Dr. Martineau explicitly held, as what are the logical implications of his view. It is very probable that Dr. Martineau would have repudiated my inferences, but I do not think I have misrepresented him.

IS THERE ONLY "ONE THING NEEDFUL"?

WE are indebted to the Editor of the Hibbert Journal for an observation which is suggestive and valuable in a high degree. He has more than once drawn attention to the importance of comparing two things which are often supposed to be utterly unconnected; these are, progress in religious doctrine and progress in morality (morality being taken to mean both action and the understanding of why we so act). In a sense there has been a "crisis" in theology, which is now being overcome; but we are face to face with a similar "crisis" in morality which we have not begun to overcome. We may think the use of the word "crisis" rests on exaggeration; and, perhaps, it does, if we understand it to refer to morality in general without any special reference to Christian teaching. But if we understand it to refer to Christian morality, it must be admitted that the use of the word "crisis" is justified.

In my opinion the comparison made by Mr. Jacks is very valuable, because it suggests that the same difficulties beset the attempt to deal with the needs of Christian doctrine and the needs of Christian morality; that similar mistakes are found in the two cases; and that the means by which the one "crisis" has been overcome may have something to teach us as to the means by which we may overcome the other also. As far as I know, the question has never been considered in any detail, from the point of view which Mr. Jack's important observation suggests.

Granting that we are overcoming the doctrinal "crisis," let us ask, how is it being accomplished? Perhaps the best way to get at an answer in brief is to ask, how has it not been accomplished?

First, clearly it has not been accomplished by textual theology. Textual theology professes to found a system of Christian doctrine on texts from the New Testament. What it really does is almost invariably to read certain ideas into the texts in order to get them out again. What it never does is to inquire into anything like a growth in the New Testament writings, or into the possibility of various lines of thought being found there, and the historical relation of these to one another. There is no idea of the comparative value (for doctrinal purposes) of texts from the Gospels, from Peter, Paul, James or John. The defect of the whole method may be summed up in one word—it is utterly unhistorical. Some of the doctrines read into the words of the New Testament were never dreamt of until two or three centuries after the New Testament writers lived. We only begin to understand the actual circumstances of the time in which they wrote, and for which they wrote.

It must be admitted that textual Unitarianism is equally unhistorical. It has its uses as a partial antidote to textual orthodoxy; but we can no longer put forward, as serious contributions to religious thought, pamphlets on such subjects as "The Apostle Paul a Unitarian," "The Apostle Peter a Unitarian," &c. (published by the American Unitarian Association about fifty years ago).

Our next step is into much more controversial ground. One of the most popular religious theories of the day is expressed in the catchword, "Back to Jesus." Sometimes, this is exactly what is needed; but that is not the point. Taken as a principle, it will not provide the reconstruction of doctrine; it rests on a basis as arbitrary and unhistorical as the last. It consists in a like process of selection, in which particular facts and ideas are taken and accounted the essential and real things, and all the other facts and ideas rejected as corruptions. And even within the limits of the "essential" things—the life and words of Jesus—the same process of arbitrary selection takes place; certain acts and sayings (as the Beatitudes in Matthew v.) are chosen and attributed to "the real Jesus," for no reason other than the impression they make on the reader; and certain other acts and sayings (as in John x., 8) are attributed to the mistaken imaginations of his followers. Sometimes we may have no choice but to fall back on this kind of religious "impressionism"; but, obviously, it will not avail as a reliable reconstruction of Christian belief.

Whatever reliable reconstruction of belief has really been accomplished, is due—apart from the influences of science and philosophy—to a historical understanding of the events out of which the beliefs sprung. We are familiar with this idea as regards the Old Testament. We know how clear the growth of Israel's religion becomes when we understand the relation of the early law and religion to the prophets and the relation of the prophets and the exilic crisis to the later law and the Psalms. All this is nothing but historical understanding—that is, understanding not simply that such and such things were done and said, but of the reasons why they were done and said. And the New Testament is now being read in a similar light. The truth is, we understand Christian doctrine just so far, and only so far, as we understand the religious history of (at least) the first three centuries. I do not say that we cannot believe without this historic sense and insight; I say that without it we cannot understand.

Now what is the state of affairs regarding our insight into the meaning of Christian morality? Let any one ask What is the standard of Christian ethics, or where is it to be found? The Protestant answer is, of course, "In the New Testament." But this, taken by itself, is almost no answer; can any divergent tendencies in moral doctrine be discerned in the New Testament? For instance, is the application of Christian principles to practical life, in the Epistles to Timothy, exactly what the Sermon on the Mount would lead us to expect? If divergent tendencies are admitted, the usual answer would be that we must fall back on the Sermon on the Mount as fundamental. In fact, as regards the ethical teaching of Christianity we are in the position of the merely textual theology already spoken of; and our position is equally unhistorical, equally arbitrary. I ask the reader to consider whether the difficulties pointed out by Mr. Jacks in his address at the last Triennial Conference, and in the Hibbert Journal (January, 1904, p. 255), do not mainly arise from this point of view. At any rate, from this point of view they cannot be answered. We choose out of the New Testament what suits us or suits our ideals, and call it "Christian Ethics"; what is to be made of the remainder? It is just as "Christian" as any other part of the teaching—simply because it is there in the book. Textual morality cannot avoid this conclusion, and the result is disastrous and humiliating. And no general observation about "the letter and the spirit" can make it otherwise.

The following extract is from a London newspaper of about three months ago:—"In —, remarkable reports were recently circulated of the unexampled generosity of a certain gentleman towards the poor. The immediate result was that hundreds of people in need of money went to his house. Not one of them was sent empty away, provided a sufficiently telling story of distress was told. Several hundreds of pounds were thus distributed. . . . Considering the literal interpretation of the command, 'Sell all that thou hast and give it to the poor' to be the act of a madman, the authorities removed the keeper of the open house to the local asylum. . . . Some time ago he was left several hundred pounds by his mother; he has now only twenty pounds in his possession. . . . He has not yet been allowed to return home, and will in future be made a small weekly allowance by the poor-law authorities." Of course, we agree with the authorities; and we explain the commandment—away.

Assuming—what is always taken for granted—that Christian morality is textual morality, there are several possible attitudes found in the modern world. One section of Christendom formally accepts the commandments as divine teachings, and in practice disregards them altogether, and is guided altogether by the average conventional morality of its country and class. Another section (by no means extinct) tries to revive the monastic ideal, which regards the world, and all natural ties and bonds, instincts and desires, as a source of evil; Christian duty is to sever oneself from it all. But there are many earnest souls who, when they confront the modern world, see with deep dismay the radical evils that civilisation suffers from, and yet still retain enough faith in human nature to believe that man can remedy these evils without cutting away the roots of his own life; to them, the "one thing needful" (and they always find only one!) is attainable if men will listen to Jesus. Their view of the "one thing" will depend on their individual experiences; but what almost always happens is, that they read this ideal of theirs into the Gospel teaching, and insist that it alone is the essence of that teaching. A striking example I find in an earnest and thoughtful letter by the late Miss Frances Lee, which appeared some time ago in the INQUIRER. To her the one thing that the world needed was to be purified of its selfishness; self-renunciation was her ideal. And it seems to me clear that this was the only reason why she took "self-renunciation" to be the heart and soul of the message of Jesus. True, Jesus speaks of "self-denial"; but does he speak of nothing else? And above all, is it not clear that, if we keep to certain famous texts, he carries self-denial to the extreme of self-extinction, of unlimited submission, of giving away, until nothing but life itself is left to give? If "self-renunciation" is understood as a practical antidote to modern individualism and modern selfishness, it is beyond question a great good, but we have no right to say, "This is the whole meaning of Christian morality." With all due respect to the moral enthusiasm which prompted this contention, we must still ask if self-renunciation is the one thing needful, what are we to renounce, and when and why? The answer of the texts is clear: renounce everything, renounce always. It cannot be denied that there are passages in the gospels which enjoin unlimited almsgiving and non-resistance to violence, and which forbid prudence, forethought, and the possession of any material goods. My contention is that it is impossible to understand the significance of these precepts, or of any others in the New Testament, until we go behind texts to history.

The particular passages which lay down the duties of unlimited renunciation have, as I believe, a special significance of their own, apart from any light that history can throw upon them; but as this interpretation would be widely disputed, I do not introduce it into the main line of argument in these notes on Christian ethics. There are divergent lines of thought in the moral teaching of the Gospels; and one of these lines (not the most prominent one, but one which is really present) leads to Oriental nihilism. This nihilism teaches that all material (visible and tangible) existence is an illusion; and that all effort and activity, of every kind, is evil because it is an endeavour to dissipate our true life by mingling it with this illusion. Schopenhauer learnt this principle from the study of Eastern thinkers, and made it the foundation of his pessimism. Tolstoy learnt it partly from the Gospels, partly from Schopenhauer. The people who quote edifying passages from Tolstoy do not always realise what a two-edged sword they have got in their hands.

THE BRITISH CONSTITUTIONAL ASSOCIATION.*

THE larger part of this little book is occupied by four lectures delivered by Dr. C. W. Saleeby "during the General Election." But the volume is a composite one. We have first an introduction by Sir Arthur Clay and Mr. M. H. Judge. Then there is an appendix containing remarks by the gentlemen who took the chair at the successive lectures, and, lastly, comes the prospectus of the British Constitutional Association itself, under the auspices of which the lectures were given. Since the book is intended to serve as an invitation to membership in the Association, it may be of interest to cite the sentence in which its object is set forth:—"The Association was constituted November 18, 1895, to conserve the fundamental principle of the Constitution—personal liberty and responsibility—and limit the function of governing bodies accordingly." The aims of the Association are apparently to be furthered by the delivery and publication of further courses of lectures, for the present volume is entitled, "Constitutional Issues, Number One."²

Dr. Saleeby's authority as a biologist is known from the numerous works which have recently issued from his pen; and it can, therefore, be no surprise to find that the author's discussion of the child, the parent, the family, and the individual, is professedly carried out from the point of view of the biologist. In common with other neo-Darwinians, Dr. Saleeby attributes almost exclusive importance to the principle of natural selection; and natural selection seems to be identified with the process of individual struggle for survival. We have nothing to say at present as regards the adequacy of this conception for biology, or reference might be made to the evidence adduced by Kropotkin and others of the importance of Mutual Aid, even in the evolution of animal societies. There is, however, a strong temptation to transfer these biologic conceptions into a sphere in which they can apply only with grave modifications. In a word, the problem of human society is sociological, and the chief defect of Dr. Saleeby's work is in a failure to recognise this. The child or the family, as "seen by the biologist" is not the actual family or child.

Biology is an excellent preparation, but it is only a preparation for the study of humanity.

Dr. Saleeby hardly seems happy in his sources for his study of collectivism, or he would scarcely have drawn his distinction between it and individualism just where he does draw it. Collectivists and individualists are agreed, we learn, in seeking the greatest happiness, "and individual worth we individualists must add." Probably all collectivists who happen to read this book will find points of disagreement from the author. They will certainly dissent from this conclusion. Individual worth is valued by them as much as by Dr. Saleeby himself. The point at issue between the two schools of thought does not concern the value of character. The dispute is real and keen, but it deals entirely with the principles and policy by which the ideal is to be attained. The individualistic argument is stated in its extreme form in Dr. Saleeby's lectures.

EDUCATION, SECULAR OR RELIGIOUS.

THE large vote given in favour of secular education at the National Conference of our Free Churches at Oxford calls for careful consideration. We must all agree that it does not imply any carelessness about the importance of religion. We all wish that children should be impressed by one means or another with a belief in God. Neither does it imply with most of those voting for secular education a positive ideal which they welcome with gladness. I venture to think that most supporters of secular education in elementary schools are driven reluctantly into this position for two reasons.

First, the practical reason that they despair of any amicable and permanent solution on any other lines. Second, the theoretical reason that they think it impossible to teach any kind of satisfactory religion except in definite denominational form.

The first reason is simply a counsel of despair. It is surely a strange one to accept for any who, like ourselves, desire to be true to an ideal whatever the difficulties involved. Believers in human nature and in the triumph of truth, and in the practicability of the highest good, ought to be very slow to accept a solution as inevitable which is a concession to the weakness of human nature, and which they do not regard as the best. Those who attacked Mr. Bowie's resolution had much to say about the danger of "tactics" and the desirability of speaking out. Surely it is "tactics" in a supreme degree by which men are influenced who support secular education because, in their opinion, it is the only practical course, and not because it is the highest and most complete and best form of education they can conceive. I do not see how it is possible to maintain that a national education is most complete and most desirable which excludes all use of the greatest collection of religious books in the world from our schools, and which forbids the teachers to make any reference to God. It may become a hateful necessity: it may be wise tactics. But men who believe in the ideal will be very slow to admit the necessity of something which is a maimed and most imperfect realisation of what they feel to be the best and highest form of teaching.

If it is unfitting that believers in and lovers of the ideal should yield to the first reason, it is equally unfitting that members of a Free Catholic Church should yield to the second. Our Anglican and Roman Catholic brethren tell us continually that no religious teaching is possible apart from denominationalism. They tell us, to our amazement, that the reading of the Bible and acquaintance with the life of Jesus is dangerous to their religion, and tends to undermine it, even though the teachers, as is certainly the case in the great majority of instances, are orthodox Christians. To accept that argument is to range ourselves with them as extreme denominationalists, and to assert with them that not even the most elementary religion can be taught except on denominational lines. If this is what we believe, we should aim at a division of school children, from their earliest years, into Roman Catholics, Anglicans, Wesleyans, Baptists, Unitarians, and so forth. But most of us, I should suppose, believe in the possibility of impressing children with a sense of God's love and His claim on them, and with a reverence for Christ and for his teachings, which are truths common to all creeds, and a preparation for them all. It is not in the interest of any form of thought or any sect that we want such truths impressed. A child who has been taught to know something of God, and who has been impressed by the Gospel story, is thereby prepared to become a better Unitarian, a better Roman Catholic, or Anglican, or Baptist, than he would have been if he was left by his school quite ignorant of God and of the Bible. It is for the separate churches to build on the foundation laid by the day schools. That foundation is a sense of the divine, and some knowledge of the simpler portions of those books in which the divine life and love have been most powerfully expressed and realised. We may not be able to convince our Roman Catholic and Anglican friends that such teaching is desirable. Of course, they much prefer the present system by which all expenses are paid by the State, and they are allowed to manage the schools, and teach their own denominational religion, and appoint teachers who all belong to their own sect. But the nation has decided by an overwhelming majority that this state of things is not to continue. If they like to pay for their own schools they can manage their own schools; but if the State and locality pay for them, the State and the locality must manage them, and the teaching posts must be open to all. There are very many who believe that it is still possible for the fundamental truths of religion to be taught in such schools, and that it is good both for the teachers and children that they should be taught. We cherish this belief, not as a counsel of despair, or in the interests of any sect, but because we believe that religion is not identical with denominationalism. That, rather than any creed, is one of the main principles of a Free Catholic Church. Those who believe that religion is inseparably bound up with creeds, if they like the union, demand freedom to teach their own creed at the expense of the ratepayers, and if they dislike it, they demand secular education. There is a third party, not apparently in a majority even amongst Free Christians, who deny the truth of the denominational theory, and who desire that all teachers should be allowed to speak of God, and to teach the Bible, not in the interests of any Church, or of any creed, but in the interests of the children and the truth. OBITUARY.

MRS. T. W. GREEN.

THE Dudley congregation has suffered a severe loss by the death, on April 29, of Mrs. T. W. Green (nee Sarah Anne Elsom), formerly of the Church of Our Father, Rotherham. Mrs. Green had been eight years in Dudley, where, as mistress in the Parsons' School, attached to the Old Meeting House, she had exerted a powerful and beneficent influence, winning the respect of her pupils and endearing herself to them as one of the most conscientious of teachers and faithful of friends. In the Old Meeting House she was one of the hardest and most valued of workers. There were no movements among the congregation but what she was an earnest participant in them. Her zeal, her good sense, her splendid organising ability, constituted her again and again the stalwart worker on whom others readily leant, and to whom they naturally looked up as to a leader. On Sunday last the Rev. Alfred Thompson, minister of the church, delivered a memorial sermon. The building was crowded with her old scholars and their parents. The preacher passed in review some of her many excellent qualities. First, there was her fearlessness, her immense native courage, which tempted her again and again to undertake tasks for which she had all the aptitude but not always all the physical strength. This remarkable fearlessness served as the basis on which many other noble qualities uprose. Then there was her self-reliance. She leant not on broken reeds, but on the sufficient supports of her own soul, which she knew to be God's provision for the working of His will in her. She had a great belief in the dignity of her profession as a teacher, of which she was indeed an ornament. Out of school hours she carried to many a dark or poor home the light of her sympathy and the wealth of her love. Out of modest means she gave with a rare generosity and a studious concealment. In the pleasures of the young she took a real delight, and gave up many hours to instruct and help them to make the best and happiest use of all their powers. Then she had a virile mind. She had pondered on the problems of life, and had worked out her own conclusions. In theology she faced her doubts, and, when her reading of the evidence forced her to a verdict different from what she would have wished, she never flinched from the truth, never turned away her face, saying, "I will not see it," but braced her soul to accept the shadow as well as the light. Consequently, having won her own positions, as a warrior a footing from the enemy, she stood to them, knew their cost and their worth, and, better than most of us, could give reasons for the hopes that were or were not within her. She possessed a certain Spartan austerity, which told of a soul of exceptional strength and power. Duty had an imperious voice for her. Though reticent about her inward experience, her industry, her enthusiasm, her self-sacrifice, her devotion to social and religious work told plainly enough that the fear of God was ever before her eyes, that to do the will of God was her life-prayer. Members of the Old Meeting House will look round bewildered for that strong, strenuous, saintly soul, and will long miss her sorely. The loss in its prime of a life so noble is hard to be borne, yet the recollection of its purity and usefulness is a corrective of gloom, and should be an inspiration to effort.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

IN the set of Shakespeare's English historical plays given at Stratford-on-Avon last week, there was shown the story of English history for nearly a hundred years. It is the story of the reigns of seven different kings, from Richard II. to Richard III.: And Shakespeare tells this not as seven stories of seven kings, but as one story.

Some new people come upon the stage in one play after another, but there is no real beginning again. Richard II. dies in prison. He has left the stage, but his deeds live on, and the effects of what he has left undone. Henry Bolingbroke may begin his reign as Henry IV., but his deeds as Bolingbroke still live on. Neither he nor his people can forget that after claiming his rights as Duke of Lancaster, he went on to claim the crown. Nor could it be forgotten that he had a share in Richard's death. Richard's friends stirred up discontent and rebellion. Those who had been Bolingbroke's supporters were discontented that they had not had larger rewards in lands or titles or honour for helping him to win the crown. Discontent grew to rebellion and war, and in spite of all Henry's efforts to restore order in the neglected garden of England, there was yet no lasting order, no real peace.

Henry IV. dies weary and disappointed, and full of remorse, and hopes that his son may make a fresh beginning, and bring happier days to England.

Young King Henry V. wins fame for himself and for England, but no lasting peace for his country.

The play of Henry V. ends indeed with a treaty and a royal marriage. But that is not the end of the story. Henry V. died, but the war with France that he had begun was not yet over. The fighting went on. There was quarrelling amongst the English themselves, first in France and then in England. Quarrelling grew to fighting, and so it went on—quarrelling and fighting, and fighting and more quarrelling, all through the long reign of Henry VI.

Bolingbroke had shown that it was possible to put aside one king and set up another, and others tried to follow his example.

Perhaps what we notice most in Shakespeare's way of telling these old stories is the pity, the harmfulness, the waste of it. It is such a pity, such a waste to quarrel and work against one another, when we can do so much better by working together, each for all, instead of each for himself only.

Do you know the old fable about the bundle of twigs? Whilst they were all bound together they were strong, and could not be broken, for though each twig alone has little strength and does not count for much, yet when they are bound together, the little strength of each helping the strength of the others, the bundle of twigs is strong indeed.

But as soon as the bundle is separated one from another, they can be broken—one at a time.

This fable shows the strength of union the weakness of disunion, division, and Shakespeare in his historical plays shows this strength and this weakness in our life as one nation.

England torn to pieces by quarrelling of any sort or by civil war is as weak as the unbound twigs.

At first King Henry VI. is too young to rule, and the nobles quarrel as to who shall rule for him. Then later the King is too weak to keep order and the quarrelling grows to civil war—the war of the Roses. In all these historical plays people scold one another and quarrel, and get angry. They play tit for tat, and often in their quarrelling they hurt one another, and they also hurt those who have done them no harm. They try to get what they want for themselves, not caring for other people, and so they do harm to England.

People trying to get what they want for themselves only, are like the twigs divided. People bound together by something greater than self, united by their thought for others, by their love of England, are like the bundle of twigs.

It is worth notice that of the seven plays acted last week the only one showing the English nation as united, as working together with one thought, one aim, one purpose, is Henry V. And in this play the one thought is not peace but war, the one purpose is the conquest of France.

Does this mean that Shakespeare thought the English so quarrelsome that they could only cease from quarrelling with one another when they united to quarrel with another nation?

Is that Shakespeare's patriotism? Is foreign war to be the bond that unites our national bundle of twigs?

The father of Henry V. thought so, and so has thought many a statesman since.

But not so Shakespeare.

In Shakespeare's plays, given as a set, we see Henry V. in its place in the whole story. We see how short lived was the union gained by the English in their war with France.

If they won fame and victory it was because the French were so disunited, and cared more for fame and plunder than for France. As soon as the French united under Joan of Arc they won back what they had lost, and then the English in their turn, caring more for fame and plunder than for England, not only lost their conquests in France, but honour too.

Shakespeare would have the English nation united in love of England, he would have us patriotic by working together peacefully for the public good.

A CALL TO SERVICE.

WE ask the attention of our readers to the report of the London Domestic Mission annual meeting, which follows this brief note, and especially to that passage of Mr. CARPENTER's address in which he appeals to those who have as yet taken no part in any of our Domestic Mission work to go down and see what is being done there, and how manifold are the opportunities of helpful service for all people of good will. It cannot be too strongly emphasised that in such work is the best training for those who would fit themselves for the great service of social reform. It must bring them into close personal touch with the most pathetic needs, and with the actual human elements of the problem, which must be fully realised by those who would work to good purpose, and avoid the failure of a mere doctrinaire critic of society.

From the report of the Committee we add here a further appeal:—

"The Committee recognise gratefully the devoted and faithful labours of the voluntary workers now connected with our Missions. Many of them give up time and energy which they can ill spare, and sacrifice the rest which they often need. But more teachers and helpers and visitors in every department are required. At Bell-street on Sunday afternoon there is only an average of nine teachers for 160 children. This must mean some ineffectiveness in the teaching, and a great strain upon the teachers. In years gone by many young people in our educated families felt the claims of this work, and were prepared to make some sacrifice in responding to the call. The claims of Domestic Mission work are no less strong to-day; the needs are no less great. The Committee, in closing their report, make an urgent appeal to young people who have had the opportunities of education and culture to make some little sacrifice of time and leisure, and to take a part in Domestic Mission work as Sunday-school teachers or visitors. They believe that nowhere is a more important field of usefulness offered, and that nowhere can higher influence for good be exerted."

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION. ANNUAL MEETING.

THE seventy-first annual meeting of the London Domestic Mission Society was held at the East Hill Church, Wandsworth, on Tuesday evening. There was a very good attendance of members and friends, including, in addition to those who spoke at the meeting, Mr. P. M. Martineau, chairman of the Committee, Mr. and Mrs. J. F. Schwann, Mr. John Harrison, Mr. H. Epps, the Revs. T. E. M. Edwards and F. Allen, and a good muster of the Wandsworth congregation.

Mr. H. B. LAWFORD was in the chair, and in opening the proceedings, called upon the Treasurer to present his statement of accounts.

Mr. PHILIP ROSCOE presented the accounts, which were printed and circulated beforehand with the reports, and called attention to his statement as to the financial position, embodied in the report of the Committee, as follows:—

"The treasurer laments the necessity which, during the past year, compelled the Society to sell £675 of its consols and realise £602 9s. 10d. capital money thereby to meet its current expenditure. With a debt of £54, brought forward from 1904, a decrease of £103 odd in subscriptions, donations, and collections, and bills for more than £400 for repairs at George's-row and Bell-street, the sale became unavoidable, and the treasurer must hope to increase considerably the subscription list and to restore the Society's investments to their former level before the recurrence of bills for repairs and the perennial excess of expenditure over income again obliges the Mission to draw so deeply on its reserves.

"The Society received a legacy of £500 under the will of the late Mrs. E. M. Davies, which was invested in consols, only to be swallowed up in the sale above mentioned. It was also presented, 'instead of a legacy,' with the sum of £250 on deposit with the East End Dwellings' Company, Ltd."

Annual subscriptions amounted to £689 19s., donations to £144 3s. 10d., and chapel collections to £80 15s. 5s. The year's working expenses for the three Missions amounted to £1,501 8s. 1d. The treasurer therefore could only repeat his constant plea for more subscriptions.

The Rev. HENRY GOW read the report of the Committee, of which the following were the opening passages:—

"The Committee wish to begin their annual report by expressing once again their confidence in the missionaries, and their sense of the invaluable work done by them at their respective stations.

"The effects produced by domestic missions cannot be tabulated in a report. The good influences exerted are essentially of a slow, gradual, continuous character. There are no sensational conversions, no startling events to be described. It is a record of patient, faithful labour, of tireless sympathy, of business management watching over every detail of organisation, but inspired in every part by the fundamental aims of the domestic missionary, which, as stated in our rules, is 'the improvement of the moral and religious character of the poor, and the amelioration of their condition.'

"The committee are, year by year, if possible, more deeply impressed with the importance and usefulness of the work which is being done. They would point out that there are more than 800 children in the three Sunday-schools coming under the influence of teachers whose chief aim is to help them in their moral and religious life. Further, there are some 300 adults attending the Sunday evening religious services. In addition to this several meetings are held almost every week evening at all the Missions, which tend to promote the physical, intellectual, and moral well-being of those who attend. Exact figures as to the numbers of those who attend such week-evening meetings are not available; but, if the social entertainments are included, the number cannot be less than 1,000 every week during the winter. A further very important influence for good is exerted through the visits of the Missionaries and the Provident Visitors in the homes of the people. All those who have had experience in visiting the poor will bear witness to the pleasant relationships which may be established, and to the many opportunities which are afforded for friendly sympathy and helpful influence."

The report then referred to the valuable lectures to women given at George's-row, by a County Council lecturer, and to Mrs. Cash's lectures to women, at Rhyl-street. The report was already in type at the time of her lamented death; but, in reading it, Mr. Gow referred to the great loss it had brought to them. Particulars of the two drawing-room meetings recently reported in these columns were also given, and an earnest appeal made for more helpers. The report concluded by recording the loss during the year of the following nine subscribers:—Mr. J. C. Conway, Miss A. Field, Mr. Arthur Jevons, Miss E. A. Manning, Mr. T. S. Osler, Mr. Alfred Preston, Sir. B. Samuelson, Mr. John Warren, and Mrs. Wyman.

The reports of the three Missionaries, the Rev. F. Summers, of George's-row, Dr. Read, of Rhyl-street, and Rev. S. H. Street, of Bell-street, which were also printed and circulated, were full of interesting particulars of the work.

The CHAIRMAN, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, offered a cordial welcome on behalf of the Wandsworth congregation to their visitors, and said it was a special pleasure to welcome Mr. Carpenter, because it was he who had preached the first sermon in the room not far away, when they held their first service in Wandsworth, and had also preached for them on the twenty-first birthday of their church. Turning to the work of the Missions, he spoke of it very earnestly as God's work, which ought to be helped by every means in their power, both by direct personal help and support in other ways. They were glad to feel at Wandsworth that under Mrs. Tarrant's guidance the ladies were constantly working to provide clothing for the George's-row Mission. He could not express his admiration for the men who gave their lives to that work.

The Rev. F. W. STANLEY seconded the motion, as one who knew the good work that was being done, and the constant need of more help. He had come there from the Stamford-street Mission, where a kindred work was being done, and it seemed to him that every year the areas became larger where that kind of work was needed. There was no finer work being done in that great city. He concluded with a tribute to the memory of Mrs. Cash, to whom they had owed so much.

The resolution was unanimously passed.

The Rev. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER moved: "That this meeting desires to express its confidence in the principles of the London Domestic Mission Society, and to record its appreciation of the earnest and faithful labours of the missionaries, the Rev. F. Summers, the Rev. S. H. Street, B.A., and Dr. Read."

No one, he said, could read the tale of labour in the reports of the missionaries without being deeply impressed by the persistence, the fertility of resource, the energy and faithfulness put into the work. The reports, with their splendid list of institutions connected with the Missions, could, after all, give only a very imperfect impression of the actual amount of moral and religious force diffused over the lives of the people; but anyone who took even a small share in the regular operations had already gained some of the needful insight, which would light up those pages with a thousand rays of loving sympathy, moral steadfastness, and courageous endurance with which their honoured missionaries faced the difficulties of their work. They must rejoice at the points of contact which the reports showed with other forms of philanthropic activity in the several districts, as when Mr. Summers sat on the Education Committee, or acted as Secretary of the Children's Dinner Fund, and Dr. Read's medical experience was at the disposal of the Charity Organisation Society. It was certainly of advantage to both sides when the missionaries were brought into friendly relations with those engaged in other ways in the common work. And they had not only the labours of the missionaries themselves; there was also a whole army of workers enlisted for various purposes, to whom, in association with the missionaries they tendered their warmest thanks and grateful appreciation. The report referred to the losses of the past year, especially by the death of old friends. No one could recall such names as those of Mr. Osler, Mr. Alfred Preston, Mr. Warren, Miss Manning, without feeling how lamentable was the loss sustained, when friends so honoured and revered passed away. And he desired especially to pay a tribute of affectionate respect to the memory of Mrs. Cash. When they were planning the Rhyll-street Mission, twenty-one or twenty-two years ago, she took the warmest interest in the work. She attended meetings at his house in Hampstead, and at once commenced those Health Lectures to women which she carried on with such untiring diligence and warm response on the part of the people. She had them to her house, she took them drives, and in many ways manifested the sympathy which was always flowing from her heart. Only those who, like Dr. Read, were in close touch with the people could know how great a personal bereavement had fallen on the Rhyll-street Mission; the loving help of Mrs. Cash had gone out to so many homes and helped so many lives.

That was the first time, he believed, that their annual meeting had been held in one of the churches in the outer circle of Greater London. They came to tell their tale of work and enlist the interests of friends. It was quite true that the members of that church already had their own work; they had their own societies and agencies for rendering friendly help and sympathy to those around them in need. Yet he would plead that the mighty aggregate, which they called London, constituted indeed one life. No group of persons sharing that mighty life could be indifferent to the duties it laid upon them. Morning by morning from the residential suburbs the men went into the city to their occupations. London they looked upon as the concentration of their Empire, the centre of their political, commercial, intellectual life. But did they remember that the splendour of its wealth and intellectual achievement, the culture which was its finest product, the art, literature, science gathered there in its intensest form, all reposed, under the existing circumstances of society, on the foundation of innumerable lives, with no share, or very little share in those higher productions, who had to struggle from morning to night, from week to week, from year to year, in order that out of the hardness of their conditions, out of the toil and trouble of their lot, those splendid growths might be produced. They were realising now, as never before, the communion of life between all parts of that mighty whole; and the great masses of poverty and suffering at the basis of that life, the inevitable price under existing conditions of those high fruits of civilisation, appealed to them in a new way. It was not only sympathy that was called out, because poverty was distressing and suffering grievous, but they felt they shared a common responsibility for the whole, and had part in the aggregate conditions, of which that was the present outcome. And what did they see? They saw within the last generation enormous efforts, private and public, for the relief of poverty, the assuaging of pain, the lifting up of the ignorant, the healing of social sores, and no one could fail to see that the London of the present day differed enormously from that of thirty years ago. Everyone recognised that statesmanship and philanthropy were wrestling with the great problems which the masses of their poverty and suffering suggested; but also the tremendous difficulties which baffled the hopes of reformers and perplexed the insight of the wisest.

But one set of people were never baffled, never lost heart, were never daunted by the obstacles facing them, and they were the men in all the churches of their great cities engaged in the fight with ignorance, pain, and sin, taking hold of the problem not at the end of great social reforms and public measures, but at the individual end of character and the souls of the men and women they sought to help. After their recent Conference at Oxford, Mr. Graham Wallas had remarked to him on the pleasure of being among people so cheerful, of such buoyant energy and optimism. That was true pre-eminently of those at work in their Missions, and the reason was that they were engaged in a direct wrestle with problems which always had a moral side, and would always yield in the long run to moral influence. They knew that in the course of Providence there was no moral wrong for which there was not a moral remedy, and that in the teaching and example of Jesus, in the mighty forces in the Christian Church, they had the remedy which could not fail in its application when once brought into direct personal contact with the struggling and sinning. So they were not afraid to go to the idle and dissolute, to the poor home amid scanty furniture, where the very light seemed to have lost its cleanness, and to make to the drunken father, the bedraggled mother, the great appeal of Jesus, "be ye perfect, as your heavenly Father is perfect," God calls you to nothing less, the world needs you as nothing less, for your sake, for the children, for God's sake! And they knew, when the appeal was driven home into the hearts of the degraded, there was something in them that would always respond. So again and again they could tell of those they had lifted out of the slough of degradation, and had seen the beginnings of new and better life. To have done that for one single soul, to have been the means of bringing but to one life strength to meet temptation, to face sorrow, and courage to bear the agony of pain, that was to make it worth while to have lived.

The report stated that the work of the Missions had a double aim, the improvement of the moral and religious character of the poor and the amelioration of their condition. That was the seventy-first annual meeting, and what enormous expansion of aim was implied in the words "amelioration of condition." If they thought of all the agencies called into being in the last generations, they would see how great were the material aids at the disposal of the missionaries. And everyone knew how constant was the action and reaction of the inward and outward, the spiritual and material. Better dwellings and healthier homes were of the utmost importance in promoting a healthy and moral condition of the people. Yet they must not forget that it was the moral causes and powers of life which were the deepest. If they would read the chapter in General Walker's treatise on Wages, analysing the causes which made the labour of the poorest worth so little, they would see that the chief cause was as much moral as economic. In the work of their Missions they laid the greatest stress on its moral and religious side, and that must always be the test. Referring to the report on Vagrancy, as to the effect of the shelters of the Salvation and Church Armies, it was to be noted that while they must honour those Armies for their wrestle with the problem of the unemployed, the almost unanimous testimony of the most trusted workers in London philanthropy was against the shelters, which were condemned on the ground that instead of strengthening they weakened character, and became sources of moral contamination, and lowered the standard of self-help. That could not be said of any of the operations of their Missions. In them it was assumed that the service of the right was always possible. The conditions of moral temptation and victory were the same in every sphere. Virtue, sympathy, self-denial, steadfastness were no prerogatives of a class. These and courage and cheer were found as much among people struggling on less than £1 a week, as among the well-to-do. So the Missions devoted themselves primarily to the building up of character, the training of mind and conscience, the awakening of affection. The work was slow and apparently inconspicuous, with no sudden results, but it was sure and certain, it lasted and was never undone. He had often recalled the remark of one of the most devoted of their missionaries, the late Mr. Corkran, that no family which his Mission had once lifted up out of the savagery in which he found them ever relapsed. That was the effect of slow education, it was redemption and the victory of good over evil, the triumph of character and the expulsion of the powers of evil. So the many agencies of the Missions combined in one spirit for the training of mind, heart, and soul of the children of God.

He would earnestly beseech those who had given no help to go themselves and see what was being done. There were in their congregations young people who were becoming more and more interested in questions of social reform, and the improvement of the condition of our country. No school of experience was a better introduction to the actual conditions under which those questions must be faced than that afforded by their Missions. There anyone might find opportunity for using any capacity of social service. There they would be able to make friends with those in another rank of life, with different occupations, tastes, social standards, and ways of looking at life, and would get acquainted with their views, needs, and desires, and by give and take in the interchange of opinion would prepare for those larger judgments on human affairs which the social reformer must cultivate. He suggested the taking up of some social study in a reading circle, or the work of visiting for the District Provident Society as especially helpful. It was not simply the collecting of the money which gave that work its value, but the experience which the visitor gathered of the way the poor live, and the friendly sympathies which arose, which brought into their life a new and helpful element. So the ministry of faith and cheer went on, and they made their contribution to the edifice of moral and religious life, which was being built up in their midst.

As there was of old to religious inspiration a Jerusalem above, a pattern that lived in the heavens, so, he doubted not, there was also a London, as seen in the eye of God, which must present to His gaze appalling spectacles of sin and sorrow, yet a London also of much unseen good and faithfulness, the daily doing of hard and difficult duty, with a spirit such as alone could keep together the multitudinous forces operating through their common life. That London, seen by the eye of God, would gradually take on the brighter and more beautiful forms of the London which they hoped might be seen in earthly reality beside the Thames, a London where some at least of the terrible diversities of the common lot should be overcome, which should be to some extent freed from the tremendous economic uncertainties which now filled so many hearts with anxiety and dismay, where truth, beauty, love, righteousness, which they prized in their homes, should be not only the possession of the few, but be widely diffused through the streets and houses of that vast metropolis, a London of which it could be truly said that its walls should be Salvation and its gates Praise.

The Rev. W. G. TARRANT seconded, and spoke especially of their desire to offer encouragement and express their warm appreciation to the missionaries personally.

The resolution was very cordially passed.

The Rev. F. SUMMERS, in acknowledging the vote, asked for sympathy and help in their work, which was among the very poorest of the people.

Dr. READ made a very earnest appeal for attention to the economic aspect of poverty. The fact that one-fifth of the children born in great cities died under one year of age was terribly significant. But when they saw what poverty there was and how low the standard of living, the only wonder was that in these districts any of the children survived. They ought not to wait till the mere instinct of self-preservation compelled the nation to attend to that matter. It was a shame that the Christian churches did not move. What they might now see in the Exhibition of Sweated Industries must stir them to do all in their power, and to be in dead earnest about social reform. And, meanwhile, at their Missions they must give all the sympathy and help they could to the people.

The Rev. S. H. STREET said that, although formerly he had worked at a Mission in Belfast and afterwards in Manchester, he had never known a district which seemed to call so much for the work of a Domestic Mission as that in Marylebone, where the Bell-street Mission was. The overcrowding was desperate, and was the more painful because surrounded on every side by signs of wealth. In their Sunday-school at the Mission they had a splendid opportunity, which ought not to be neglected, and they were sorely in need of more teachers.

On the motion of the Rev. FELIX TAYLOR, seconded by Mr. H. Eveleigh, the officers and committee (as advertised in another column) were elected, and a vote of thanks to the chairman, to Mr. Carpenter and the other speakers, and the Wandsworth congregation, moved by Miss Anna Sharpe and seconded by the Rev. H. Gow, brought the meeting to a close.

MINISTERS' PENSION AND INSURANCE FUND.

THE triennial general meeting of the donors, subscribers, and members of the Fund was held at Oxford during Conference week, on Wednesday, April 18, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, chairman of the Board of Managers, presiding. The secretary (Rev. C. J. Street) presented the annual reports for the years 1902-5 inclusive, and the treasurer (Mr. Howard Chatfield Clarke) the statements of accounts for the same years. Their adoption was moved by the Chairman and agreed to after discussion, in which Mr. F. Monks, J.P., the Rev. Dendy Agate, and the Rev. C. Harvey Cook took part. Certain small alterations were made in the bye-laws. The following were unanimously re-elected as managers:—The Revs. J. E. Carpenter, W. G. Tarrant, D. Walmsley, and C. J. Street, and Messrs. H. Chatfield Clarke, T. A. Colfox, John Harrison, C. Sydney Jones, William Long, David Martineau, W. Blake Odgers, K.C., and Bryan E. Johnson, and Messrs. Harold Wade and R. M. Montgomery as auditors, on the motion of Mr. W. B. Bowring, J.P., seconded by the Rev. F. W. Stanley.

The following is the report subsequently presented by the Rev. C. J. Street, at the Business Meeting of the National Conference:—

The committee, appointed at the Leicester Conference to carry out the scheme for a Ministers' Superannuation Fund, reported to the Liverpool Conference three years ago that their task was completed, that a fund with a capital of £21,759 18s. 11d., and annual subscriptions amounting to £313 2s. 2d. had been raised, and that a board of managers had been elected in accordance with the constitution adopted at a meeting of donors and subscribers, held on February 26 and March 19, 1902. They also reported that 80 applications from ministers for insurance policies had been granted.

For various reasons some of these applications were not proceeded with. At the end of 1903 the number of policies in force was 71, one of which was subsequently dropped. Six fresh insurances were made in 1904 and 6 more in 1905; but one member, Rev. Richard Lyttle, of Moneyrea, died, to the deep regret of all who knew him, his representative receiving a sum of £250 under his policy, though only three premiums had been paid. During the current year 4 more insurances have already been effected, so that the number of policies running now is 85. Of these 40 are for an old age pension only; the rest include also an insurance for £250 (with or without profits) at death.

Strange to say, only 3 ministers under thirty years of age have taken out policies, though the benefits are far greater for the younger men than for those of more mature years. It is very significant, however, and a crowning proof of the need for such a fund, that no fewer than 46 of its beneficiary members are ministers who were over forty years of age at the time their policies were issued. Fifteen were actually over fifty years of age; but the premiums in such cases are very high, and they soon became prohibitive.

To meet the case of aged ministers, for whom insurance is impossible, and to facilitate their retirement, the managers have in two cases made pension grants to supplement funds raised specially for these ministers; and other such cases are bound to come up for consideration during the next fifteen or twenty years.

The managers are precluded by the constitution of the fund from assisting retired ministers. This has been a keen disappointment to worthy men who have borne the heat and burden of the day, but were obliged to retire, with very narrow means, before the fund was instituted. A fine opportunity is here presented to some generous donor to place a supplementary fund at the disposal of the managers to meet cases of hardship and need not provided for under the constitution.

A generous donation of £2,000 has recently been made to the fund by Mr. Philip H. Holt, of Liverpool, "to be applied, at the discretion of the managers, as an addition to capital, or in aid of ministers on active service, or both." This materially strengthens the hands of the managers in dealing with the older ministers still in active service who are contemplating retirement; but there is no fund as yet to provide for ministers who had already been obliged to retire, and are ineligible for benefit from the Ministers' Benevolent Society or the Widows' Fund.

The total value of the fund is £25,085 10s. 10d. The annual subscription list has, chiefly through deaths, fallen to £298. A further loss to the subscription list of £50 per annum will follow upon the generous gift, just received, from Mr. Charles W. Jones, of £500, being the capitalised value of his yearly contribution. This, of course, is an important addition to capital, but it cannot be invested so as to bring in a corresponding annual return. As the original calculations were based on the support given to capital by a subscription list of at least £300 per annum, it is important that new subscribers should be brought in. This is the more urgent inasmuch as the expectations of the managers regarding the early age of the majority of insurers have not been realised, so many older men having come on to the fund, necessitating larger grants toward the annual premiums.

The congregations, whose regard for their ministers may be assumed, and whose interests will be still better served as the financial cares of the ministers are lightened may well be asked to become annual subscribers. A few have done so from the first, but many more might. A resolution urging this course on the congregations will, with the permission of the committee, be brought before the Conference.* All members of the Conference who represent churches that subscribe not less than £1 per annum to the fund are entitled to vote at general meetings.

The fund suffered a heavy loss last year in the death of its founder and secretary Mr. J. Cogan Conway. His heart was thoroughly in the work, and without his perseverance and energy the fund could never have been established. His memory will live in the grateful hearts of the ministers who have benefited by his wise prescience and persistence.

The Rev. C. J. Street has, at the wish of the managers, taken Mr. Conway's place as secretary, and the vacancy on the Board of management was filled by the appointment of Mr. Bryan E. Johnson, till then one of the auditors, Mr. R. Mortimer Montgomery being elected auditor in his stead.

Quite recently the fund lost, through the lamented death of Mr. David Ainsworth, one of its warmest friends and a trustee from the beginning. Steps have been taken to secure another trustee in his place, and Mr. Richard D. Holt, of Liverpool, has accepted the office.—On behalf of the managers,

C. J. STREET, Hon. Sec.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE GUILDS' UNION.

THE annual meeting of the Guilds' Union was held at Oxford, in connection with the National Conference meeting, on Thursday afternoon, April 19, the President, the Rev. F. K. Freeston in the chair.

In the absence of the secretary, the Rev. Gordon Cooper, who was abroad, the report was read by Mrs. W. Wallace Bruce, a member of the Council. The Treasurer, Mr. H. P. Greg, was also away, on the Atlantic.

The report gave a survey of the past three years' work, since the last meeting of the Conference, at Liverpool, and recorded the other two annual meetings, at Kidderminster in 1904, and at Leicester in 1905, at each of which, as during that week in Oxford, a religious service had been held. At the last annual meeting the Rev. F. K. Freeston had been elected president, in succession to the Rev. Joseph Wood, their first president; and in 1904 the Rev. John Ellis had resigned the office of secretary, which he had held from the foundation of the Union, and was succeeded by the Rev. Gordon Cooper.

The Council had met twelve times during the triennial period. There were now thirty-eight guilds in the Union, the two largest guilds being those at Kidderminster with 165, and Chowbent with 156 members. Local unions had been formed in the Atherton and Teesside districts. Thanks were accorded to the examiners in the essay competitions which, though they had not been taken up as had been hoped, were felt to have been of real service, and the formation of reading circles was also commended.

The Guilds' Union Year Book and Manual for 1906, edited by the President (published by the Sunday School Association, Essex Hall, 2d.), copies of which were on the table, opens with an admirable "Message to Guild Members," by the President, on the value and knowledge of our Free Church history, and an exhortation "To All Young People." Then follows the report of the Council for 1905, and various particulars as to Guild work, and some notes on the American "Young People's Religious Union," and a "Service of Church Welcome" for the use of Guild members. A table of the thirty-eight affiliated guilds, with various particulars, occupies ten pages, and then follow the rules of the Union. The hymn-paper of the religious service held on the previous Monday evening in Manchester College Chapel is added at the end of the little book.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report, said that they were satisfied with their ideal, but not with the measure of their attainment. There was a distinct need for that movement among their churches, and they had much encouragement. Their present need was not for new plans, but a tightening up of their work all round. He read a letter received from Mr. E. S. Wiers, President of the American Young People's Religious Union, which spoke of the two organisations as kindred, and expressed cordial interest, and the desire for closer fellowship. "Our annual meeting," Mr. Wiers said, "occurs in May, and will mark our tenth anniversary. Dare I make bold to ask you or your president to send us a five or ten minutes' greeting for that occasion? We crowd a large church, and the occasion is an important one. If, perchance, any representative of your movement were to be here, then we should rejoice to put him upon our programme. Both of our movements are small, but profoundly significant, efficient doubtless in your field as in ours, yet promising and growing, and we can, I doubt not, be of some mutual aid."

Mr. FREESTON read the letter he had drafted in reply, which will be presented by the Rev. Joseph Wood in person, as he is gone to America.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE seconded the adoption of the report, and spoke warmly of the helpfulness of Guild work. The resolution was unanimously adopted.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON moved, and the Rev. A. H. THOMAS seconded, the election of the officers and council, with Mr. Freeston as president. Mr. Robinson deplored the excessive attention given in many of their schools and churches to dramatic performances, which, though innocent in themselves, were too engrossing, and kept their young people from other and higher pursuits. That was a matter which ought to be seriously considered. Their Guilds maintained a higher standard, and were deserving of all encouragement.

The Rev. JOSEPH WOOD then gave an address commending the Guild ideal to the churches. The Guild idea was not new. More than a thousand years ago there had been many guilds for various beneficent purposes, and then came the guilds of handicrafts, out of which the great London companies arose. They had now taken up the old name and given it a re-baptism. Their great aim was to keep a hold on the young people. Of their churches 38 now had Guilds, with 1,400 members.

[As a matter of fact there must be many more members, for the Year-book table gives 1,390 members of 26 of the Guilds, the other 12 not returning their numbers.] The kindred Union in America had 150 societies and 5,000 members, but they were ten years old, while their own Union was only four years old. It was gratifying to know that real good was being done. He knew of two small churches which had been saved from extinction by their Guild, and in others it was the heart and soul of the work of the churches. He trusted the Guilds would never depart from their fundamental aim—to promote the good life, and to express it in kindly deeds.

Mrs. WALLACE BRUCE also spoke, commending the work of the Guilds, and the Right Hon. WILLIAM KENRICK and Mr. W. B. BOWRING expressed their sympathetic interest.

On the motion of the Rev. J. J. WRIGHT, seconded by the Rev. W. H. ROSE, a resolution of thanks to the Principal of Manchester College for the use of the College chapel on the Monday evening was passed, and the meeting terminated.

THE SWEATED INDUSTRIES EXHIBITION.

THERE is nothing new in the exhibition of sweated home industries at the Queen's Hall. That is a fearful and scorching sentence to have to write. The evils here exposed have been exposed again and again. If they were the fresh discovery of some ingenious investigator, or if they were merely facts relating only to a particular period of stress, or to a few specially unfortunate workers, it would be more possible to express the emotion and the judgment which rise up and confront us; but it is nothing of the kind. The miserable destitution and constriction of life known as sweating is as extensive as the range of home industry itself. Here we watch a system which consumes the humanity of a large section of our women workers—a system which is as permanent as the British constitution itself. It continues in years of good trade and in years of bad trade. In course of time modifications may enter here and there. The invention of a paper-folding machine may lessen the number of cheap Bibles which have to be folded by women's hands at sweated rates of pay; but the system itself is unaltered, and all that the present exhibition has to tell us has been told us repeatedly these twenty years.

At the same time the exhibition will come as a revelation of unknown things to many visitors. For this reason the proprietors of the Daily News are to be thanked for having set this most impressive demonstration in the very heart of the luxurious City; and, let it be added, if there is nothing new in the exhibition, the exhibition itself is a new thing. The idea of it is borrowed from Germany. That fact is significant. A generation or less ago England was supposed to lead the world. When men proposed reform they were told the thing is impossible, the reason assigned being the fear of competition from countries where competition was unrestricted. This is no longer the case. Other countries have in some respects improved considerably on our methods for the protection of the weak. We fear German competition still, and that not because we have factory legislation she has not. In this matter of sweating, indeed, our neighbours have, as yet, done little; but they have taught us again to take up the question and look more searchingly for a remedy. From them we borrow the idea of the present exhibition, which, even if it tells us little new, is itself new in one essential respect. Facts which have been long known to students, and published in official reports, are here arranged in such a way as to impress the imagination of those who cannot read Blue Books. People are flocking to see. They must surely go away with keenly quickened feelings. The deepest sentiment is one of awe and dread. A society in which these things are not only possible, but quite ordinary, is an unhealthy body politic.

The value of the exhibition lies in the demonstration it affords of the human equivalent of low wages. If the consumer does not pay the full cost of the goods he uses that does not mean that the cost is not paid. It is paid inexorably in the shape of crushed and devitalised womanhood. I have said there is nothing new. We have all of us known that women and girls make chains at Cradley and elsewhere; but here something is added to bare knowledge of a fact—you can handle the chains. Take them up; pass the links through your fingers. A woman made it toiling from 7 in the morning till 8 at night, bare armed, bare chested, round shouldered, old before her time. A woman worked it for 1s. a day. From these chains turn to other articles, and notice the human cost of production of the tops of babies' shoes, of confirmation wreaths, of the box for your fountain pen. Here, again, is a coat and skirt (a silk-lined jacket) which costs the buyer 1½ guineas, for making which the worker received 1s. ! You can watch also the process of manufacture itself, for some of the actual workers are here engaged in their daily trade—military embroidery, matchbox making, trouser making, and many another. Each stall is provided with a card setting forth the hours, prices, and other industrial conditions. The prices earned vary a good deal, but are often not more than 1d. an hour. And here one word may be said as to the workers. They are not chosen as bad specimens. On the contrary, they look stronger than most you might meet, if you know the poorer purlieus of the town. Moreover, the women have dressed to their best limit, venturing even so far as a new ribbon for the neck. The exhibition does not exaggerate; it could not do so. The sample, if anything, fails to suggest the whole depth and intensity of wrong.

But the exhibition does represent the human equivalent of unfair wages. It appeals to our humanity. There is danger in this. It is so easy to touch kindly sentiment. It is so alluring a temptation to indulge the sentiment, and then dismiss the affair from our minds. The exhibition, as such, does not touch on remedies, but Mr. Mudie-Smith, editor of the Handbook, tells us, “I have no hope of any remedy for sweating which is not a radical remedy. Sweating follows unrestricted competition as naturally and inevitably as pain follows disease.” The various sections of the handbook are written by experts, many of them members of the Women's Industrial Council, and some of these do trench on the subject of a cure. To mention here a single one, and that with reference to the advanced policy of our own Australasian colonies. The formation of wages boards, and the fixing of a minimum wage, cannot indeed, be regarded as the last word in reform; but, among the early lessons which we are so slow to spell out, it is a most important one.

To return to the exhibition itself. How may it be most successfully utilised by the members of our own churches? Many of our members will, of course, visit it for themselves. But might not organised congregational parties be arranged? In this way something would be achieved towards bringing home to our minds the real nature of the social problem which we have been discussing at our Triennial Conference. The present writer has for many years had friends among the victims of the sweating system, and has known a good deal of the real cost of production. But the exhibition serves to bring home afresh the pressing, massive, various evil. It is one thing to study economics and statistics; it is another to have before our eyes the actual products, the actual processes. It is one thing to know the course of general wages; it is another to reflect: This thing which I handle was made in the one living and dying room of a neighbour, it was paid for at the rate of 1d. an hour. The whole painful implication of such knowledge penetrates the mind of the student. Something of its haunting appeal reaches the spectator who brings not special knowledge but only human sympathy. Knowledge, sympathy. But the exposition will have failed if it do not also stir to a more resolute resolve to follow the path of social justice.

The exhibition will remain open until May 29, and short lectures are delivered each afternoon on various aspects of the sweating system.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

XXXIX.

A PAINTER'S portrait of himself is always to my mind a puzzling performance. How much of himself does he see? The cast of his face a looking-glass will show, but its character in self-revealing moments is known only to his friends. He cannot catch himself unawares, and the effect of his effort may be a passable likeness, but is hardly a portrait.

So with literary self-portraiture. Here, too, the artist and the sitter are one; independent observation is impossible, and the result is such faint image of reality as memory chooses to accept and reflect.

I never, therefore, quite know what to think of autobiographical confessions. They are true, but they are not the truth. They are the writer's picture of himself. And this is all that the reader cares to see. Naked truth offends and repels. The confessions must not be those of the confessional. That which is presented must be presentable; the bare facts must be touched with mystery and adventure; must arrange themselves as a plot; and the horror of them must be lost in the pity and the pathos of them. This is the writer's temptation, and before long he thinks, not so much of the tale to be told, as of the effect to be produced, and the product is so much of the truth as will meet the requirements of art.

Nor is nature less exacting. It is not in nature that a man should choose dishonour, and cover himself with contempt. He draws, we may be sure, a distinction in his own mind between his outward reputation and his inner character, and, if he is careless of the former, it is because the latter, he believes, is safe. He never really parts with his self-esteem. He, too, has an innocence that may be injured. Only in this way can we explain the self-complacency of a Rousseau, a Cellini, a Casanova. Rousseau probably thought that a pathological study of himself would be hailed as a revelation of the facts of human nature. As if each man might not read the secrets of nature in his own bosom! Cellini's egoism is even more perverted. He can do no wrong. Like Rousseau, he is always discovering conspiracies against himself; he is the most injured man on earth; and he narrates his crimes with the same cold-bloodedness with which he commits them. Vengeance is always justice—when he is the avenger. Those were days, no doubt, when men were almost forced to redress their own wrongs with dagger and sword, but our hero knows nothing of excuse, needs no defence, and, with three murders to his account, carries himself as a man of honour, and even of religion. Such "Lives," as Frederick Robertson says in one of his letters, entangle the skein of life for those who read them. Casanova's vanity is the more vulgar vanity of a man who cares not what part he plays, so he play it well. Vice has its triumphs, and the admiration which sheer success, even in villainy, compels is a kind of applause. But, like many of his class, he would have the credit of virtue as well. "I have lived," he said, "a philosopher, and I die a Christian," well pleased, no doubt, to have escaped the irksomeness of living a Christian, and the odium of dying a philosopher.

But there are self-delineations worthier than these. They are worthier because they are inspired by a desire to show that, if sin abounded, grace did much more abound. Yet even in these human frailty comes in with confusing touch. Augustine, we may be certain, meant to tell a plain unvarnished tale. How could he do otherwise, addressing it to God? Yet there are asides, which seem to be meant for us. He draws himself as an erring man of the world. And the world still clings to him. There is something of a morbid strain here and there in his Confessions—as his critics have not been slow to discover—something also of stage-effect; he cannot wholly keep himself from far-fetched comparisons, "frigid conceits," "artificial turns." Bunyan, too—how ready he is to pile up accusations against himself, to magnify his offences, to reiterate his lamentations, to taste the bitter sweetness of his sorrow once again! To the end that boasting may be excluded, he will not leave himself one rag of conscious merit. But Bunyan was no Prodigal; neither was Augustine. They had never been bad men, as bad men are known. Self-condemnation in thought is never, perhaps, too strong, but the expression of it is carried too far, when it bewilders the sense of proportion and degree. And the point to which the whole argument leads us seems to be, that the portrait of a soul ought never to be attempted. If any would make the attempt, let them ponder two wise words: "That which I see not teach thou me;" "The heart is deceitful above all things."

If we had eyes to see the whole truth, our hearts would still persuade us that our eyes were deceived. It is better, then, to shut the door, and not to turn the inner chamber into a studio.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

COUNTRY HOLIDAY FUND.

SIR,—Your readers may remember that this Society has resumed its Country Holiday movement to the extent of forming a fund to be distributed among such of the London Sunday-schools as are arranging country holidays for their scholars. The society proposes to grant to each school (if its Fund permits) 7s. 6d. for each scholar sent away, the remaining 4s. to 5s. being found by the scholars, and all arrangements with regard to the holidays being made by the different schools.

Inquiries have been made to ascertain the number of children who are saving up for a holiday, and it is estimated that some 360 children are relying upon obtaining a grant of 7s. 6d. from the society. This means that the society must have a fund of at least £135 if it is to meet all the claims which will be made upon it. At present only £33 have been received from former subscribers.

An urgent appeal is accordingly made to friends to subscribe the remaining £102 before the end of June, and so prevent any of the children who have been saving up for their holiday from being disappointed by reason of the Society's Fund not being sufficient to enable it to make the necessary grants.

In past years the Society's Fund often amounted to over £150 a year, subscribed from over 100 friends living in London and the country. Will those who have not yet sent me their subscriptions for this year, do so as soon as possible, and will other friends who have not given in former years allow their names to be added to our list of subscribers? All gifts should be sent to me not later than June 30th, after which date it is proposed to distribute the Fund.

LONDON MINISTERS' MEETING.

SIR,—May I ask the favour of your space to invite all ministers and lay preachers who may be present at the Whit-week Anniversaries to attend our customary meeting, which will be held in the Council Room, Essex Hall, on Thursday in Whit-week, at 3.30? The reader of the paper will be the Rev. S. M. Crothers, D.D., and as we expect a large gathering I shall be glad if all who intend to be present will let me know at an early date in order that proper provision may be made for the brotherly meal to follow.

May 3, 1906.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

Astley.—The annual school sermons were preached on Sunday, April 29, by the Rev. E. E. Jenkins, of Walmsley. Special hymns were sung by the children. Hymns and anthems by an augmented choir were accompanied by a string band. The attendances and collections were not so good as in former years owing to the unfavourable weather. The collections with donations amounted to over £21.

Bolton: Halliwell-road.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached on April 29 by the Rev. H. E. Haycock, resident minister. Owing to unfavourable weather conditions both the attendance and collection were below those of last year. The latter amounted to £13, and included a sum of £2 15s. raised by a weekly offertory in the Sunday-school.

Bridgend.—The Rev. D. G. Rees has been elected a member of the Board of Guardians by a majority of 42 over his opponent, the rector of the parish (407 to 365). The vacancy was caused by the retirement of the Venerable Archdeacon Edmondson, who had been a member of the Board for thirty years, and chairman for twenty-three. Mr. Rees had to face a good deal of theological and social prejudice and misrepresentation, and is to be the more congratulated on his success.

Chatham.—The closing meeting of the Hamond Hill Social Union, connected with the Unitarian Church, was held at the Masonic Hall on May 2. An excellent company came together; many friends from other sections of the Christian fold being present. One of the features of the evening was the successful representation of W. B. Yeats' "Land of Heart's Desire." The programme for the session included several lantern talks, scientific addresses, literary lectures by the minister, and other interesting items.

Croydon.—The minister and committee of the Free Christian Church have arranged an interesting series of Sunday morning addresses by men with special knowledge of their subjects. Thus on June 10, Mr. H. B. Binns is to speak on "Whitman as a Religious Teacher," and on July 15, Mr. J. A. Hobson on "Physical Force as an Instrument of Social Progress." To-morrow (Sunday), Professor Earl Barnes is to speak on "Where Knowledge Fails." The Rev. W. J. Jupp will conduct the service.

Great Yarmouth.—The sale of work by the Ladies' Society, opened by Mrs. Mottram, of Norwich, was very successful. Councillor A. M. Stevens, of Norwich, presided, and congratulated the congregation upon the progress made during the ministry of the Rev. J. Birks, and upon the promise of still better things to come. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. Alfred Hall, of Norwich; the Rev. W. Birks, of Diss; Councillor J. Willinent, Yarmouth, and Mr. C. J. Selby, of Stalham. Mr. Birks has given two courses of special lectures on the "Position, Principles, and Prospects of Unitarianism," the cost of printing bills and advertising being borne by the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, which also made a grant of books for the bazaar. Much interest was manifested in the subjects. The activity of the social union has been continued for the third season with greater success than ever. Mr. Birks on Sunday last commenced the fourth year of his ministry at Yarmouth with services morning and evening, and at Filbey in the afternoon, where the oldest member is now in his 99th year.

Hinckley.—Under the energetic guidance of the Rev. T. J. Jenkins the Great Meeting Literary Class has had a most successful and helpful session. A closing meeting was held on Saturday evening, April 28, when nearly ninety sat down to tea, and a very successful entertainment of vocal and instrumental music was afterwards given.

Horsham.—On Sunday evening last the fifth of a series of monthly expository lectures was given by the Rev. J. J. Marten, the subject being "Man." At the conclusion of the service a meeting was held in the schoolroom at which Mr. W. J. Hoad, the delegate of the church to the recent Conference at Oxford, gave a careful report of the proceedings, which was followed by a discussion. Then a surprise awaited the secretary, Miss Kensett, for a beautiful oak book-case and reading desk combined was brought forward and presented to her, on behalf of the congregation, by the Rev. J. J. Marten, with words of generous appreciation and kindness which enhanced the value of the gift.

London: Stratford.—On Monday last, in connection with the Band of Hope, some friends from Newington Green gave an admirable concert which included Haydn's Toy Symphony. There was a fairly large attendance, about 120 being present. With the close of the session the membership of the Temperance Society is 70 juniors and 40 seniors, and the outlook is very hopeful. The members propose this year trying the experiment of giving a musical play for three nights in the middle of June.

North Cheshire Unitarian Sunday School Union.—The annual conversation was held at Stalybridge on Saturday, April 21. About 150 sat down to tea, the number being afterwards augmented to 200, the attendance being very good in spite of the heavy thunderstorm over the district during the afternoon. The Committee met in the new Guild room for business, after which the meeting was held in the large room of the school. Books, papers, games and curios were laid upon the tables for the inspection of the visitors. The President, Mrs. Dowson, occupied the chair, supported by Rev. H. E. Dowson and the hon. secretary. The following ministers were also present: Revs. W. Harrison, A. R. Andreae, H. Bodell Smith, W. G. Price, W. F. Turland and H. Kelsey White. An excellent musical and dramatic programme was given by the Stalybridge friends during the evening. The Rev. H. Kelsey White, who also attended as a delegate from the Manchester and District Sunday-School Association, gave an interesting address on the work of the Association, and the President on behalf of the Union, extended a hearty welcome to the Rev. E. G. Evans on his settlement at Dukinfield. Mr. Evans fittingly responded. Votes of thanks to the Stalybridge friends, to the delegates, and the President were duly given and responded to at the close of the proceedings.

Oldbury.—Sunday-school anniversary services were held on April 29, conducted in the morning by the Rev. A. Thompson, of Dudley, and in the evening by the Rev. E. A. Voysey, of West Bromwich, president of the Midland

S.S.A. At a musical service in the afternoon an address was given by Mr. Byng Kenrick, President of the Midland Christian Union.

Pontypridd.—Anniversary services were conducted morning and evening on Sunday, May 6, by the Rev. V. D. Davis, and in the afternoon the Rev. D. G. Rees, of Bridgend, conducted a Welsh service. There was special music at each service. The largest congregation was at the evening service, when over 100 were present. The new church building, which is in a capital situation, is nearing completion, but the Rev. Simon Jones and his congregation have still a large amount to raise, if it is to be opened free from debt.

Pudsey.—Reopening services were held on April 27 and last Sunday, the preachers being the Revs. John Ellis and Alfred Amey. On Sunday afternoon, April 27, the Rev. E. Ceredig Jones came with 40 of his choir from Bradford for a musical service. Last Sunday afternoon the choir gave a cantata, and were assisted by members of Mount Tabor U.M.F.C. choir and Miss Bottom, of Hunslet (Unitarian).

Raloo.—On Easter Monday the Sunday-school teachers of the Non-Subscribing Presbyterian church met at the manse to consider how they could best improve their work in the Sunday-school. In the evening a meeting was held in the church for the purpose of distributing the prizes to the Sunday-school scholars for good attendance during the year 1905. The Rev. John McCleery presided, and afterwards a number of the members of the Bible class entertained the young people with songs and recitations, and the meeting terminated with the Benediction.

Ringwood (Induction and Welcome).—On the occasion of the quarterly meeting of the Southern Unitarian Association at Ringwood, on May 2, the Induction service and welcome into the ministry of the Rev. C. E. Reed, was held in St. Thomas' Chapel. The weather was most unfavourable, but a goodly company, including members of other denominations in the town, assembled both at tea and the service. The Induction service was conducted by the Rev. H. M. Livens; the Rev. C. C. Coe gave the charge to the minister, the Rev. R. C. Moore, the charge to the congregation, and the Rev. James Burton, the welcome into the ministry. Mr. Reed acknowledged the welcome and closed the service with the Benediction.

Rivington.—A fairly successful series of meetings, arranged by the North and East Lancashire Unitarian Mission, was brought to a close by a meeting at Rivington Chapel on Saturday afternoon, May 5, and there was a fairly good attendance. The Rev. R. Travers Herford conducted afternoon service in the chapel, and after tea the evening meeting was presided over by Mr. Andrews Crompton, of Rivington. He gave a cordial welcome to the visitors on behalf of the Rivington congregation, and spoke of the fear of having too much professionalism in religion. He pleaded for more lay workers and speakers. Addresses were delivered by the Rev. J. Bellamy Higham, of Park-lane; Mr. J. M. Barlow, of Bury; and the Rev. M. R. Scott, of Ainsworth. On the motion of the Rev. S. Thompson a vote of thanks was accorded to the chairman and speakers.

Seven Kings.—The special services which have been held, under the auspices of the Provincial Assembly, in the Central Hall during the past four months, were brought to a very successful close on Sunday evening, when about 200 persons gathered to hear Mr. J. C. Chatterji, a highly-cultured Hindu, give an address on "Christ as He is Viewed in India." It was an eloquent exposition of the theory of the Re-incarnation. He maintained that the exalted character of Christ was the result of an evolutionary process, and that the same process had produced other equally great religious leaders and teachers. The same process is going on now, developing higher types of humanity, which will eventually become at one with God, as Christ was at one with Him. The intense earnestness and spirituality of the address made a deep impression on the audience. The services in the future will be held in the Assembly Room, Broadway, Ilford. The transference to Ilford is occasioned by the unsuitable character of the hall at Seven Kings. On Sunday next the Rev. T. E. M. Edwards will speak on "Christ as Viewed in the Gospels." Dr. Bimal Ghosh has promised to give the address on the 20th and 27th inst. The local committee is earnestly cooperating in this effort to establish a Unitarian church in the district.

Southend.—It will be seen from the advertisement in another column that a bazaar in aid of the new organ fund is to be opened on Saturday next, May 19, by Mrs. W. Wallace Bruce in the Victoria Hall, Alexandra-street.

Southport.—The Ladies' Sewing Circle, under the presidency of Mrs. Mott, held a very successful "sale of work" on April 25 and 26 for the purpose of raising funds for redecorating the church and school buildings. The sale was opened on the first day by Mrs. Tolme and on the second day by Mrs. Foard. The school-rooms in which the sale was held were beautifully decorated with "Yeddo" blossoms and hand-painted tapestry by Mrs. Mott. During the afternoon and evening of each day an excellent programme, including dramatic sketches, music and recitations, was given. The most novel feature of the sale was a model electric railway, designed and constructed by Mr. Barton Mott; the train was controlled from a distant switch board, and attracted much attention on its many journeys into a mysterious tunnel whence it emerged with surprise packages for the purchasers of tickets. The total amount realised by the sale was £250 13s. 11d. Many friends at a distance generously sent contributions both in money and in articles.

Stockport.—The annual sermons were preached on Sunday week by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson. There were large congregations, and the collections amounted to £22 5s.

THERE is a faith in immortal life which has characterised visionaries. There is an ecstatic confidence of those whose souls have been filled with a sudden glory. But more convincing to most of us is the sober confidence of the simple man who stands in his integrity undaunted by death. He sees no miraculous visions, but he is steadied by his experience, and he takes for granted that he is going on. Such a wholesome spirit appeals alike to the Stoic and to the Christian.—S. M. Crothers.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Christian Register of May 3 brings to us the first detailed account of what our friends in San Francisco suffered in the destruction of their city. "All our friends are safe and hard at work on the relief committees," Dr. Eliot, president of the A.U.A. reported. The First Church was seriously damaged. It was not then quite certain whether the Second Church was destroyed, though on the map it was within the burnt district. The Oakland Church was damaged, and that at Santa Rosa doubtless burnt. Their relief fund stood at the time of writing at $33,000. "Church wrecked. People homeless and penniless. With faith in God and man, we begin again. BRADFORD LEAVITT." Such was the first telegraphic message received at the Boston headquarters from San Francisco. There the Unitarian headquarters and the office and printing plant of the Pacific Unitarian were destroyed. Letters subsequently received from the Unitarian ministers were full of admiration for the courage, hopefulness, and self-sacrifice of the people. Our brethren will now long ago have received the message of sympathy sent by our National Conference from Oxford at the time of the disaster. It is not only sympathy but a rejoicing admiration we must feel for them.

THOSE who visited Amsterdam on the occasion of the meetings of the International Council will remember the old Walloon Church in that city where the religious service was held, and they will be interested to learn that among the foreign delegates appointed to attend the anniversary meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Whit-week, Pasteur Etienne Giran will represent the Walloon community. He has recently taken an active part in the preparation of a series of popular tracts in Dutch and French for circulation in Holland. In addition to the representatives of the American Unitarian Association already mentioned, it will be a pleasure to welcome also the Rev. T. L. Eliot, D.D., Portland, Oregon. It is thirty years since he last visited England. Dr. Eliot has a son now studying at Oxford as one of the Rhodes scholars.

THIS year's Summer Session for Sunday-school Teachers, to be held at Manchester College, Oxford, from Friday, June 29, to Saturday, July 7, promises to be of great interest. Attendance is open to teachers and others practically connected with our Sunday Schools, and young people about to take up the work. The object of the Summer Session is—1st, to endeavour to raise the ideal of Sunday School teaching by infusing that enthusiasm which naturally results from the union of those who have interests in common; and by the devotion of a certain time to the study of subjects bearing upon their work. 2nd, to give the members the opportunity for visiting the colleges and other places of interest in Oxford, and for meeting together in friendly intercourse. Teachers and others who have attended any of the four Sessions already held know how well calculated they are to secure these ends. The letter from Mr. Ion Pritchard, which will be found in another column, draws further attention to the opportunity thus offered.

THE Sunday morning service is to be conducted by the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, who will also lecture on the following Monday on "The Teaching of the Twelve Apostles." The Rev. Charles Hargrove is to give two lectures on "How the New Testament Grew," and Mr. Ion Pritchard one on a "Visit to Palestine." On the last Friday morning Dr. S. M. Crothers is to speak on "The Teacher as a Learner." Other lectures will be given by Miss Marian Pritchard, Mr. F. E. Davidson, H.M.I., the Revs. H. D. Roberts, J. L. Haigh, Alfred Hall, Thomas Robinson, J. J. Wright, and W. L. Schroeder.

MR. JOWETT, in his address as chairman of the Congregational Union, has treated a subject, than which none can be more vital for any religious assembly, in a spirit of modesty and at the same time of bravery. The speech is founded on the obvious contrast between the force of the Pentecostal Church and the ineffectiveness of its modern representatives; "Round us are the hurrying multitudes of this modern Jerusalem, with intensity and absorption stamped upon every face—members of all nations, and peoples, and kindreds and tongues. What impact shall we make upon them? What will be the consequent influence of our assembly upon the predominant movement and life? . . . But the multitude do they know that we are about? Is there any awed and mesmeric rumour breathing through the streets, stirring the indifferent hearts into eager questionings? . . . I think that even the most optimistic of us will feel obliged to confess that the general tendency is undisturbed, that we do not generate force enough to stop the drift, and that the surrounding multitude remains unmoved."

WE are all conscious of the truth of this confession, and aware that the lack of power is not confined to one sect. All the churches are or might be saying as much. It is worth while to follow Mr. Jowett's argument further, and to consider his analysis of the types of people who are alienated from the Church:—(1) "First of all, there are those who never think about us at all. . . . We contribute no thread to the warp and woof of their daily life." (2) "And then, secondly, there are those who have thought about us, and as a result of their thinking have determined to ignore us. For all simple, positive, and progressive purposes we are no longer any good." In illustration of this type Mr. Jowett refers to the labour papers, and there can unfortunately be no shadow of doubt that he has accurately summed up the significance of these expressions of organised labour to the Christian Church. (3) There are those who think and are constrained into fiercest opposition to the Church.

THE cause of this indifference and opposition is essentially the failure of the Church to reach and stir and consecrate the energies of the community. Mr. Jowett pursues the theme into particulars, and the causes he assigns are true causes, although we do not find his analysis of the reasons so convincing as his analysis of the facts. The Church lacks reverence, and has largely lost the sense of awe. Moreover, it has exalted the one man ministry, and lost the power of mystic fellowship. It is interesting to find that Mr. Jowett points his fellows to the "rich and enriching history of the Society of Friends." The Church is in want of strong, irresistible men, and this because its popular God is not a mighty God.

If such are the facts and such the causes, what is the remedy? Nothing less than a "powerful and athletic Church." Mr. Jowett believes this to be still a possibility, and given that, he holds with full faith the conviction that the Church may again lead the world. His confident assurance is buttressed on two thoughts. The world is in mortal need of a great guidance towards the highest ideals. A Church baptized into the fellowship of the sufferings of Christ can give the impulse and the power for which humanity craves in its vast enterprise.

REGARDED apart from the worth of its argument, Mr. Jowett's address is noteworthy on two grounds. His numerous quotations from the Old Testament explain his strong disrelish for much modern hymnody. The following lines are described as "a light and telling song with very nimble feet":—

"O, that will be glory for me,

When by his grace I shall look on his face,

That will be glory for me."

And then by way of comment we have "The Lord is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence before him."

THE declaration about revivals is most refreshing. "I speak not now of the wonders of spasmodic revivals; and, indeed, if I must be perfectly frank, my confidence in the efficient ministry of these elaborately engineered revivals has greatly waned." It is true that revivals are alien to the abiding mind of Congregationalism. Unhappily of late years this historic denomination has been too much represented by a heady and excited evangelicalism, and one would fain hope to find in this pronouncement of the chairman a sign of a returning sobriety accompanied by a deeper and more thoughtful zeal.

AN interesting, and perhaps important discovery of early gospel material has been announced this week by Drs. Grenfell and Hunt, the scholars whose labours at Oxyrhynchus (a hundred miles above Cairo) have already been extremely fruitful. In a letter to Monday's Times the learned explorers state that the season just closed, the fifth of the series, has yielded the most precious results. A hundred and thirty-one boxes of fragments of papyrus, and other manuscripts have been found in the rubbish heaps which have rendered the name of the place famous. The writings range in age from the second to the sixth century. Many exist in but small pieces, and it is questionable how far the original documents can be reconstructed. Happily there are a considerable number in better condition, and these include, in addition to copies of already extant works by Plato, Demosthenes, Isocrates, and others, some notable additions to the known verse of Pindar, Euripides, and other poets. Important new historical writings have also been found; and a large quantity of material still remains awaiting decipherment.

THE gospel material referred to consists of a vellum leaf (of the fourth, fifth, or sixth century) containing forty-five lines, from "a MS. of a lost Gospel. The subject of this," the discoverers say, "is a visit of Jesus with his disciples to the Temple of Jerusalem, and their meeting with a Pharisee, who reproaches them with their failure to perform the necessary ceremonial of purification before entering the holy place. After a question and answer, in which the Pharisee describes in some detail the formalities which he had himself observed, Jesus makes an eloquent and crushing reply, contrasting outward with inward purity." Admitting a certain resemblance between this passage and others in Matthew and Luke, the writers maintain that "the whole incident, of which the account is practically complete and very striking, is quite different from anything recorded in the Gospels. Among the most remarkable features of the fragment are its cultivated literary style, the picturesqueness and vigour of the phraseology, which includes several words not found in the New Testament, and the display of a curious familiarity—whether genuine or assumed—with the topography of the Temple and Jewish ceremonies of purification." They add the opinion that "the question of the nature and value of the Gospel to which this fragment belongs is likely to provoke much controversy." Readers will remember the great interest stirred by the discovery of the "Logia," or sayings of Jesus, at the same spot some years ago.

No lover of art will wilfully miss seeing the beautiful collection of early Flemish pictures now being exhibited at the Guildhall. The paintings are only on loan, and consequently a first visit should be made without delay, in order to allow opportunity for coming back to this fair resting place of fair and wondrous things. To enter and linger there is in the nature of a sacrament. There is something so intimate, so tender, so full of grace and the charm of consecrated common life. The work of Memling especially reminds us of the sanctity of common things in a society which had felt and conserved the influence of the Beguines:

THESE women were the sisters of the secular life. Feeling the appeal of the religious life, they responded also to the call of their fellows. They strove, and strove with admirable success, to combine the charm of spiritual intercourse with the exact and large discharge of daily duties. Again and again we find ourselves recalling memories of this influence in these pictures. As compared with the more familiar Italian traditions of sacred art, the Flemish workers who followed the Van Eycks are more simple and homely. The incidents of the pictures are closely akin to the life of the people. The landscapes are exquisite. Here we seem to behold the real country in which common men and women moved, even though the land is touched with a rare delight beyond the vision of its ordinary denizens. The aim, so far as conscious didactic aim may be imputed, is to represent the sacred in the secular. The portrayals of the infancy of Jesus suggest the joy and dignity of motherhood and childhood in the Netherlands of the fourteenth and fifteenth centuries.

ONE picture may be referred to in illustration of the nearness of these artists to ordinary affairs. There is a Last Supper which was at one time ascribed to Dürer, but is now given to a Pictor Ignotus. At first sight it disappoints us, for it looks like any supper table. The rather disordered array of food and furniture of the meal is so unlike the stately simplicity of the typical Last Supper. The figures of the guests are so vigorous, we had almost said carnal, that we are convinced they must be portraits. Nothing is softened from reality. We look again, and are won by the central group of the three disciples who are so keenly aware of the presence of the Master. Here is a precious flash of Gospel interpretation. How various is human nature! How blind are we men to life's finest issues! Yet how glorious the response of those who have the soul to perceive, even though the senses are at ease. Nothing startles the eye, but the selective presence of the spirit claims those who are its own.

AT the presentation of graduates to the Vice-Chancellor at the University of London on May 9, 25 students of Bedford College for Women were presented for degrees in Arts, 7 for degrees in Science, and 13 for the post-graduate diploma in Pedagogy. A reception was held afterwards at the College and attended by about 500 guests, including representatives of the University, a large number of distinguished guests and many former students. The guests were received by Mrs. James Bryce and the Hon. Mrs. Bertrand Russell and the Principal, Miss Ethel Hurlbatt, M.A. The Fishmongers' Company has given one hundred guineas to the College Site and Building Fund. The Council have appointed a former student, Miss Ethel Strudwick, M.A., to the Staff of the Classical Department of the College.

IS THERE ONLY "ONE THING NEEDFUL"?

II.

UNDER this title I have introduced a series of notes on Christian Ethics, with the contention that we cannot understand the ethical teaching of the New Testament until we get behind the texts to history.

It is beyond doubt that what we read in the New Testament rests on one central fact—the communication of a deep moral impulse by a Personality of unique power acting on men of a more ordinary type. The moral influence, proceeding from Jesus and received by his followers, was expressed by them in forms and in ways suited to the situations which they had to deal with, and the immediate needs of the surroundings in which they worked. Parts of the Gospels and all the rest of the New Testament consist of these secondary expressions of Christ's influence. The primary expressions of Christ's influence—that is, the forms in which he himself actually expressed it—are embedded in other parts of the Gospels.

The tendency of liberal theology at the present day—especially (under the influence of Dr. Martineau) among Unitarians—is greatly to undervalue the secondary expressions of the impulse given by Jesus, and to concentrate attention on an attempt to get at "the original gospel" divested of everything that anybody but Jesus said about it.

I venture directly to reverse this "canon of criticism"—if such it can be called, for it is only a piece of glorified religious impressionism. The assumption is, that we must at all costs get at the teachings of Jesus in the form in which he actually presented them, because only so can we know him. This would be true if Jesus were only a moral lecturer, or (whatever he was) if he had come only to replace old creeds by a new creed, and old codes of law by a new code. Was it so? The question brings us to the root of the matter. Those who assume that this was the purpose of his coming may be left to make what they can of the new creed and the new code.

I believe the real question with regard to Jesus is this: What is that deep moral impulse which is the root and germ of the whole movement set forth in the New Testament? In every sphere of life we find that a thing is what it does. The meaning of the moral impulse given by Jesus is shown in its results, and its first results are found in those "secondary expressions" of it which make up most of the New Testament. In these we see it as a living influence passing from person to person—being interpreted, tested, applied—receiving from and giving to Jew and Greek alike. The different ways in which all this was being done are revealed to us in the great Pauline Epistles, in the Apocalypse, in the Gospel and Epistles of John, in the Pastoral Epistles, in the Epistles of James and of Peter, in the Epistle to the Hebrews. The ethical significance of these will come out when we ask, concerning any of the writers, What is the historical situation that he appears to be grappling with? And what light does he desire to throw on it? To discuss this method any further in general terms would be useless. I hope to give one or two partial illustrations of it in the sequel.]

Meanwhile we may call to mind the two earliest authentic references to Christianity which are found in Roman writers. Tacitus speaks of it as a "deadly superstition," and of Christians as anarchists of a dangerous type. It is very likely that, considering what the government of the day really was, there was some outward ground for the charge of anarchism. It was evidently not an anarchism of violence, but the authorities found nothing reassuring in that. The younger Pliny has more to tell. He says there were "illicit societies of Christians" in his province. Their custom was to meet on a fixed day, when they said a form of words (a prayer or hymn) to Christ, "as it were to a God." It is impossible to tell exactly what Pliny meant by this last phrase. "Then," he continues, "they bound themselves by a solemn asseveration, not for mischief, but to the effect that they would not commit thefts, robberies, adulteries, would not deceive, would pay lawful debts." After this they separated; but there was another meeting at which they shared in a common meal, all ranks and sexes taking part together. He adds that their ideas seemed absurd, fantastic, and fanatical, as far as he could discover.

This shows how morality was a prominent feature in primitive Christianity, which was a religion more decidedly ethical than any other that the Romans met with. Notwithstanding this, there was an element of secrecy in the customs of the Christians, and a feeling on the other side of danger in the secrecy. The authorities were possessed by the idea that there was some unknown and dangerous element involved.

What, then, was the moral condition of the world which found primitive Christianity a "deadly" or a "fantastic" superstition? We are familiar with the way in which this question is usually treated.

"On that hard Pagan world disgust
And secret loathing fell;
Deep weariness and sated lust
Made human life a hell.

In his cool hall, with haggard eyes,
The Roman noble lay;
He drove abroad, in furious guise,
Along the Appian way,

He made a feast, drank fierce and fast,
And crowned his hair with flowers—
No easier nor no quicker passed
The impracticable hours."

Writers like Farrar fill whole pages with charges of infamy and brutality, such that, if they were the whole truth, Rome could not have existed for a year. Can we not give any intelligible, definite account of what was wrong? As a recent thoughtful writer has most justly said: "Amid the deep disillusionment and despondency which had overtaken the Roman Empire, all thoughtful men were labouring to find some remedy for what seemed like a mortal sickness. With a true diagnosis men turned to those problems which arise immediately out of the two great primary instincts—self-preservation and reproduction. The old civilisation had been recklessly wasteful in both these matters, attaching very little value to human life, and permitting every kind of abuse in the indulgence of appetite." The result was a gradual depopulation of the Empire, on the one hand, by infanticide, suicide, gladiatorial shows, military massacres; on the other, by the discovery of unnatural means of satisfying natural instincts. In the second century—and, in fact, until its alliance with the imperial power—Christianity organised communities which were sources of moral health in a dying civilisation. To define their attitude to this "civilisation" was the first necessity felt by the Christian missionaries as their influence spread; and the character of early Christian ethics partly (but directly) depends on this fact. Directly, from the impulse of Jesus, they derived their conviction of the value of every human life as the vehicle of a soul having eternal destinies to fulfil; and against the unbridled indulgence of animal instincts, they inculcated abstinence and self-control.

The self-denial which plays so great a part in the Christian teaching of the first three centuries has special reference to this particular fact of human nature. It is clear that many Christian teachers were driven by the unbridled indulgence which they saw around them to the extreme of holding up entire abstinence as the perfect condition, and regarding even monogamous marriage as a necessary evil. The same views were taken by many pagan "philosophers" (that is, moralists) of the day. More moderate views are also found, and a new virtue (or special duty) begins to be inculcated—self-control; and along with this there grows the idea and ideal of human purity. Both of these rest on a conviction of the superiority of the spirit to the flesh—a conviction that the business of the flesh is to realise the superiority of the spirit, to be subordinated, not disregarded. In a sense, our nature is our enemy until we have it under complete control; and the historical origin of the Christian duty of "self-denial" has, I repeat, special reference to the natural instincts of our bodily life, on which the preservation of the individual life and the life of the race depends—but which, uncontrolled, become the deadliest enemies of both.

We see, therefore, that to assert "self-denial" as the one thing needful rests on historical ignorance and moral confusion. "Self-denial" stands forth, none the less, as an indispensable condition of individual and social health and moral progress; and the feeling of the guiding minds in the early Church on this subject is seen to have been at bottom sound and true.

It appears, then, that, instead of speaking of "self-denial" or "self-renunciation" as a principle of Christian ethics, we should speak of "self-control" or "self-mastery." We may, of course, give to the idea of self-mastery a wider scope than it had in the early Church; in fact, we must do so in view of the greater complexity of modern life. And though, even then, it is not to be identified with the whole Christian ideal, it remains as one of the foundation pillars of the manhood which is built up in the light of that ideal; and the famous saying in the Gospels seems not to lose, but gain in force when we read it thus: "If any man will come after me, let him become master of himself." Whatever follows, whatever the Cross may or may not be, that is the first step.

WHAT THE SPHINX SAID.

OUR little peep at Egypt was in the nature of an uncovenanted mercy. Only the exigencies of steamer arrangements brought us to African shores at all. Perhaps it is enough for five or six weeks to go sight-seeing in two continents, but we must needs visit a third, and so from Tuesday morning to Friday afternoon (exactly the time allotted for the Conference at Oxford the following week, we remembered) we saw what we could of the Nile country.

Port Said had been described to me in uncomplimentary terms, and I cannot honestly reverse the verdict. Perhaps the best that can be said of it is that it abounds with signs of energetic life. It is the creation of the Suez Canal, which, in its turn is a monument of genius and courage. The vast traffic was made evident at a glance. The harbour and docks crowded with steamers, the warehouses and other business premises, the alert and busy population, all contrasted strangely with the general slackness of Syria. We reflected that we were now under British supervision, and we took comfort. For a time we needed it.

The railway ride, of five hours or so, to Cairo was by no means agreeable. There were objects of interest, of course—the great canal itself, by the side of which we ran for a good way, noting its structure and huge apparatus; the occasional steamers (including a large Russian vessel from the East, apparently, densely crowded with ragged passengers); the desert itself was a novelty. But when there is a strong wind that blows sand, sand into the air one breathes, and rather accentuates than lessens the heat, there comes a limit to the charms of such a journey. By and by we reached Ismailia, then Tel-el-Kebir (familiar name), and one station after another on the delta, where occasional clumps of palms suggested cheerfulness, and the whole land grew greener; but even Cairo itself seemed but little attractive as we drew into it at last. Gladly we got out of the train but in my hurry I left a notebook behind, and regretted it. (It has somehow reached me at home, after all!)

The hotel was cool, at 71 degrees in dense shade, and a few hours later we were strolling about that wonderful city of Cairo as if we had often been there. It is a marvel of colour and costume. I think every bright tint but green comes prominently into the dress of the people. Why that exception? The Western, almost Parisian, style of some shops could not deceive us. True, the traveller is an important element in the life of the city; but just as some millions remain in London in the holiday season when everybody is "out of town," so there is evidently a great and populous Cairo that lives its own life, little affected by the transient sight-seer, and subject to the permanent pressure of Western ideas only so far as they are embodied in government and commerce. I was assured on every hand that under British control the prosperity, not only of Cairo, but of the whole country has reached a height unprecedented in recent times. Some go so far as to assert that the poor especially were never so well off in Egypt since the dawn of history! There are signs enough, at any rate, that men are thriving all around, though the poverty of the very poor is still evident.

On consulting with various friends, and especially with Hassan Omar, our intelligent dragoman, whose only defect was omniscience, we determined to plunge into the desert on the first of our available days, and the morrow saw us driving off at a great pace through a part of the city abounding in fine residences and public buildings, and across the great bridge of Kasr-el-Nil, a structure which ought to make every Turk blush when he gets back to the crazy bridges of Constantinople. On the far side (left bank) of the river an electric tramway begins. We were lucky enough to catch the eight o'clock car. The line runs straight for eight miles or so, first through suburban and park-like districts, then among wide-spreading green fields, which at flood are beneath the water, but now were rich in crops. Camels with preposterous-looking loads of clover and grass came up from the fields and along the acacia avenue of the great road from Ghizeh to Cairo. By and by almost all the carload of passengers had been dropped (notices in English, French, Italian, Greek, and Arabic tell how to stop the car), and a few travellers like ourselves went on to the terminus. Here is an hotel, and accommodation for those who mean to ride around or beyond the great Pyramids.

These vast structures were, indeed, close at hand. For a long time they had grown in the perspective as the gradually rising road led up to them from the river level. They stand on the rocky side of the original river gulf. Beyond Cairo, on the east, one sees the corresponding line of cliffs and hills, and judges the width of that ancient estuary before the delta had been formed. We are dealing now with huge periods of time, almost "geologic"; but it is the best introduction to a consideration of those ancient monuments of Egyptian civilisation by the side of which Hebrew antiquities, even the most remote, are comparatively modern. The Pyramid of "Cheops" is too large to realise by itself, and standards of comparison are not at hand. The Londoner may build it up in his imagination by providing a base the size of Lincoln's Inn Fields, and rearing an apex fifty feet higher than the cross of St. Paul's. We did not climb it or enter it. We had other uses for our time and strength. Having traversed three sides of it and mounted a course or two, we felt we knew something sufficient about it to give actuality to our previous (and future) reading, and so we pushed on to the Sphinx.

What did it say, that most marvellous relic, marvellous alike in the boldness and majesty of its conception, in the strange persistent look that it wears in spite of the ruin of ages, and in the memories of famous men who throughout history times have successively gazed into its face? Hewn out of the living rock, apparently before the exhausting ambition of kings reared any of the three enormous Pyramids close by, no man can name its sculptor or even fix its date. It looks across the wide valley where the belt of green has shrunk and widened with the thought and industry of man, where now it yearly widens more and more; it seems to see the quarries beyond the Citadel of Cairo, whence the blocks were brought (they say) to build the Pyramid of Cheops; and as it lifts its eyes above the stream of mortality that flows between there is an awful humanity in its glance. It is truly eloquent to him who hath ears to hear; he understands, and is silent.

Close by is a temple, hollowed out deeply so that one sees not only what that particular edifice was like and the colossal magnitude of its stones, but also gauges the original level of the earth at this spot; and then, and then only, one is able to estimate the magnificent proportions of the Sphinx before the sands crept up about its base to dwarf it. How puny are our cameras before such objects! Nevertheless, I duly tried to take away some filmy memoranda, and then mounted for fresh adventures.

The indulgent reader, who has not ridden for several hours on the back of a dromedary on the desert sands must endeavour to conceive what this means to the rider who rarely mounts anything more exciting than a motor omnibus. Must I plead guilty to such pride when raised "to that bad eminence," that although I saw, to my interest and wonder, two kinds of blossom actually trying to gem the Sahara, a blue flower and a golden, I did not dismount to ascertain their species and secure specimens to keep? Alas! such is the fallible temper of man—and after such deep communings, too, with the Sphinx! (Or was it fear lest I should not get up again so easily next time?) Thus merrily we ambled on under a blue and hot sky, leaving the Ghizeh group of monuments behind, and making southward for the equally interesting group of Sakhara.

There is a gap of some ten or twelve miles' distance between Ghizeh and Sakhara, and of I do not know how many years between the "Step Pyramid" at the latter place and those that stand by the Sphinx. According to experts this "Step Pyramid" is the oldest of them all, and it has been dated more than 4300 B.C. After six thousand years it may well have a rugged aspect. Other pyramids are near, and, indeed, there is a long range of them still extending south. Where we halted there is a rude but efficient "house," named after Mariette, the famous French explorer, who built it more than half a century ago to live in during his long and fruitful labours among the buried antiquities of this Necropolis of Memphis. We entered several of the excavated "tombs"; they consist in each case of a numerous suite of chambers, and suggest purposes of worship as well as interment. In connection with the Serapeum, Mariette found not only the tombs of the Apis-Bulls, but chapels, statues, and votive tablets. We followed in his steps among the huge sarcophagi that once contained the remains of the sacred animals, candles and magnesium wire being needed. In two other tombs which we entered the roofs of the chambers are so near the surface that the sand has been cleared away, and skylights (looking very singular amid the desert scene) show here and there that wonders are below.

I must not try to describe those wonders. It must suffice to record our ever-growing marvel at the delicacy and precision of the sculptured walls, whether in relief or incised. Even Greek artists surely never exceeded the grace of some of these outlines of birds, animals, plants, and human beings. At a turn we came suddenly face to face with the statue of King Méra (2500 B.C.), almost as fresh, it seemed, as the day it was erected. Near by was a bas-relief of his queen, her hair deftly caught and tied with a bow. In this tomb (discovered in 1893) and another famous one near at hand, made for a great official, we were struck with the fidelity with which many daily scenes of those ancient generations were rendered—scenes in the fields, houses, temples, and by the river-side. Enough, and more than shall be lightly spoken of. We have fed mind and body, the beasts are rested, and so away we go once more, now striding towards Memphis itself.

Rather, we stride to where Memphis was. Now there is a mud-built village by the site of the old capital; a few ruins testify that here was the seat of great monarchs and the home of busy multitudes. Thousands of palms grow around, for we have left the desert behind, and by huge banks and dykes have threaded among the fields and plantations a mile or two. We duly inspect the two colossal statues of Rameses II., lying there with placid look, crisp-carved, broken, but not crumbling. Otherwise looks his poor mummy, with its crossed arms upon its breast, yonder in the great museum at Cairo.

The name brings one back from gossip that threatens to be endless. We took train to the city after a long but amusing wait at Bedrechin Station, where a silk-robed sheik sat in all his glory, being fanned now and again to keep the flies away. Next day we saw mosques, and bazaars, and the museum—itsself worth all the journey to see—and so the hours wriggled from our grasp till all were gone. In the evening we visited the Citadel, and admired its splendid alabaster mosque: From the terrace we surveyed the great city, stretching far and wide beneath. Far off, in the dusky glow of evening, we saw the great Pyramids and the Sphinx once more. The fourth day saw us at Alexandria; we said good-bye to Africa, and, on a bright sea, drew homewards. W. G. ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

SIR,—May I ask through your columns that ministers who purpose attending the anniversary meetings in Whit-week, especially those who desire hospitality, should send me word, if possible, by Tuesday next, May 22? I am now applying to members of our churches in London for offers of accommodation, and I should like to know without delay how many ministers will have to be provided for during the meetings. Already nearly 70 ministers have asked that tickets for the Essex Hall lecture and the conversazione should be reserved for them.

THE EDUCATION BILL.

To say that we are prepared to accept the Bill as the best we can get under present circumstances is one thing; to suppress criticism, withhold the expression of our sense of what is right and fair to everybody, and thank the Government for such mercies as they are willing to give, is quite another. Undoubtedly, the Bill is a vast improvement on the present system, and, with all its faults (and some of them are serious), I would accept it if I can get nothing better; but, for all that, my voice shall be raised now, as it has been since the controversy of 1870 in my youth, for the principles of the old National Education League, which will yet be adopted in full as the law of the land—"National Education, free, secular, and compulsory." We have got the first and last, the second is fast coming, and the agitation against this Bill from Church and Catholic quarters—an agitation quite intelligible and largely justifiable—is helping it on. While extravagant and impossible demands are being made by the denominationalists, it is a grave mistake in tactics, if not in principle, for those who repudiate the right of the State to interfere in matters of religion to acquiesce in a proposal to establish and endow an "Undenominationalism," which is as offensive to the dogmatist as his dogmas are to us. No doubt the Government will steer a middle course, but let it not be between their present proposals and those of the denominationalists. For the sake of the three valuable principles asserted in the Bill—the unification of the school system, the abolition of tests for teachers, and a genuine conscience clause—I am prepared to forgive much. As the 1902 Act contained the germs of the present Bill, so this Bill is an indication of the still better things that shall be.

To abolish the distinction between Council and "Voluntary," provided and non-provided schools, and establish at last a truly National System of Elementary Education, is great gain. Yet the Four-fifths Clause is calculated to spoil this excellent piece of work. It is being bitterly opposed by the High Churchman and the Catholic as conceding too little; it is equally obnoxious to the Evangelical as conceding too much. Let the religious teaching be taken out of the time-table, and a way out of the difficulty, which would do justice to the denominationalists whose schools are being taken over and no injustice to anyone else, might easily be found. Why should not the Catholic, the Churchman, and the Wesleyan be allowed then to teach his denominational formularies out of school hours every day if he wishes, in the school, urban or rural, which he has built, on condition that he gives facilities for such other alternative religious teaching as a sufficient number of the parents may desire? So, too, in the schools built by the local authority, let the right of entry be given, out of school hours, to denominationalists and undenominationalists, if they can secure sufficient authority from the parents. The denominationalist will be able to use, as payment for special teachers, the rent he receives for his schools.

In my opinion, too much satisfaction is being expressed about Clause 7, Section 2, which is supposed to give emancipation to the teacher from religious tests. It does nothing of the kind, whatever the intention may have been. It amazes me that no one, so far as I have seen, has yet pointed out that under this section there is nothing to prevent the managers, in appointing a teacher, from questioning him about his denomination or his faith. They are not allowed to require him "to subscribe to any religious creed," but that is far from enough. This is not a usual method of procedure now. We know how much theological teaching has been admitted into the schools on the plea that it is not a denominational formulary, since it is common to several denominations; and even the Apostles' Creed is held to be permissible for this reason. In like manner, unless this clause is considerably modified, it will be very easy for managers to evade its spirit and apply a test after all.*

Moreover, as the training colleges are left alone by this Bill, though they are mainly supported by public funds, and most of them impose ecclesiastical and theological tests for admission, it is idle to talk about the teachers being emancipated. The tests are, and will be, actually applied in the majority of cases before a candidate can become a qualified teacher. And have I not seen how easy it is for sectarian managers to secure the kind of teacher they want by noting which college he has been trained at—though I have also known some amusing mistakes made in this way.

As regards the Conscience Clause, it has been a dead letter hitherto, and was likely to be, if it meant that the poor little child of an objecting parent was to be separately instructed on some secular subject while the religious teaching was being given to the rest of the children. Lord Londonderry, however, on behalf of the late Government, introduced a model by-law which gave the option to a parent of keeping his child away from school during the time of religious instruction. This change has not been sufficiently appreciated or known. The present Government, however, give effect to it in the Bill in Clause 6. As it now stands, it is a bona fide Conscience Clause, and there is no reason in the world why a parent should send his child to be taught a religion of which he disapproves. Some, however, have been shrewd enough to see that, if attendance at school during the hours of religious instruction is not obligatory, it will not be long before none is required. I hope the Government will not yield to any pressure on this point, as it would stultify the Conscience Clause, make it as inoperative as heretofore, and

* The foregoing sentences were written before one of the shrewdest Parliamentarians, Mr. Balfour, put his finger on this weak spot and asked Mr. Birrell whether this section excluded, or was intended to exclude inquiries as to the fitness of the teachers to give the religious instruction given under the Bill. The reply was that no restraint is intended to be placed on the local education authority in satisfying itself that its teachers who undertake to give religious instruction are not unqualified for doing so. That being so, what becomes of the freedom from tests? No teacher is compelled to give religious instruction; but the local authority may, and generally will, decide that religious instruction shall be given; it must be given by the teacher; some teachers must therefore be found who are willing to give it; and any teacher may be questioned as to his fitness to give it. This is the absurd maze to which the establishment of undenominationalism leads us.

This Bill, if it passes in anything like its present form, will not be a final settlement of the religious problem: You may delay for a while longer the dissociation of the State from religious instruction, but it is bound to come, for religion is too personal and sacred a province for the intrusion of State machinery: No doubt it is to the interest of the State that a grounding in the principles of morality should be given in every one of its schools; but this can be done without the importation of theology or the use of the Bible. If Unitarians had the drafting of the syllabus of Biblical teaching, I daresay they might be trusted to confine it to such helpful passages as "the 23rd Psalm, the Beatitudes, and St. Paul's sermon on Charity"; but what would the High Churchman and the Catholic say to this as an adequate representation of Christianity? Any kind of a compromise will give as much reasonable excuse for passive resisters as there ever was. As for the parents, the great mass of them are utterly indifferent about the religious instruction of their children; they themselves avoid the churches and chapels as though they were fever hospitals. Mr. Gladstone was right in 1870, and the nation will still have to come round to his position: let the State avoid responsibility for religious teaching in the schools, but give the right of entry to the denominations:

C. J. STREET.

EDUCATION: SECULAR OR RELIGIOUS.

SIR,—In his Oxford address on "The Ideal of a Church" (INQUIRER, of April 28), I recognised my friend Mr. Gow at his best in this terse and profound aphorism:—A Greatest Common Measure is not an Ideal; it is a residuum. In your last issue I find an article over his signature and under the above heading, which I cannot easily reconcile with the truth so admirably expressed.

His surmise is probably correct that not many of those who voted at the National Conference for secular education in the State schools can have regarded it as a positive ideal to be welcomed with gladness. Certainly I do not, though I should have voted for it had I been there. But the puzzle is, how those who "believe in the ideal" can willingly tolerate for a moment, can even welcome as a step in the right direction, a form of Biblical teaching which is nothing but a Greatest Common Measure, and not even that correctly applied, seeing that the views of those only are taken into account to whom the whole of modern criticism is a sealed book. It is a "residuum," not of the ideas common to all the ratepayers at whose expense it is to be given, but only of the ideas common to the less instructed majority. For instance, I read on the very same day in my Daily Chronicle some "samples of questions" set at the annual

"Write from Isaiah the passage beginning, 'Behold my servant,' down to 'consider.'" There is surely some mistake on the part of reporter or printer as regards the word given at the end of the passage; but, be that as it may, the answer evidently expected is that indicated by the head lines prefixed to Isa. xlii. in the Authorised Version, namely, that the reference is to Jesus Christ, whereas most of your readers must know quite well that it is nothing of the kind. If this is the sort of foundation on which the Unitarian (or, as Mr. Gow would say, the Free Catholic) is to build in the Sunday school, or in the two week-day half-hours left at his disposal by the Act, the time will barely suffice for the necessary work of taking up and relaying it, and there will be none left for building on it. Meanwhile, the practical lessons impressed on every certificated teacher will be, that if he has any regard for his worldly advancement the very worst thing he can do is to study his Bible conscientiously with the aid of the best modern helps. If he teaches according to his knowledge he will be a marked man; and he will be equally a marked man if he avails himself of clause 7 (2) of the Act and declines to give any religious instruction.

Once more, it is not because we Voluntarists cherish lower educational ideals, nor because we have less faith in human nature, but because reason and experience assure us that human nature will show itself at its worst and vilest in coerced, and at its best in uncoerced, association; because, the more sacred and delicate the subject-matter, the more fatally is it injured by the coarse manipulation of politicians, that we vote in the present crisis for the purely secular solution, not as intrinsically good, but as the least bad of the alternatives just now within the range of practical politics. The very fact that such an education is obviously incomplete, and that it must therefore involve (whatever may be thought or said to the contrary at the present moment) a corresponding curtailment of the time-table, thus affording wider scope for the influences of the home and the church, is to us its chief recommendation. It sets up a barrier behind which free associations, with well-defined ideals, may in time gather strength for the rescue of another, and yet another, educational province from the dull domination of the Rule of the Greatest Common Measure.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

OXFORD SUMMER SESSION FOR SUNDAY SCHOOL TEACHERS.

SIR,—Will you allow me space to call attention to the Session for Sunday School teachers to be held at Manchester College, Oxford, from Friday, June 29 to Saturday, July 7.

The arrangements have now all been made, and a complete programme of the lectures and proceedings will be sent out to the school correspondents next week.

It is to be hoped that very many schools will take advantage of this course of instruction, and be represented by a delegate who, on returning, will bring back some of the fruits—instruction, enthusiasm, devotion—gathered during his short stay at Oxford.

I would remind students who attended the last gathering that they passed with acclamation a resolution pledging themselves to make known at their various centres the advantages to be derived from these Sessions, and to induce as many as possible to take part in the next one. If each one will do his best in this direction the Session for 1906 will be as successful and as good as any of the previous ones.

DR. MARTINEAU'S VIEW OF MATTER.

SIR,—I am much obliged to Dr. Rashdall for his reply to my letter. His point is that if you accept Martineau's identification of Causality with Will, "Matter considered as something apart from Mind must be regarded as an inert thing, essentially distinguishable from, and not necessarily endowed with, force or energy." My point is that Martineau did not consider Matter apart from Mind. Dr. Rashdall says it is not a question of evidence but of inference, and admits that Martineau would probably have repudiated his inferences. Dr. Rashdall's quotation does not show that Martineau would have accepted the premises. It is from a chapter where Martineau is not dealing with the problem of Matter, but with teleological theism; he says that his argument permits though it does not oblige us to regard Matter as created out of nothing. He points out that the assumption of an elementary matter carries with it difficulties, and only notes that it relieves the difficulty of regarding the problem of the world as gratuitously made. He certainly does not here accept any such theory of Matter as an essential feature in his theory of Causation. Of a somewhat different character is the passage I quoted, giving a distinct preference to the view which "assuming only space which can do nothing, and Mind which can do everything excludes all controversy between two self-existences, and leaves the total Causality with God." In this chapter he is directly dealing with Matter and Causality, and I venture to think we should regard this as the authoritative expression of his latest views.

I seem to recollect, though I cannot verify the recollection from his published works, that he taught his students a theory of Matter which regarded it as ultimately consisting of points in space which are centres of force, and thus, apart from Time, all things are reduced ultimately to Space, plus force which is itself ultimately Mind plus all other forms of Mind. Certainly, in some of Martineau's earlier lectures, he drew a distinction between the primary and the secondary attributes of Matter which he afterwards abandoned; and altogether I believe Dr. Rashdall may count him, as well as Berkeley, as an ally, not as an opponent in the main contention which was set before us so powerfully at our Oxford Conference.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

"What is really wanted is not the expulsion of religious doctrine, but the formulation of a body of doctrine fitted to contain those ideas of religion which are vital among us, and to present them in a form which shall be suited to modern ways of thought."—

PERCY GARDNER.

I.—SCIENCE AND RELIGION.

SCIENCE is knowledge systematised, knowledge reduced to order. Physical science deals with those phenomena which can be brought under observation and experiment, those appearances which lie within the range of the senses. It deals with the effects of force acting upon matter; it does not profess to be able to account either for force or for matter. Similarly with life; the forms and manifestations of life it studies and classifies; life itself and the origin of life it leaves unexplained. So, too, with regard to the phenomena of mind; it marks the physical changes which accompany mental activities; it does not pretend to show how material changes pass into non-material activities—how vibrations of nerves and rearrangements of atoms become thought, feeling, will.

Nor is natural science able to do more than give a very imperfect account of natural law. Law is an observed regularity in the sequence of phenomena; a convenient name for generalisation founded upon experience; a statement of the way in which things may be expected to happen. But regularity of sequence in the happening of things cannot itself be that which makes them happen. To say that the universe is governed by its laws is as much as to say that a clock is governed by its regulated movement. What makes the movement before it is regulated? Law is not itself a motive power, and throws no light on causation.

Nor does science claim acquaintance with more than a limited number of laws. There is every reason for thinking that there are processes in nature so subtle as to escape detection, and, if we know nothing of the processes, we can affirm nothing of the laws by which they are directed.

The materialism which assumes that matter exists of itself, is dead or living of itself, and involves in itself all the possibilities of life, from the lowest form to the highest—that blind force has by mere persistence, without directive intelligence, produced every observed result—is in the highest degree unscientific, for it goes beyond the assumptions of science.

From science proper religion has nothing to fear, for religion is concerned with realities distinct from those which come within the field of the senses. Science and religion lie in separate spheres.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

CHILDREN'S FLOWER FUND:

SOME of you, I daresay, already know about this Flower Fund, but I want to tell the others. It is for sending boxes of wild flowers regularly to the children in London schools.

The plan is for children who live in the country or in country towns, where they can easily get plenty of wild flowers, to undertake to send boxes of flowers regularly, at least once a fortnight, to the children in some London school. A good many country schools are now doing this, but more are wanted to help in this good and pleasant work.

Think how much pleasure it must give to the children who live in crowded parts of London, often in very poor and miserable houses, with miles and miles of town all round them, to have these boxes of flowers coming in fresh from the country once every week or once a fortnight, and how they must look forward to "flower morning," when the box arrives and is unpacked. Sometimes the children in a country school who do this, write letters to the children in the London school, and the town children write letters back, so that they get to be quite friends, and it is all the more pleasure to both of them.

In the year 1902 there were 738 boxes of flowers sent by those who joined in this work, but next year only 663, because there were not so many to help, and in 1904 there were 667. How many were sent last year I have not heard, but certainly more helpers are wanted.

It is very nice when the children in a country school agree to do this, and they enjoy doing it, I expect, quite as much as the London children enjoy having the flowers. But the children in any of our country Sunday schools might very well take up the work (or shall we call it play, or pleasure?) if one of the teachers would see to the arrangements; or the children of two or three families who live near together might do it, or even the children of one family living in the country. It would be a good piece of guild work, too. But they ought not to undertake to do it unless they feel that they can keep up sending the boxes regularly during the school terms.

Anyone who would like to do this, or wants to know about the work, should write to Miss M. S. Beard, 20, Christ Church-road, Hampstead, London, N.W., who will be glad to tell you all about it, and send a paper of directions as to the packing and sending of the flowers.

Tin boxes are best, and biscuit tins (7 lb. to 2 lb.) do very well, and if you send a stamped and addressed label the box can be sent back each time. The Flower Fund will pay the expenses of sending the boxes, but of course where schools or families can afford the expense themselves it is all the better: While the children are asked to gather and send the flowers, those who cannot do this can also help by subscribing to the fund.

The object of the fund is to show the children wild flowers, but when these cannot be obtained garden flowers may be substituted. Leaves and flowers of trees—and in the autumn, berries and nuts—are most acceptable to the schools. As large a quantity as possible of one kind of flower should be sent whenever any particular flower is plentiful (e.g., cowslips and blue-bells in many parts of the country): When several species are included in one box, or anything uncommon is sent, the teachers are glad to have the names enclosed. In packing, it should be remembered that it is hardly possible to fill the boxes too full: It very rarely hurts flowers to be packed tight, but to be shaken about in the box is fatal to them: If there is time, they should be put in water for a short time before packing: Small flowers (primroses, violets, &c.), should be tied in bunches. A little damp moss round the stalks helps to keep the flowers fresh. Shells, and other natural objects may also be sent in addition to, or occasionally instead of, flowers.

Here is a list of wild flowers, &c., arranged according to the months in which they are most generally to be found, which may be of use to flower-senders. The list has been made as full as possible, so as to be applicable to different parts of the country, and each sender will, of course, make selections from it according to the neighbourhood in which she or he lives:

LONDON, MAY 19, 1906.

AFTER ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTY YEARS.

THE celebration last Sunday and Monday of the hundred and fiftieth anniversary of the opening of the Octagon Chapel at Norwich recalled some of the greatest memories in the history of our religious fellowship. Two classic utterances within its walls, of the loftiest and most catholic Christian faith, separated the one from the other by a hundred years, mark the association of the names of JOHN TAYLOR and JAMES MARTINEAU with the chapel, and the history of the congregation goes still further back, even to the earliest days of toleration. The Rev. ALFRED HALL, the present minister, rightly recalled at Monday's celebration the name of PETER FINCH, who was minister of the Norwich congregation in its earlier chapel for sixty years, and died in the year in which they began to build the Octagon: The son of an ejected minister, he was the first of RICHARD FRANKLAND's pupils at Rathmel, and thus stood at the beginning of the great tradition of our free schools of theology, now represented by Manchester College at Oxford. PETER FINCH was an earnest minister, characterised above all things by the spirit of true Christian charity which animated his life. There is a saying of his which is cherished among the best traditions of the Octagon: "Follow Peace. No point any party among you may possibly gain can be an equivalent for the loss of peace and concord."

The great words of Dr. JOHN TAYLOR in his sermon at the opening of the chapel in 1756 are well known: "We are Christians and only Christians. . . . Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Independents, Baptists, Calvinists, Arminians, Arians, Trinitarians, and others, are names of religious distinctions. But, however we may commonly be ranked under any of these divisions, we reject them all. We disown all connection excepting that of love and goodwill, with any sect or party whatsoever. We are a society built and established, not upon any human foundation, but only upon the foundation of the Prophets and Apostles, of which JESUS CHRIST is the chief corner-stone. We are Christians, and only Christians; and we consider all our fellow Protestants, of every denomination, in the same light—only as Christians—and cordially embrace them all in affection and charity as such. . . . We refuse communion upon the same Catholic foundation with none of them."

Dr. MARTINEAU's sermon at the centenary, on Whit Sunday, 1856, was in the same spirit. It is reprinted among his collected Essays and Addresses, the sermon on "One Gospel in many dialects." "For myself," he said, "I indulge the joyful hope that the next century of Christendom will be nobler than the last; that the great Faiths which have struggled separately into the light of the one will flow together on the broader and less broken surface of the other. . . . Depend upon it, Unity lies in profounder strata of our nature than any tillage of the mere intellect can reach. Sink deeply into the inmost life of any Christian faith, and you will touch the ground of all. Did we do nothing with our religion except live by it; did we forget the presence of doubt and contradiction; did it cease to be a creed about God, and become simply an existence in God; did we exchange self-assertion before men for self-surrender to Him,—we should find ourselves side by side with unexpected friends; should be astonished at our petulant divisions; and replace the poor charity of mutual forbearance by the free consciousness of inward sympathy."

In such words, and the ideal of religious life and fellowship which they represent, the congregation of the Octagon Chapel has a great heritage, in which we may all thankfully claim a part.

Our readers will remember that on April 21 we wrote of the Martineau Centenary Memorial to be erected at Norwich, and noted that of the sum required there was still £1,600 to be raised. The hope that we then expressed that the celebration of the 150th anniversary of the Octagon Chapel might be rendered memorable by the announcement that the whole amount had been given was not realised. We learn, indeed, that including Mrs. RUSSELL MARTINEAU's generous promise of a further gift of £100, some £360 towards the balance has been secured, but we must still look with hope deferred for the adequate completion of the fund. Perhaps when the foundation-stone is laid, early next year, we shall be able to announce that it is accomplished. A first sketch of the proposed Memorial by Mr. H. Chatfield Clarke, promises a building thoroughly in keeping with the fine old chapel, and admirably adapted to the purposes to which it will be devoted.

THE OCTAGON CHAPEL, NORWICH.

ONE HUNDRED AND FIFTIETH ANNIVERSARY.

FIFTY years ago, on Whit-Sunday, May 11, 1856, the centenary of the opening of the Octagon Chapel at Norwich by Dr. John Taylor was celebrated. The preacher at the morning service was the venerable Thomas Madge of Essex-street Chapel, London, who had formerly been minister of the Octagon; the evening preacher was James Martineau, minister of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, who thus returned to his native city and to the chapel with which his family had long been closely connected. On the following day, which was the actual anniversary of the opening of the chapel, on May 12, 1756, the celebration was continued by a dinner, mid-day, at which a great-grandson and namesake of Dr. John Taylor presided, and an evening meeting, at which the Rev. David Davis, who was then minister of the Octagon, was in the chair, and addresses were given by the Revs. James Martineau, John James Tayler, Thomas Madge, Edward Tagart, J. H. Hutton, Charles Robberds and Mr. John Withers Dowson.

Last Sunday, May 13, the Octagon congregation celebrated the 150th anniversary of the opening of their chapel. The preacher, morning and evening, was the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, of Gee Cross, who was at school in Norwich with his uncle, John Withers Dowson, and was present at the centenary in 1856. The service in the morning was conducted by the Rev. Alfred Hall, present minister of the chapel, and the lessons were read by the Rev. V. D. Davis, whose father was the minister in 1856. In the evening Mr. Davis took the service, and Mr. Hall read the lessons. There was an afternoon service for the children also, at which Mr. Hall gave an address.

THE COMMEMORATION SERMON.

Mr. Dowson's morning sermon was from the text, I Kings viii. 57, 58: "The Lord our God be with us, as He was with our fathers: let Him not leave us, nor forsake us; that we may incline our hearts unto Him, to walk in all His ways, and to keep His commandments, and His statutes, and His judgments which He commanded our fathers." It was devoted chiefly to the memory of the ministers and other friends whom he had known at the Octagon in early days and at the time of the centenary.

Coming there, he said, he returned to the religious home of his boyhood, to which he owed more than he could tell, which had given him his call to the ministry, which for forty-three years had been the joy of his life. Ever since he entered the house of his uncle, John Withers Dowson, as a schoolboy nearly sixty years ago, the Octagon had been to him one of the dearest spots on earth. There he saw and heard for the first time the great son of the Octagon, James Martineau, when he preached at the centenary that inspiring sermon on "One Gospel in Many Dialects." "Who am I," said the preacher, "to venture to stand where he stood? I can only answer, I have nothing to bring here but my affection, a pilgrim's love of the shrine sacred to him." And he went on to say that he should speak not of the hundred years which the centenary commemorated, but of the last fifty years, and not of the ministers alone, but of numbers of dear old friends, who breathed about his boyhood an atmosphere like the breath of heaven.

Great changes had come over their modes of thought during those fifty years. They no longer held the views their fathers held on the authority of Scripture, or of miracle; what remained with them was the true spirit of Christian discipleship. What an inspiring voice was that of Joseph Crompton, who had been a true friend to him and by many an utterance carried his soul away into realms of high thought and feeling—a disciple of that grand prophetic soul, Frederick Denison Maurice, whom it had been his privilege also to know later in London. Joseph Crompton overleapt all sectarian bounds in a spirit akin to that which breathed in the Centenary sermon of Dr. Martineau and in that of the founder of the Octagon, Dr. John Taylor—a spirit which sounded also the keynote of their own religious life to-day. Another beautiful and truly Catholic spirit was that of Joseph Henry Hutton, son of the venerable Dr. Hutton, whose services at Carter-lane he had attended. Nor should he ever forget the true Christian gentleman, whose son was with them that day, fitly taking part in that service, David Davis, with his much loved wife, who maintained the high and pure religious tone of Christian charity, which marked the Octagon fifty years ago. Of John Withers Dowson he had an opportunity before of speaking, but must again recall his memory. To have lived with him, as he did as a boy, was in itself a religious education. In him religion spoke in every word and look, its spirit permeated all his waking hours. He spoke also of Mrs. Withers Dowson, who was a second mother to him, and a granddaughter of Dr. William Enfield, and of Travers Madge, who lived with the Dowsons, two of the most beautiful religious souls he had ever known. Travers was a saint upon earth. When he saw him in his bright youth and heard him preach, face and voice were to him like an angel's; the light of God seem to shine in his look. Many others there were, whom he would have been glad to recall, but he could only mention two other names, of young men who owed a great deal to his uncle's influence, Charles Corkran, who afterwards did such splendid work in the London Domestic Mission, and Mark Wade, who also went to London and carried the enthusiasm for Sunday-schools which he had gained at the Octagon to all parts of the country. In such lives they saw the true spirit of Christian service and discipleship, and he prayed for the congregation and their young minister, who had so noble an inheritance in the Octagon, that they might be worthy of it, and have the same devout spirit, in communion with one another, with Christ, and with God.

The lessons at the morning service were Psalm lxxxiv. and 1 Cor. iii. The hymn before the sermon was William Enfield's "Behold, where in a mortal form," and at the end, Watts's "O God, our help in ages past." The other two were Luther's hymn "A mighty stronghold is our God," and a special Octagon hymn "Blessed Sabbath of the Lord," by John Taylor, grandson of the first minister.

The evening service opened with T. H. Gill's hymn. "We come unto our father's God." The others were Martineau's "Where is your God? they say," Blatchford's "Within this temple reared of old," and a closing hymn by John Withers Dowson, of which this is the first verse:—

Now at the Sabbath evening's close
O Father, ere we seek repose
Accept our heartfelt praise,
For rest and peace and holy joy,
For all the means thou dost employ,
To bless this day of days.

The sermon was from John xiv. 6, "I am the way, the truth, and the life," and was an exposition of the religion of Jesus and the Unitarian conception of his life and character.

MONDAY'S COMMEMORATION.

A number of friends had tea together on Monday evening in the large room of the Octagon Institute, which demonstrated to the visitors what the congregation well know, how sorely they need that better accommodation for social gatherings, as well as for school and other work, which the Martineau Memorial buildings are to supply.

Later in the evening a public meeting was held in the chapel, and was well attended. Mr. G. A. King, chairman of the congregation, presided. Among those present, in addition to the speakers, were the Rev. Jabez King (President of the Free Methodist Conference of England and Wales), the Rev. Lucking Tavener (of Ipswich), and Mr. B. E. Scarles (President of the Norfolk Congregational Union).

The meeting opened with the singing of Emerson's hymn, "We love the venerable house," and prayer by the Rev. Alfred Hall.

The CHAIRMAN said it was difficult for them to realise what the life of their fathers was a hundred and fifty years ago, when the Octagon was built, and in the meeting-house before that; but they had in that chapel no mean outward presentment of the effort after truth, beauty, and endurance which characterised the people of that time. Especially was that so on the intellectual and spiritual side, and it was something very appropriate that the beauty of that place was an inward beauty. It did not appeal to them on the outside, but when they came within. So the teaching given there during those 150 years had never so much appealed to men from the outward presentation of it, as by its inward force appealing to their intellect, and the better part of them. It had met the spiritual need of the time among a certain order of mind.

While that chapel was being built and for years afterwards there was in England that great religious revival associated with the names of the Wesleys and Whitefield, which had made a lasting impression on the life of the people to the present time, a great moral uplifting, an impetus to the forward march of man. Yet at the same time the movement inaugurated in that chapel was part of the great intellectual and spiritual movement, [which had its expression in the liberal thought of to-day. Looking at the dates of the opening of the chapel in 1756, of the centenary and that 150th anniversary, they marked periods in their life as a people, not in that chapel alone, but in their life as Englishmen. Each period indicated a new social movement. About 1756 there was undoubtedly developing a new social movement marked by the discovery of the use of steam and the invention of machinery for spinning, a great intellectual and also a social advance. Then 1856 was marked by the rejoicings (as he well remembered as a child) over the treaty of peace after the Russian War, and the hopes which the Great Exhibition of 1851 had kindled for social peace and advancement. And now at the end of another fifty years they were surely face to face with as great a crisis in English history, a great intellectual advance and social upheaval. There was a marked change in the attitude of the churches towards social movements, so great that it seemed the advance of 150 rather than only of 50 years they had witnessed.

Those who built that chapel stood for truth, beauty, and endurance in matters of the spiritual life. It was for the worship of God, in the footsteps of the teaching of Jesus Christ, not fettered by dogma but in the simple faith expressed in the formula, the Fatherhood of God and brotherhood of man. That confession was undoubtedly renewed in 1856, by those who at that time took their part in social and civic work in the city. And now they must ask themselves what influence their belief had on the city and the nation of which they were a part. There were wrongs to be righted, social injustices to be swept away, and people asked of them, Where is your Church? They must carry on their worship in the simplicity of John Taylor, true to the ideals that had come to them from their fathers and those revealed by the Spirit of God. The religious life fostered there by weekly worship must be such that they felt it not to be alone, circumscribed by that single duty of the worship of God, but with the larger duty, to go and do their best in the world. The very fact of their worshipping there must reveal to them the things that were unjust, and gain for them a nobler moral atmosphere, in which they would believe altogether in the brotherhood of men.

The Rev. F. K. FREESTON, in a very interesting address, spoke of the general movement, of which the history of the Octagon Chapel was a part, and of the great value of a knowledge of that history, especially to their young people, for a true understanding of their faith. Mr. Freeston in this part of his address followed the lines of his "message to Guild members" which will be found in another column. He said they wanted a popular revised edition of Calamy's history of the ejected ministers, and referred to the great interest of the Bunhill Fields burial ground, which Southey called the Campo Santo of Nonconformity, as helping them to realise their heritage. Some thirty or forty of the ejected, refused interment in the city churches, were there buried, and there were the graves of Bunyan, Defoe, George Fox, Owen, Evelyn, Lindsey, Belsham, Price, Lardner, and Kippis; and many others. There Presbyterian, Independent, Baptist, Quaker were at peace side by side, and they could realise the greatness of their history. Why was it of such interest? And why ought they to take such pains to bring it before their young people? What did they owe to the ejected? They had secured liberty of conscience as against the demand for uniformity and ecclesiastical authority. It was a very precious principle, and the classic enunciation of it was in Dr. Taylor's sermon at the opening of the Octagon. Another parallel utterance he quoted from William Turner, of Newcastle-on-Tyne, expressive of the broadest and most catholic religious sympathy. And, further, they secured the right of private judgment and free inquiry, as against the thought of theological orthodoxy, and so led on to the new period of reconciliation, in which they found their present duty to look for the underlying meaning in the various doctrines of the churches and help to bring about a true Holy Catholic Church.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON having told of the happiness with which he had that day revisited Geldeston, the village from which John Withers Dowson came, and his own birthplace, spoke of the great principle of freedom enshrined in their chapels, and what it had meant to him in his ministry. During the past fifty years there had been great changes in their views of religious truth, but what remained with them was the religion of Jesus, not received on authority, except that of the living conscience under the touch of the living God. That was the faith of their churches to-day. He then spoke of the social aspirations of the time and of himself as a Christian socialist, and took the opportunity of explaining why, to his great regret, he had not been able to sign the appeal on the duty of our churches in the matter of social work, promoted by Miss Gittins. The real work of the minister, he was convinced, was in the pulpit as the inspirer of his people, to go out from the Sunday worship to enter with their brothers and sisters of all churches into work for the good of humanity. He hated sectarianism and divisions, and if in a common cause under the spirit of Christ he could hold out a hand of fellowship that they might work together, he would rather do that than work simply with the members of their own church. Their churches with all other churches of the land must help to make good citizens, fellow-citizens. The churches must forget themselves in the service of the Kingdom of God. Churches might rise and fall, but to bring nearer the Kingdom of God was something greater than them all.

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS also spoke as a child of the Octagon, having been christened on that centenary Whit-Sunday after the morning service. His father was minister of the chapel at that time, and they would understand how deeply he felt that occasion, and the references which had been made to his father's work, and to his mother. He quoted from the INQUIRER report of the dinner on May 12, 1856, a passage from Dr. Martineau's speech, in which he said that their religious liberties were for the most part secured through the hard-fought battles of their forefathers, and now it was for them to go on to the practical application and throw themselves into work for the improvement of their neighbourhood and city. So they would find themselves drawn nearer and nearer to their fellow Christians of other denominations. And after fifty years that was still their aim. His father at the Centenary dinner had acknowledged that he felt unworthy to stand in the Octagon pulpit, in succession to the distinguished men who had been before him, but found comfort in the thought that there was a new spirit of common work, which united minister and congregation together in self-forgetting service. In that spirit the Octagon congregation and their minister were now united, and they were looking forward to entering before long upon larger opportunities of service in the Martineau Memorial buildings. That memorial would stand not simply as a memory of the past, but as a new impulse to greater faithfulness in work for the welfare of their people, and in that they would surely find the Divine blessing.

Mr. JAMES MOTTRAM, whose family has been connected with the congregation from the very first (John Mottram was one of those who took part in the conveyance of the land and the building of the original chapel in 1687), then moved:—"This meeting of members of the congregation worshipping in the Octagon Chapel heartily thanks the Revs. H. Enfield Dowson, F. K. Freeston, and V. D. Davis for their inspiring addresses, so ably reminding them of the worthy traditions connected with this place, which was erected and dedicated to the Worship of Almighty God and fettered by no theological trust. They rejoice in their inheritance, and pray that those great principles which characterised the faith of the founders of this Meeting-house, the 150th anniversary of which they have met to celebrate, may be held sacred by them, and passed on to future generations, a most cherished possession." Mr. Mottram said that had there been time he might have recalled many old memories, and, referring to the present controversy on the subject of religious teaching, he spoke of the old bequest of Joanna Scott in connection with the Octagon, and the system of scholarships under which no inquiry might be made as to the religious beliefs of the parents or the children who benefited.

Mr. W. H. SCOTT seconded, and said they must be grateful for that inspiring celebration. Every congregation had its ups and downs, and he believed they were now going to have their ups. The Martineau Memorial was assured, and they would have the means of doing better work, which was essential to success.

The Rev. ALFRED HALL supported the resolution, and said that in looking back on the long line of their ministers, while he also might well feel unworthy to follow such men, he was thankful to know there had been two types of minister—those who had been known for literary power, scholarship, and intellectual force, and those who had done no less valuable work in the city and congregation, whose only claim to minister there was that of simple, unassuming Christian character. Such a man was Peter Finch, who was minister for sixty years at the time when that congregation was being built up, and who died two years before the Octagon was opened. He also recalled the memories of Samuel Bourne and Edward Crane as part of their heritage. They might claim in that celebration that they were true to the spirit of John Taylor and James Martineau, and recognised the duty of which Mr. Freeston had spoken, of being reconcilers. They pleaded for toleration, but the toleration of enthusiasm, not of indifference. He was thankful to the speakers, and felt that it, had been an inspiring time.

The resolution having been passed, Dr. Savage's hymn, "Up the pathway of the ages," was sung, and Mr. Dowson pronounced the Benediction.

ATTERCLIFFE SCHOOL-CHURCH.

OPENING SERVICE AND MEETING.

THE new school-church built for the Unitarian congregation at Attercliffe, Sheffield, was opened on Thursday afternoon, May 10, by Mrs. Ceredig Jones, of Bradford. The building, which is in Shirland-lane, a few yards from Attercliffe-road, includes a hall, 40 ft. by 30 ft., with two classrooms, each 16 ft. square, and the whole, by means of sliding screens, can be thrown into one for large meetings. There is also room on the land acquired for a further church building, when the time comes. The cost, including the land, is £1,828.

At the opening ceremony, Mr. M. J. Hunter, the chairman of the trustees, handed a silver key to Mrs. Ceredig Jones, with which she opened the door; and the Rev. H. Dawtrey, the assistant minister at Upper Chapel, who has charge of the mission, offered prayer. The assembly then entered the building, which was well filled, and Mrs. CEREDIG JONES gave the opening address.

They had gathered, she said, to celebrate an important event. The opening of the school-church was to them a cause for thankfulness. As they looked into the past they felt thankful that the labour of many months had been at length brought to completion, and that God had blessed the work. They looked with thankfulness towards the future, because they felt that this was not the end, but the beginning of a still greater work. It was a day of rejoicing, because it was a day of fulfilment; it was a day of hope because it was a day of promise. Again, it was a day of rejoicing because one more church had been erected for worship and for work. For did not every church stand as a witness to the truth of the higher things in life? It stood as an outward symbol of the belief in spiritual things in an age of materialism. It stood for the pursuit of righteousness, and as a protest against being content to follow expediency; it stood for the belief in the nobility of man, which must conquer his baseness; it stood for hope in spite of the pessimism which sometimes surrounded us. That day saw the fulfilment of many hopes and plans, the completion of much labour and many strivings. But it was also a day of hope because they looked forward almost more than they looked back. They looked on all that had been accomplished in the building of the place chiefly as a happy augury of what might be done in the future. The church building was now finished; the church life was about to begin. There had been needed to complete the church building thought, skill, painstaking care, the hopefulness to plan, the courage to attempt, the perseverance to overcome difficulties, the self-denial not of the few only but of the many; there had been a union among the workers to carry the whole to so successful an issue. And were not the same gifts needed in the future: hope, courage, perseverance, self-sacrifice, union for work—these were the foundations of all true church life. They came to dedicate the building as a house of God, to dedicate it to God's service for worship and for work; and might not this be a symbol of the dedication required of each one of them—the dedication of the individual soul to the service of his Father. Her prayer was that the worship in that church might be very real and true, and that nothing unworthy would come into the life of the church, that jealousy and evil-speaking might be unknown among its members, but that a desire for the common good and burning love of service would animate all its workers and helpers; that the words spoken there might guide and inspire the young, comfort the sorrowing, rouse the sinner to repentance and give him hope of the possibility of a nobler life; cheer those on whom life had imposed heavy burdens, and hold up to all the highest ideals. Then would it, in truth, be a house of God.

Service was conducted by the Rev. E. CEREDIG JONES, of Bradford, and the sermon was preached (in the regrettable absence through illness of the Rev. Charles Hargrove) by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, of Wandsworth.

The sun shone that day, Mr. Tarrant said in the course of his sermon, but he had seen the sky over Attercliffe darkened by a pall of black cloud of smoke that made one wonder if it was possible that people could exist there in those homes; but a far greater cloud, a more awful cloud, overhung the lives of many people; it was the cloud that came into human lives from drunkenness, viciousness, ignorance, and such things. It should be the aim of those connected with the church to bring about in every way possible harmony in human lives; to render less possible those disasters that ruined not only individual lives, but homes. How was that aim to be fulfilled? Surely by the imparting of knowledge. They must get the people around them to realise the great principles, and get them to apply them to themselves and learn the simple rudiments of knowledge which enabled them to live amid the many trials that beset them. They must get people to have aspiration for higher things. They must bring about a divine discontent in the hearts of men and an aspiration towards the infinite.

After tea, to which about 150 sat down, a public meeting followed in the evening, and the spacious room was crowded, the Rev. C. J. Street presiding. Letters of apology were read from the Revs. William Blazeby, and Charles Hargrove.

The CHAIRMAN congratulated the Unitarians, not only of Attercliffe, but of Sheffield, on the most satisfactory completion of their task to which they had cheerfully and faithfully set their hands. He was full of pride and joy that day. The Upper Chapel congregation had responded splendidly to his appeal in the subscription list, to which there were over 150 contributors; the Upperthorpe congregation had rendered excellent assistance in the recent bazaar; and the Attercliffe Mission congregation, small as it was, had given of its substance and still more in work. For himself he did not deserve all the credit for this movement that was sometimes given to him. He had only watered, but his predecessor at Upper Chapel, Mr. Manning, and Mr. Ellis while he was at Upperthorpe, had done the planting. Might God give the increase, as He surely would if the people themselves were faithful to their high trust. As nearly as could be calculated the total cost of this enterprise was £1,828. This included not only the building and the furnishing, but the cost of freehold land, on which there was room to build a church at some future day when the present building might become the school; also the purchase of a supposed right of light and provision for the erection of a boundary wall to enclose the vacant land. Towards this amount there had been subscribed £1,455 11s., nearly all of which had been paid, including £250 from the Yorkshire Unitarian Union, and £50 from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association; the balance from the recent bazaar was £320; and the collection that day had realised £12 1s. 5d. This left about £40 short, but that would be met by a further generous contribution from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, the Committee having kindly promised to pay such proportion as might be needed of the last £50. This announcement, which came as a surprise to the audience, was received with great manifestation of delight, which was renewed when Mr. Street declared the new School-church opened free of debt. This was a splendid gift to Attercliffe—not merely to the Attercliffe Unitarians, but to the whole district, for their cause must be a missionary one, doing good service to the community around. He trusted that the congregation would carry on the work with as much zeal and determination as had been shown in the raising of the money for the building; that it would steadily increase in numbers and influence, and progress towards independence, so that the funds from Upper Chapel at present necessarily devoted to the maintenance of the ministry of the Mission congregation, might ere long be released and applied in some other part of the city.

Mr. A. J. HOBSON, J.P., in proposing a cordial vote of thanks to Mrs. Ceredig Jones for opening the new building, intimated that the Upper Chapel Trustees held the trust of the premises in such a way that as soon as the Attercliffe congregation was able to go alone, or nearly so, they could and gladly would hand it over to trustees appointed by the congregation. The trust deed was as free and open as that of Upper Chapel itself, though the congregation, properly enough, being Unitarian, had chosen to describe itself by that name. He also expressed the opinion that the work and the giving to which Mr. Street had called the Upper Chapel Congregation had done them as much good as they could do for Attercliffe.

The Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN seconded the resolution, and spoke of the happy relations which existed between the Sheffield congregations, not omitting to remind the audience of the Upperthorpe Jubilee scheme of removing their church to a more suitable neighbourhood. He thought Yorkshire was to be congratulated, as Mr. Jones himself must be, on the great accession of strength its Unitarianism had received in the personality of Mrs. Jones.

The resolution was heartily carried and Mrs. Jones made an appropriate acknowledgment.

A vote of thanks to Mr. Jones for conducting the service, and to Mr. Tarrant for preaching, was moved by Mr. H. R. BRAMLEY, who recalled the fact that his grandfather had presided over the meeting at the opening of the Upperthorpe school in 1860, and reminded the audience that the scheme for the erection of the Attercliffe building had only been decided upon at a meeting of the Upper Chapel congregation on February 20, 1905, so that a great deal had been done in a very short time.

The Rev. W. STEPHENS seconded, and the Rev. E. CEREDIG JONES spoke in response to the vote.

Mr. J. P. ROSS, treasurer of the Attercliffe congregation, moved a resolution of thanks to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association and the Yorkshire Unitarian Union for the support which they had given, and without which they could not have opened the premises free of debt. Little hope had he, two years ago, of their having a beautiful home of their own like this, but it was due to the energy and persistence of Mr. Street.

Mr. HAROLD FISHBURN, until recently secretary, seconded the resolution, which was heartily adopted.

Rev. W. G. TARRANT responded for the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in a humorous speech, and said that the Association spent so much money in helping disappointing causes that it was a pleasure to find their gifts so well applied, and so much appreciated as in this instance.

Rev. JOHN ELLIS recalled the early days of the movement, and, speaking for the Yorkshire Union, said the Committee, when they realised what good work was being done, and that there would be no appeal for subscriptions outside Sheffield except to the two associations, gladly made a substantial grant, and thought it money well spent. A vote of thanks to the painstaking architect, Mr. J. R. Wigfull, A.R.I.B.A. (himself one of the trustees), who had designed a building that gave satisfaction to everyone, and had watched over every detail of the work so carefully, and to the contractor, Mr. Freckingham, with his sub-contractors (including Mr. J. W. Steers and Mr. T. Rule, members of the Upper Chapel congregation), was proposed by Mr. GEORGE H. HUNT, treasurer of the Building Fund, and seconded by Mr. ROBERT SIMPSON. Mr. WIGFULL was most warmly received on rising to respond. A further vote of thanks to Mr. Street for presiding, and still more for all that he had done to bring about such a successful issue, was moved by the Rev. A. H. DOLPHIN, seconded by Mr. A. J. HOBSON, and Mr. STREET received a remarkable ovation on rising to respond. The choir, who sang two glees, and soloists, of whom the Rev. Henry Dawtrey was one, contributed to the enjoyment of a most interesting and happy day.

THE VAN MISSION.

THIS new Mission was opened on Monday evening, May 11, at Lymm, Cheshire. The van left the Home Missionary College, Manchester, in the morning, in charge of Mr. Bertram Talbot, who will travel with it until the end of the tour on September 30. Later in the day the missionaries for the week, the Revs. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale, and Chas. Peach, of Manchester, joined the van. At seven o'clock the first meeting was held at Lymm Cross. The Rev. T. P. Spedding opened the Mission with the hymn, "Come, let us join with faithful souls." The Rev. Harvey-Cook then took the position of chairman for the week. He brought with him a large contingent of singers from Warrington. There were also present the Revs. G. A. Payne, of Knutsford, and W. L. Schroeder, of Sale, who was accompanied by a large party of cyclists. On Tuesday evening these gentlemen were again the speakers, and addresses were also delivered by Mr. Flint, of Sale, and Mr. William Long, of Warrington, who spoke warmly in support of the movement, and in high appreciation of those who are determined upon its success. In addition to the three hymns for each evening—which were sung three times over—Mrs. Pearce, of Sale, gave a magnificent rendering of "The Better Land." The number of Unitarians from the surrounding district each evening would be from 50 to 70. The Lymm people were a little shy on the Monday, but about 70 of them were within hearing distance, most of them standing against the houses and shops on the opposite side of the little square. This, it was afterwards ascertained, is the invariable custom, even when orthodox religious services and missions are held. On the Tuesday night a little of the shyness had worn off, and much larger numbers were attracted. On this night, too, over 250 hymn papers were distributed at the meeting, and on both evenings large numbers of leaflets were given away. The attitude of the people has been particularly sympathetic, and the missionaries have found plenty of interest in the work and goodwill. Several inquiries have been made at the van during the day. The weather has been fine, but bitterly cold, and on Wednesday afternoon rain was falling so heavily that it was questionable whether a meeting could be held. The addresses have been marked by a fine spirit, and the missionaries are deeply indebted to the ministers and friends who have come out to join them. The presence of Mr. Long was greatly appreciated, and betokens something of that widespread interest in the movement of which the promoters have had constant evidence during the last few weeks.

The van will be in Prescott and Walton next week. To-morrow (Sunday) it returns from Earlstown to Warrington, in order that the Cairo-street friends may use it for two special services in their town.

THE MINISTERIAL FELLOWSHIP.

THE seventh annual meeting was held in the Memorial Hall, Manchester, on Monday, May 13, the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst, president, in the chair. There was a good attendance. Twelve new members were admitted, bringing the number on the roll up to 137. Resolutions were passed regretting the death of the Rev. Richard Lyttle, and sympathising the Revs. Professor Upton, E. W. Lummis, and Hugon S. Tayler in having been laid aside from work through illness.

The annual report and financial statement showed that the society had steadily progressed in membership every year since its foundation. Five members had during the year been in receipt of benefit while without ministerial charge; two additional grants had been voted from the auxiliary fund; and the balance in hand was £20 3s., besides investments which cost £398 7s. 3d. Satisfaction was expressed at the inclusion in the Year Book of information as to settlements in the various congregations for the past 25 years, in accordance with the request made by the Fellowship. In connection with the Settlements Bureau much useful work had been done, six settlements having been brought about in this way, and 18 ministers and 12 churches being at present on the books. Cordial thanks were voted to the officers for their services during the year. The Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter was appointed president; the treasurer (Rev. Dendy Agate) and secretary (Rev. C. J. Street) were re-elected. Mr. Street having signified his resolve to retire from the secretaryship of the Settlements Bureau, the Rev. J. Crowther Hirst was appointed to that office with every mark of confidence. Mr. Hirst and the Rev. A. H. Dolphin were elected to fill vacancies on the committee, and Mr. A. E. Piggot, F.S.A.A., and the Rev. W. R. Shanks were re-elected as auditors.

An open conference followed, chiefly on the subject of ministerial settlements, and suggestions thereon recently advanced. A prolonged discussion took place, every aspect of the question being considered. In the end it was unanimously resolved:—"That the members of the Ministerial Fellowship, in annual meeting assembled, having regard to the useful work already done by the Settlements Bureau, and to proposals that the National Conference should take over the work and apply its benefits to all the ministers on the roll of the Conference, hereby declare that it is clear that the work must, for the next three years, be carried on along its present lines and under the management of the Fellowship. Meanwhile, the committee is authorised to confer with the Conference Committee, if invited, and requested to report to the next annual meeting, or to a special meeting."

It was also resolved that the committee be instructed to consider the practicability of extending the membership of the Fellowship, so as to include for all purposes but benefit ministers so desiring at a smaller rate of subscription; and of holding each year an interim meeting of the Fellowship at some other centre than Manchester.

OUR FREE CHURCH HISTORY.*

BY THE REV. F. K. FREESTON.

WE are all of us, whatever our age, always facing two ways—to the future, and to the past. And the truest wisdom lies, both for ourselves and our churches, in understanding their related meaning, and in being faithful to their joint appeal.

Some persons, and some churches, cling to the past too much, praising alone a time that is gone, and hence taking little part in to-day's thought and work. Others make the opposite mistake, and are impatient with the old, call it dead and done with, and act as though the modern man could ignore everything that has gone before him, regarding the new as the only true. This is the time to rebuke such unwisdom. The past is still living, though the future is calling: the old is not dead, and the present is its child. To neglect either one and the relation between them is to call down confusion upon our thinking and our working. Dr. Martineau said once, "I cannot rest contentedly on the past: I cannot take a step towards the future without its support." There lies the truth: we must take it more to heart. And we must apply it to our church life. To the younger members of our churches, and to all our guilds, especially, may I therefore say:—

Know the Story of our Free Church History. Do not yield one inch to the scorn of the past, to the lack of the historic sense, to the pride of separateness, which attempt to pass for superior knowledge. Regard instead the religion of England in its various churches as a fine old oak with many branches, and with deep-set, broad-grasping roots. Each church may feel that its own branch is of most importance; but each branch should never forget that it also goes back for its life to the root. We must remember that we are truly a branch with a very living history, but also that we belong to the whole tree. Whenever, therefore, we speak of "our" churches we do not, or should not, mean ours as opposed to all others, or as lopped off from the rest, or as planted apart with a separate life, like a little shrub on its own account; but always as ours amongst others, our share in the common stock; our part in the whole movement, our branch of the old oak. Then we shall escape the sectarian spirit, and know how our churches have come about.

For we ought to know ourselves, and others will surely ask us, "What then exactly is your relation to the rest of the tree? Where about did you first branch off, and why? Why are you called Protestants, why Protestant Dissenters, why Non-Subscribing Protestant Dissenters?"

* The President's Message to Guild Members, in the Guilds' Union Year Book and Manual for 1906. Published by the Sunday School Association, Essex Hall, 2d.

Why do you call your churches Free Churches? Free from what? What is your form of Church government? Why do you worship in many cases in old chapels which were built by men holding different doctrines? What are Free Trusts? Why have you no collective creed or official statement of belief? In short, what is the meaning of your church and the reason of your faith?"

The reply lies in one sentence, but includes many others. The Reason of our faith is the knowledge of our growth. The answer to all these questions depends, not only on what we believe and think to-day, but on what our fathers and forefathers believed and did yesterday, in other words, upon our religious history. So that if we would make history ourselves, as we boast sometimes, we must realise first how history has made us. If we want to take a forward outlook, we must first glance back. Stand near the start of our movement: trace its development from point to point: get into touch with those whom it has inspired to great things. Read the records of its struggles, the archives of its early days, the biographies of its brave confessors, the productions of its scholars the dreams of its enthusiasts, the deeds of its saints. In other words, feel the force and impetus which have carried this movement onwards, and which, if true to itself, must now be stirring its inner life. Desire with all your heart that this movement may have its helpful part in the larger life of the world of thought, that it may make for that goal, the Church Universal, whose motto shall be, "In things essential unity, in things doubtful liberty, in all things charity." Realise that others, in different ways, but with the same ideal, are also contributing to that Church Universal. Make acquaintance with those who, outside our churches and labels, are accepting and applying the same liberal principles. For larger meanings, nobler interpretations of divine things, are all around us, some revealed to one mind, some to another's: the seeking and the finding which are always going on are the very breath of our being and the explanation of our position. The old is ever opening into new form and expression: but all the time the permanent things that do not change through the ages are appealing to us with the solemn voice of the past. We need then all the knowledge, all the helpfulness, all the reverence, which we can gain and others can give; we need to understand and to be understood. Therefore, let the New and the Old go hand in hand, the look forward and the look backward, the promise of the future with the remembrance of the past, the Christ that is to be with the Jesus of Galilee. Know the story of our Free Church History—and feel the movement of advancing Free Thought.

DIFFICULTIES are meant to rouse, not discourage; the human spirit is to grow strong by conflict.—Channing.

THE LAYMEN'S CLUB.—Members are requested to note that the dinner on Wednesday next, the 23rd inst., with which the annual meeting is associated, is at the Inns of Court Hotel, at 7 for 7.30 o'clock.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Blackpool: South—Shore.—Anniversary services were held on Sunday, May 6, when the Rev. W. T. Bushrod, of Chorley, preached. There were good attendances at all the services, and the collections were very satisfactory.

Colne.—Dr. Dharmavir, of Padiham (formerly of the Brahma Samaj, India), preached at the evening service on May 6 an eloquent sermon against mammon worship. He pleaded for greater devotion to the Christ ideal of life. A congregation of over 200 was present. On Sunday evening, May 13, a service in recognition of new members was conducted by the Rev. John Evans, who has just completed a year's ministry at Colne. Twenty-three persons were admitted as members of the church. Mr. Evans, in the course of a very impressive sermon, emphasised the moral and spiritual meaning of the principles for which the church stood, and heartily welcomed those who had consented to join fellowship with the congregation.

Dover.—Anniversary services were conducted on Sunday, May 13, by the Rev. C. A. Ginever. After the services the members were asked to sign a parchment roll, as it had been deemed well to keep a record of the names of those belonging to the church. At the end of the evening service, before the benediction, a short address was given to welcome the new members.

Halifax.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held at Northgate-end Chapel, on Sunday, May 13, when the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, of Oxford, preached morning and evening, and in the afternoon the Rev. F. E. Milson gave an address: there was special music by the choir and scholars, under the direction of Mr. A. Wilson, the organist. In connection with the anniversary, the Rev. P. E. Richards gave a lecture on Monday evening, on "Tales from Plutarch." The collections at services and lecture amounted to £28 11s. 6d.

Horwich.—The annual Sunday-school sermons were preached last Sunday, May 13. The day was perfect. In the morning a scholars' service was conducted by the Rev. H. E. Haycock, of Halliwell-road Free Church, Bolton. The preacher in the afternoon and evening was the Rev. J. H. Weatherall, of Bank-street Chapel, Bolton. There were large congregations, especially at night. The collections, including several donations, amounted to nearly £15, an advance on last year.

Ilminster (Resignation).—The Rev. Edward Parry, B.A., has sent in his resignation as minister of the Old Meeting, to take effect at Midsummer next.

London: Lewisham.—On the second Sunday in May this congregation again celebrated the anniversary of the founding of the church. The weather was glorious, and everybody was happy. The morning service was well attended, and in the evening the building was comfortably full. At 3 p.m. was a children's flower service, when twenty-five children with their teachers attended from Avondale-road, Peckham, by special invitation. Hymns suitable to the occasion were well sung, a few of the children contributed recitals and solos, and short addresses were given by two members of the congregation. On Wednesday, 16th, the annual public meeting was held. Mr. John Harrison, president of the London District Unitarian Society, presided, and members were invited to meet him previous to the meeting. The speakers included the Rev. E. Savell Hicks, G. Carter, W. W. Chynoweth Pope, Messrs. C. Vogan, A. G. Warren, Jenks, and Peppercorn.

Manchester: Broughton (Appointment).—The Rev. Henry Dawtre, B.A., who has been for nearly two years assistant minister to the Rev. C. J. Street, M.A., LL.B., at Upper Chapel, Sheffield, and minister in charge of the Atercliffe Unitarian Mission, has received and accepted a unanimous invitation to take charge of the newly-formed congregation at Broughton, and will enter upon his duties on Sunday, September 2.

Manchester: Platt.—The Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, of Leicester, preached two earnest and eloquent sermons on Sunday, May 13. They were listened to with great attention and appreciation by large congregations, every seat being occupied. The collections were for the Sunday school.

Mansfield (Appointment).—The Rev. F. Heming Vaughan, B.A., of Hull, has accepted the unanimous invitation of the Old Meeting House congregation to become their minister, and will enter upon his ministry on the first Sunday in August.

Middlesbrough.—At the anniversary services on May 13 the Rev. W. H. Lambelle was heartily welcomed back to his pulpit after an absence of nine weeks through illness. On Monday evening a conversation was held in the schoolroom, presided over by the minister. The Rev. W. Rosling (Bradford) and Rev. R. H. Maister (Stockton) both gave short and interesting addresses. Vocal and instrumental music made the gathering most enjoyable.

Rawtenstall.—On Sunday, May 13, the Sunday-school anniversary services were held. The special preacher was the Rev. M. R. Scott. In the afternoon and evening all the available space in the church was occupied, even in the aisles and inside the communion rails, and some persons were crowded into the vestries. The collection was £50 7s. The "At Home" held on Good Friday was opened by Alderman T. Holt, J.P., of Bury, Mr. James Shepherd presiding. On the following Saturday the children of the school conducted the opening ceremonies. The proceeds, which amounted to £40, will be devoted to repairing the vestries.

South Shields.—Anniversary services were conducted at Unity Church on Sunday, May 6, by the Rev. Albert Thornhill, of Carlisle, who preached in the morning on "God in Man," and in the evening on "A Faith for Today." He also addressed the Sunday-school in the afternoon. The annual party was held on Wednesday, May 9, when upwards of 100 sat down to tea. A public meeting was afterwards held in the church. Mr. Blues (president of the church) occupied the chair, and gave a very hearty welcome to the visitors. Addresses were delivered by His Worship the Mayor of Newcastle-on-Tyne (Ald. J. Baxter Ellis) the Revs. W. H. Lambelle (president of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association), Frank Walters, Francis Wood, and G. A. Ferguson.

UNITARIANS were well represented at the recent May Meetings of the Vegetarian Society. Among the speakers were the Rev. James C. Street, of Shrewsbury, Mr. William E. A. Axon, LL.D., and Mr. William Harrison, of Manchester. On Sunday, the 6th inst., at Bayshill Unitarian Church the address at the morning service was given by Mr. Albert Broadbent, secretary of the Vegetarian Society, and in the evening by Mr. William E. A. Axon. The Rev. Fisher Jones conducted the devotional part of the services.

"TO-MORROW," says this week's Guardian, dated May 16, "will be the twenty-fifth anniversary of the publication of the Revised New Testament. . . : Whatever the defects of the Revised Version, it does unquestionably bring us nearer to the original writings. It can hardly be doubted, indeed, that it has helped materially to the more intelligent reading of the New Testament, and that it has greatly stimulated the comparative study of the wonderful literature which has entered into the very texture of Western thought and affected the outlook upon life even of those who are least conscious of being influenced by it. Apart from higher considerations, the Revised Version was a great literary achievement which will ever stand to the credit of the last quarter of the nineteenth century."

UNITARIAN CHURCH, STALYBRIDGE.

AN APPEAL.

THE Committee, Teachers, and other workers at Stalybridge are making an effort to strengthen the attachment of their Young People to the Sunday School and Church. Our scholars are numerous, and as a large proportion of them have reached an age when the ordinary ties of the Sunday School begin to weaken, it is our desire to create in these young people new and binding interests in the cause we have at heart. With a view to this end an Elder Scholars' Guild has been formed. The work of the Guild is the provision of interesting gatherings during the week, meetings for social intercourse, physical recreation, mental instruction, and worship. A religious service is held monthly, and a lecture—generally of a literary character—is provided fortnightly, attendance at these, especially at the service, being insisted upon as a most important condition of Guild membership.

To meet the requirements of such an institution we have been forced to a considerable outlay. Our ordinary school buildings are used as a day school, and it is obviously impossible to arrange them for the purpose of a permanent reading room, gymnasium, &c. At the rear of the school stands a commodious building formerly used as a stable. This was purchased some time ago at a cost of £300, and now we propose to convert it into a suite of rooms suitable for carrying out the objects of the Guild. One room is already completed, and we only await the encouragement of the help of our friends to proceed with the full scheme.

The estimated cost of the work, apart from the purchase money, is £250. Towards this sum about £127 has already been raised, as acknowledged under. The congregation and scholars are making further efforts to increase the Fund, but, as the congregation is essentially of the working-class, we still feel largely dependent upon outside friends for the full success of the scheme. We therefore venture to make our case known, in the hope of enlisting the sympathy and help of distant friends in a work which we believe to be needful to the welfare of our young people and our church life.

The amount already raised is made up as follows:—

There are many Sunday School Teachers and Workers in connection with Unitarian Churches in different parts of the country who have never visited London, and yet London is the greatest and most interesting City in the world. At Whitsuntide nearly all the Railway Companies arrange for Excursions to London, and many people have a few days' holiday at that time. For the convenience of sight-seers it is necessary for visitors to reside in a central part of the metropolis. There are excellent Temperance Hotels which provide Bed, Breakfast, and Attendance at 5/- a day, and several where the charge is a little less. The Whit-week Meetings afford opportunities of social intercourse among friends and fellow-workers, while the speeches and papers by well-known Ministers and Laymen will prove interesting.

Early application should be made for Tickets for the Essex Hall Lecture and the Conversazione.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

AT the annual business meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association on Wednesday, June 6, the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson will submit a resolution dealing with the Education Bill. We hope to publish the resolution next week, so that the members of the Association may have an opportunity of studying it beforehand. Mr. Dowson has deferred drafting his resolution until he learns the decision of the House of Commons in regard to Clause 1. The annual report of the executive committee, along with an agenda of the business meeting, will be posted to every member of the Association this week, but it was not possible to give the terms of Mr. Dowson's resolution.

THE debate on the Education Bill, which entered on the Committee stage this week, has centred in the all-absorbing question of religious instruction. On Tuesday Mr. Fred Maddison, in a strong and manly speech, moved an amendment providing that no religious instruction should be given at public expense or in ordinary school hours. This principle evidently has the support of the Labour members, as well as of a considerable section of Ministerialists. The policy of the Government, however, will not admit this heroic way out of its difficulty, and many minds have been exercised as to the extent to which the amendment will withdraw support from Mr. Birrell's measure as it stands. Mr. Chamberlain, in a curious speech, supported the principle of the amendment, so far as vetoing public outlay on religious instruction, but he would leave the ordinary school hours open to voluntary lessons by all varieties of religious propagandists. Mr. Balfour has declared that he would prefer this arrangement to that of "undenominational" teaching. The debate is to be continued next week; but the holidays will soon intervene, and it is clear that a lengthy and tedious warfare of words is before the House.

MR. BALFOUR, speaking in the City last week, was quick to seize upon a point which certainly tells against the "Undenominational" argument in regard to the schools. Our readers will remember that our churches in Manchester recently memorialised the City Council against the arrangement by which the Free Church Federation, excluding Unitarians, is to act as representing Nonconformists at the public cemeteries. The Federation objects to the inclusion of Unitarians on their rota of chaplains, though it is careful to state that individuals still have the right of selecting a Unitarian minister for funerals if they desire. It contends that "the duty in question is of a nature which requires some presumptive guarantee of suitability in point of religious conviction." Well, replied Mr. Balfour, justly enough; if the public office of cemetery chaplain is to be held subject to a religious test, how can Free Churchmen consistently oppose those who wish to secure "suitability in point of religious conviction," in those who are to give religious instruction in the schools? We have not seen any adequate reply, and we are still curious to learn what the Manchester City Council will decide in this delicate matter of the cemeteries.

THE great Norwegian dramatist, Henrik Ibsen, has passed away this week at the age of seventy-eight. His work was done, and for some time he has been quite broken in health. To the general average of reader and playgoer in this country Ibsen's works do not appeal successfully. In addition to strange material, he introduces strange methods, and the last thing he sets out to do is to please. While the majority pass him by, unheeding or merely scoffing, he has found his audience in those who are not to be deterred by rugged ways or repelled by the characterisation of abnormal types. Some enthusiasts, indeed, have gone very far in proclaiming his greatness; a just estimation is perhaps hardly possible yet, but no thoughtful man or woman can rise from his "Brand" or "Peer Gynt" without a sense of having communed with a high spirit on spiritual themes. Ibsen's special interest for many, however, lies in his bold discussions of social problems, and in this aspect many of his plays will remain as a permanent illustration of the agonies of the nineteenth century.

OUR United States correspondent, the Rev. C. W. Wendte, writes:—"An item of denominational intelligence which will surprise and sadden many of our co-religionists in Great Britain, as it has grieved us in the United States, is the resignation of Rev. Dr. Minot J. Savage from his important charge, the Church of the Messiah, in New York. For several years past Dr. Savage has been suffering from the effects of overwork. It was hoped a change of pastorate from Boston to New York would give him much-needed relief. But a few months since he was compelled to seek in Southern California a milder climate and absolute rest from study and ministerial labours. It has become evident that he must not undertake any regular professional work for some time to come. Hence his surrender of his New York pulpit. There is every reason to believe that entire rest and a life close to the heart of Nature will restore our friend and fellow-worker, and give him back to us for years of useful and eminent service to the cause of Liberal Religion, of which he is one of the brightest ornaments and most distinguished leaders. Our debt to Dr. Savage is great. Equally great should be our gratitude, and fervent our prayers for his speedy recovery." We cordially associate ourselves with our correspondent's tribute and hopes for Dr. Savage's recovery.

WE have watched the Russian people in the agony of their struggle against an oppressive ruling class, and we have spoken of the years which were to elapse before the victory should be achieved. Sometimes we have heard of periods which must be measured rather by the generations of the lives of men than by years. Yet out of this vast range of lands so little known, and this great complex of strange peoples, the unexpected always seems to spring. To-day men are asking in surprise whether the Russian Revolution has not already taken place. Massacre was followed by proclamations of peace and a constitution; proclamations passed by sudden change to edicts of butchery again. Then came a pause—not, indeed, any cessation in the dread drama itself, only the thought of the Western people was turned for a time from the ordeal of Eastern Europe. Now in a moment the constitution is a fact. The Russian Duma has met.

WHAT an assembly this first Parliament of the Russias is! Professor Kovalevsky entertains it with learned little lectures on the constitutions and constitutional forms of England, which he has studied so closely, of Prussia, or of the German Empire. To the Constitutional Democrats who form the dominant party in the Duma the instructions of the Professor doubtless come with welcome force. The assembly is also largely composed of Jews, and these, being men of keen intellect, are familiar with the laws and methods of other lands. But there are other forces represented. There are peasants there—men, well-to-do peasants from the black corn lands of the South, and others who come from the stern wrestle of life in the frozen North, or from the settlements in the shy, dark forests. What are they thinking? Did we but know their thought, the course of Russian history would be clearer to us. There are also representatives of the workmen in the growing factory towns. What are they thinking? They, at least, are more articulate, for they belong to the general European democratic labour party. One of their spokesmen told the members: "We working men only number fourteen in the Duma, but the Duma is not going to settle matters. Our comrades in the streets, who have borne the brunt of the fight for freedom, will carry it out to the bitter end."

If we turn from the parties which compose the Duma to the proposals which it unanimously adopts, there is equal food for reflection. Its measures are to cut deep. One would expect keen differences of opinion to become manifest directly the discussion comes to details. For all that we expect, we know not what to allow for the unifying influences of a people which for the first time has awaked to free speech. At present all seems agreement. Complete amnesty for all political offences, even offences of violent action, is demanded. An amendment is introduced into the Address, calling for women's rights. Labour legislation, free education, are asked for. The most important resolution, in view of the agrarian state of Russia, is the one dealing with the land. The compulsory expropriation of private landed property, and the holding of State, Church, and Monastic domains for the use of the peasants, with security of tenure, constitute a large change. Yet the movement is less a revolutionary than an anti-revolutionary one. Upholders of the rights of property are relieved to learn that the land is to be bought, not taken, but bought at a full price. Those who fear revolutionary politics notice with satisfaction that the proposed measures are expected to withdraw the peasants from the socialist propaganda of the proletariat. Others may ponder on the tendency for a movement when once it is started to acquire momentum as it proceeds.

So we watch the work and the personalities of the Duma. Its proceedings have been marked by extreme quiet and dignity. The new men are not awkward. Altogether it is a marvellous fact in modern life. Old names fade. If Trepoff remains, M. Durnovo and Count Witte have gone under. M. Mouroumskeff is President of the Duma, and already peasant orators, such as M. Rephko, who asks for Female Suffrage, and M. Zhilkin, are making their mark. To representatives of workers on the lands, and to delegates, such as M. Mikhailicheuko, of the workers in the cities the destinies of Russia are passing. Meantime, the old régime of execution and counter-execution continues. Each day brings its report of a thrown bomb, and the Government puts its opponents to death at the rate of a hundred a month. It is a world of contradictions and enigmas. Out of it all, one thing is clear—mighty nations are uprising towards freedom and national well-being.

MR. WHITELAW REID, speaking at the dinner of the Newspaper Press Fund last Saturday, made some remarks on journalism which have, in the main, been fairly reported. One point, however, in his address strikes us as worthy of greater prominence than has been given to it. If he might offer a word of exhortation, he modestly said, to those who were always exhorting others, he would suggest a quotation from "that fine old combination of the Hebrew prophet and the Massachusetts Yankee who honoured the United States Senate by serving as its chaplain—Edward Everett Hale. His words should ring in the ears of would-be leaders in the Press—at least, in the Press of all English-speaking peoples under whatever skies—"You can never lead unless you lift." That motto is in the spirit we should like always to pervade these columns; and we commend it no less to our brethren of the pulpit.

OF the Rev. Charles Hargrove's sermons on "The Rights of Man" now appearing in the Mill Hill Pulpit, the second, in the May number, is on "Rights of Brotherhood." The claims for denominational teaching at the State's expense, and of the right to have work similarly provided for all, are touched upon, and then, after a consideration of right comes in the thought of Love, and what genuine charity will do. The sermon concludes as follows:—"Forbear and eat no more till I and my affairs are answered," is the uncivil command of hunger, not to be met of true gentility by angry or contemptuous rebuff—if Shakespeare be allowed as judge. "What would you have?" is the Duke's reply to him who so interrupts the meal.

"Your gentleness shall force
More than your force move us to gentleness."

"The lesson is for us to-day. We are met on every side with rude demands; our policy not rudely to reply, but patiently to consider and remember the example of him of whom it is written that 'when he was reviled he reviled not again, but committed the cause to him who judges righteously.'

"Justice has its strictly defined boundaries. Charity has no limits. We can pay all other debts to the full. The debt of love is ever owing. We owe it to all and always. We owe it, if occasion demands, 'to lay down our lives for the brethren,' as brave men and women are doing every day on sea and land—and then only shall we have paid our debt."

THERE is a project on foot, we hear, for the formation of a Unitarian Laymen's Club for Yorkshire, a county where there is certainly no lack of men of position and ability, whose closer co-operation should bring strength to our movement throughout the district. The Laymen's Club in London has undoubtedly done good work already, and we may expect it still to prosper. On Wednesday Mr. H. B. Lawford, the retiring president, received hearty and well-deserved thanks for his year's service, and Mr. Harold Wade was elected to succeed him. The Women's Social Club, we understand, has given substantial help in the arrangements for hospitality to the Whitsuntide delegates.

LONDON Unitarians have an opportunity of being present to-morrow (Sunday) and Monday at the opening of a new church. The Acton congregation, under its vigorous young minister, the Rev. Arthur Hurn, has closed its tenancy of temporary premises, and the services to-morrow will be held in the new building which has been erected in Creffield-road, Acton, opposite the Haberdashers' School. On Monday evening Mr. John Harrison will preside at a public meeting, at which, as well as at the services, the presence of visitors will be cordially welcome.

SHORT NOTICE:

James Martineau and Francis William Newman as Religious Teachers. A Centenary address by Sydney Herbert Mellone, M.A., D.Sc. This is the address given by Dr. Mellone last Whitsuntide in commemoration of the two teachers and friends, who were born on April 21 and July 27 respectively, in 1805. The main purpose of the address is to show what answer these two gave to the great central question, What, essentially, is Religion? And while there were differences in their apprehension, Dr. Mellone shows how closely Martineau and Newman were united in their conviction of the truth that religion represents the greatest spiritual fact of life, the union of God and man in our deepest experiences, what Martineau called the Universal Incarnation; an incarnation "true, not of Christ exclusively, but of man universally and of God everlastingly." So also Newman, says Dr. Mellone, "defines religion as the experience of personal communion with the Eternal"; with Martineau he bases on this a conception of the indivisible union of the human spirit with God, of whose Being, indeed, it partakes. Dr. Mellone's address, with full references both to the writings and passages in the life of Dr. Martineau, will be found a valuable guide to the study of this great question; and we would call attention especially to his warning against attempting a merely logical road to God. "If God is not found with the human spirit. If His presence within is denied, he will never be found without." And to the concluding word on "Martineau's great and lasting contribution to theology to-day: the self-revealing Presence of God in all souls." (Philip Green, 5, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 3d.)

IS THERE ONLY ONE THING
NEEDFUL?

III.

WHAT we have implied, though not explicitly stated, in previous papers under this title is that the question (as applied to Christian ethics) cannot be answered in the affirmative. There is no one moral idea, no single definite principle which sums up in a word the whole practical meaning of the Christian Ideal.

In further illustration of this truth, let us look carefully at a well-known fact. It is admitted that the earliest Christian teaching was deeply influenced by a conviction which the first missionaries believed to be derived from the Master himself—that he would come again, when the whole present order of things, and all earthly powers, would be miraculously transformed into a new order, over which Christ and his faithful followers would reign. It is the old Jewish hope in a Christian setting. "A monstrous mythology," Dr. Martineau has somewhere called it. I venture to suggest that, though the details in which it clothed itself were many times fantastic and absurd, it remains a splendid and pathetic example of a passionate faith, laid low at length by the inexorable logic of history and fact, yet containing within it something that humanity will not willingly give up—the hope of a kingdom of heaven on earth.

In its earliest form, the hope of Christ's "second coming" rests on the conviction that there can be no reconciliation between Christ and the actual world. The victory of Christ is the destruction of the world, the victory of the world the destruction of Christ.

To illustrate the conviction of this antagonism in its most intense form, I take the Book of Revelation. The attitude of the writer is perfectly intelligible. The "world" is Imperial Rome, whose irreconcilable opposition to everything for which Christ stood is summed up in the demand which she made, that divine honours be rendered to the Emperor. The passion of loathing and detestation which Rome inspired in the prophet's mind, as expressed, for instance, in chapters xvii. and xviii., is abundantly intelligible from our knowledge of the world in which he lived. His work dates from the death of Nero (A.D. 68). Part of it was written before the destruction of Jerusalem by the Roman army under Titus (A.D. 70; see chapter xi.). The author is acquainted with the atrocities of Nero against innocent men in Rome, "drunken with the blood of the saints and the martyrs of Jesus" (chapter xvii. 6; also xiii. 7, xviii. 20 and 24). The beast with the seven heads means the Roman Empire and seven Emperors (chapters xiii. 1 ff., xvii. 3 ff.); the Woman (chapter xvii. 3 to 9) is the city of Rome; and the ten horns (chapters xiii. 1, xvii. 3 and 12) are imperial governors. The details of chapter xvii. (especially vv. 8 to 11) correspond to history and popular belief. Five of the seven are fallen—that is, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero; "one is," i.e., Galba, during whose short "reign"—if such it can be called—this part of the book was written (A.D. 68-9). The head that was wounded to death, and was healed, and disappeared amid the wondering of the world (xiii. 3) is afterwards (xvii. 8 to 11) spoken of as the fifth, and is identified with the whole beast, which was, and is not, and will come again. Nero was the fifth Emperor; and only of Nero was it believed that he was not really dead, but would come again from the East to perpetrate new cruelties. The writer was convinced of the truth of this, and therefore speaks of Nero as "the eighth, one of the seven." In Vespasian's reign, a false Nero actually appeared in the East and secured a following amongst the Parthians (about A.D. 75). Vespasian may be meant by the sixth Emperor, and, if so, this part of the book was produced a few years later than the date mentioned above. Other parts of it were probably written during the reign of terror in the last three years of Domitian's reign (A.D. 93-6), when we find a madman, possessed of absolute power, occupying the imperial throne.

With the utmost impatience the prophet longs for the end. "His purpose is the same as that of all Apocalypses—to confirm and strengthen the little family of believers in their patience, their courage, their confidence, by urging that the sufferings of the time will last only for a little while, and that the present troubles are already the beginning of that end when sorrow and suffering will in a moment be transformed into glory unspeakable."

The moral teaching arising out of this view of things is pure anarchy as far as any earthly order is concerned. Such a State, such a Government, drove men to desperation, and in their desperation they became anarchists—not anarchists of terrorism and violence, but anarchists to this world in faith and hope of another (not the Christian "heaven" of later tradition, but the transformed earth). Nothing is further from the author's mind than open rebellion (chapter xiii. 10); "this is the patience and faith of the saints." The war against the diabolic powers embodied in "the world" (that is, the State) is, under God, all in the hands of Christ and his angels, not in the hands of men. Men cannot improve the world. But each one can keep watch over himself; for by their own works men are judged. Each of the seven letters (chapters ii. and iii.) begins with the significant warning: "I know thy works." Conduct alone is the test of salvation (chapter xx. 13, 14). In the mystic marriage of Christ with the body of the faithful, the wedding garment is "the righteousness of the saints" (chapter xix. 8). What is required of men is to refuse to "worship the beast" (the imperial power typified in the Emperor), and to be steadfast under persecution, even unto death; to resist the enticements of ease and wealth, and avoid like poison the pernicious teaching (ii. 14 and 20) that the sins of the flesh are morally indifferent; to be true to "the first Love," "unto him that loved us," and to one another in mutual charity and service.

This book is a document full of instruction for those who are willing to understand the moral attitude of the earliest Christians. This morality is individualistic in the extreme. The world is evil altogether, and the State, the Roman Government, is the focus of that evil. Our only duties are, control of the body, charity and service to the brethren, and patient endurance until the Lord shall come. All depends on this hope; the whole interest is in the coming world, the world that Christ will bring, not in this present world, between which and Christ there is irreconcilable antagonism. And the root of the antagonism is that the writer cannot think of the present world apart from the Roman Empire.

I ask the admirers of Tolstoy to consider whether this morality, as we have summed it up, springing from the same root, the absolute opposition between Christ and the world, and divested of its reference to the Roman State and to a miraculous second advent of Christ, is not the essence of the Russian prophet's teaching to-day. What right has any man to take these references to Rome which abound in the New Testament, and put them forward as the central message of Christ to the world for all time, as the guiding principles offered by Christ for social life to-day?

In saying that such references to Rome abound in the New Testament, I do not mean to imply that the antagonism is always believed to be as intense as it is in the book of Revelation; but it seems to be never less than an aloofness from—almost a contempt for—the present world and all its goods and values, its fellowships and organisations. One of the most remarkable and little noticed facts in the ethical teaching of the New Testament is this. In St. Paul we find the same attitude to the world, but we find also a deliberate endeavour to correct the anarchical and individualist tendencies which appeared to result from it. This I hope to illustrate in another paper.

It is well to remember, notwithstanding what has been said, that the idea of an antagonism between Christ and the world has its rightful place in the Christian Ideal and in human experience; only the antagonism must not be assumed to be irreconcilable. There is a real opposition; Christ and the world, "ought" and "is," the Ideal and the Actual are different things, and it is out of this relative antagonism, as we may call it, that human morality arises. The ideals of morality, not only by their difference from the world, make a demand on the world to be changed, to conform to them; but do themselves indicate possibilities which in the present world-order could never be realised. They reveal further possibilities, as it were, in "geometrical progression." The very fact that you have accomplished and realised so much, of itself reveals to you still greater possibilities to be realised; and these in turn, if realised, and only if realised, reveal things greater yet: This explains the fact that those who have accomplished most for the uplifting of humanity are the ones who are most impressed with the littleness of what they have done. The ordinary course of events in this world of time and space affords no adequate scope for the fulfilment of a life constructed on these principles, which are illustrated in the Christian Ideal as in every genuine uplifting impulse.

If, on the other hand, a man's ideals go no further than "bridge," horses, and motor cars, success in business, and retirement at ease, it is possible that he will not fail to find complete satisfaction in this world:

THE BEGINNINGS OF HINDU PHILOSOPHY.

EVERYONE has heard of the Vedic hymns, with their glowing delineations of the world of light, and their penetrating guesses at the ultimate unity which the earlier poets had distributed into a host of divine powers. And all students know that later Indian thought came, after the decline of Buddhism, to recognise six systems of philosophy as orthodox. The age of Hindu scholasticism preceded that of Europe, and its roots go far back into a dim past where all distinct chronology is lost. But among the successive strata of literary deposit formed on the basis of the Vedic hymns are certain treatises known as Upanishads. They were first made known in Europe by the adventurous French scholar, Anquetil du Perron, who got hold of a Persian translation dating from 1657, and published a Latin version at the beginning of the last century. It was almost unintelligible, but it attracted the enthusiastic admiration of the philosopher Schopenhauer; and the progress of Indian studies soon brought the ancient texts into their due place in the development of Hindu thought. Max Müller opened the "Sacred Books of the East" with a rendering of five of them, to which he subsequently added the translation of six more (vols. i. and xv.). These eleven, attached to the three oldest Vedas, form a sort of classical group. Many others, belonging to different ages, have been gathered from different parts of India, and Dr. Deussen, the distinguished Professor in the university of Kiel, has published a translation of no less than sixty. On the basis of these studies he issued, twelve years ago, the first part of a General History of Philosophy. It began with the earliest-known monuments of speculative thought in India, the philosophical hymns of the Rig Veda. A second part followed in 1899, expounding the ideas of the Upanishads. This division of the work has now been issued in English (by the competent hand of the Rev. A. S. Geden) under the title of The Philosophy of the Upanishads.*

It must be admitted that the book is not easy reading. Let not the seeker after light, however, be deterred by pages sprinkled with Sanskrit words. In forms of antique speculation he will find himself keeping company with some of the greatest of Western thinkers. Parmenides and Plato, in Greece, reached analogous ideas a century or two later; Kant started corresponding problems for our modern world. Mr. Geden has done his best to break up the cumbrous sentences of the original German; and, though his renderings are not always felicitous, and there is a little tendency to employ theological language where it has no place in the original, the English reader will find him a laborious and honest guide. A comparison with the translations of Professor Max Müller will often show what points are certain and what still obscure.

It is a strange world into which we are introduced. Here are dialogues between gods and men, speculations on physiology, fantastic explanations of odd bits of ritual, plays upon words which seem the merest trifling, till the reader can accommodate himself to an imaginative atmosphere wholly different from his own. Then he gradually discerns the outlines of an extremely interesting social order. In the kingdoms north and south of the Ganges there is an eager intellectual life. This is not limited to a professional group like the Brahmins. The kings and nobles, who belonged to the fighting group of Kshatriyas, take an active part in philosophical discussion. Sovereigns preside over great disputations, and eminent women are allowed to speak in debate. The householder who has discharged the proper sacrificial duties, and reared his family, retires to meditate in the forest, where kings, self-dethroned, become disciples of famous sages. Or in the quest of truth men join the ranks of the itinerants, the "Wanderers" who are so often mentioned in the Buddhist texts. On this side Dr. Deussen's exposition might have been much strengthened by reference to the corresponding phenomena illustrated in the Buddhist books. The problems of Indian literary chronology are, of course, enormously complicated. Mr. Geden has dropped from his heading Dr. Deussen's addition to the general title, "The Philosophy of the Upanishads"—"till about 500 B.C." This means that in Deussen's view the speculations recorded in these documents belong to the period preceding the rise of Buddhism. No doubt that is, in the main, historically correct. The Buddhist texts are everywhere full of a polemic against the doctrine of the Ātman or Self with which these books are concerned. But we must distinguish between the growth of the thoughts and their literary expression; and in this respect it is to be regretted that Professor Deussen limits his investigation to these texts alone, without attempting to set them in more definite relations with the different intellectual movements which may be traced in early Buddhist days. Here, for instance, is the opening of the Svetasvatara:—

"Whence are we born? Whereby do we live, and whither do we go? O ye who know Brahman, (tell us) at whose command we abide, whether in pain or in pleasure?"

"Should time, or nature, or necessity, or chance, or the elements be considered as the cause, or He who is called Purusha (the Supreme Spirit)?"

A long process of speculation lies behind such inquiries, and the views of some of the philosophers contemporary with Gotama the Buddha were engaged with these very matters of fate or destiny, the elements, and the like. Professor Deussen, however, passes by the considerations which such facts suggest—viz., that the Brahmanical schools represent only one phase of a great intellectual movement, and can only be rightly understood in the midst of actions and reactions of the most complex kind. The absolute idealism which he finds in the Upanishads did not grow up alone or unaided. It was faced, as its counterpart is faced to-day, by different forms of extreme materialism, which went so far (if Buddhist representations may be trusted) as to deny moral distinctions altogether.

Three great themes lie beneath the varied contents of these books—(1) the nature and being of God; (2) the reality of the world of our experience; (3) the soul, its functions in the body, and its destiny after death. There are discussions of theology, of cosmology, and of psychology. The historian would prefer to begin with the primitive speculations on the self; to show how the dualism of soul and body took shape in thought; and then how the effort to find a self in the gods and the world led to the conception of the unity of God, and the effort in some way to conceive the world in Him, or Him in the world. Questions of this kind are, in fact, discussed in the first part of Dr. Deussen's history. But the publication of the second part without the help of any retrospective survey places the ordinary Englishman at a great disadvantage. The volume in hand begins: "It will be remembered," when the reader who takes up the subject for the first time has, naturally, nothing to recollect. This, however, is in part the reason why Dr. Deussen prefers to plunge at once into the metaphysical thicket and face the ontological problems at the outset. With great clearness, with an unrivalled command of the obscure texts, and with an eye constantly fixed on the great idealists of Greece or Germany, he delineates the fundamental conception of the philosophy of the Upanishads, the ultimate reality embracing all the phases of our experience, and giving unity to them all. But, from the very fact that it is all-inclusive, no individual can remain outside it, to view it as an object of thought. It can, therefore, never be truly "known," for knowledge implies two terms, and involves some sort of relation between the mind which apprehends and that which is apprehended. This objection is overcome when it is realised that the self within is in truth identical with the universal Self. Then differences disappear; the successions of time vanish in the enjoyment of the "deathless" or eternal; the world of our senses is recognised as an illusion; and the thinking self attains deliverance or emancipation. How this profound idea was illustrated by Yajñavalkya and other famous teachers whose names are embedded in these books the reader will find duly expounded by Dr. Deussen. The philosophic professor recognises the extreme difficulty of remaining poised at this speculative height without falling on one side into pantheism and on the other into theism. Religion is not content to merge the individual wholly in God; and none of Dr. Deussen's pages are, perhaps, more interesting than those which describe the antaryāmin, the "ruler within," or "inward guide." Lofty is the spirit which pervades these ancient books. Yet the reader will probably feel that their discussions belong to a different plane from that in which he habitually moves. Whether he sympathises with their determinism or whether he rejects it, he will be struck by the infrequency of anything like direct ethical appeal. He will note an eager search for truth; he will find an untiring quest after knowledge; he will observe that the secret of escape from the round of rebirths lies in the overcoming of ignorance; but the ignorance which detains a man in the sphere of illusion is metaphysical and not moral. It is not the struggling will which needs strengthening, but the darkened mind which requires illumination. Doubtless the higher insight would only be attained by those who had practised certain disciplines of self-control. And Dr. Deussen concludes by sketching some of the means devised for this end. But it remains true that the philosophical conceptions here described generated no missionary fervour; and none of the teachers who expounded them were ever regarded as labouring, like the Buddha, "for the good, the gain, and the welfare of gods and men." A mode of thought which placed the ultimate release from the sufferings of life in a mystical gnosis which could be realised only by a very few, had little diffusive power. Later teachers formulated the speculations of the Upanishads in the system of the Vedānta, which still powerfully sways the Hindu mind. Dr. Deussen's volume is an invaluable aid to its study, and ought to do something to give the English reader some sincere intellectual respect for the ancient teachers of his Indian fellow-subjects. But, whether or no he recognises their affinity with the philosophy of Schopenhauer, he will hardly follow the German professor in affirming that that philosophy "represents Christianity in its purest form."

THE "HIBBERT JOURNAL."

In the current number of the *Hibbert Journal there are several articles of great interest, which set one thinking on the subject of the progressive knowledge of truth in religion. The Rev. W. Jones-Davies, the Principal-Elect of the Primitive Methodist College in Manchester, writes specifically on the "Laws and Limits of Development in Christian Doctrine," showing how there must be real progress, and a restatement of truth that shall meet the actual religious needs of the present, a restatement conditioned both by philosophic thought and the advance of scientific discovery; and further, by the social and political movements of the day. On the other hand, Dom Cuthbert Butler, of the Downside Abbey, Bath, offers, from the Roman Catholic point of view, a criticism of Sabatier's "Religions of Authority and the Religion of the Spirit," in an article which holds the first place in this number, "Is the Religion of the Spirit a Working Religion for Mankind?" His answer is in the negative, but he does not convince us that the alternative offered by the Roman Church is to be accepted. The argument of the section of Sabatier's book on "The Religions of Authority" is clearly and impartially presented, so as to bring out the fact that every form of historical Christianity has contained elements which do not permanently belong to "The Religion of the Spirit." Even Christ's own religion Sabatier shows to have contained temporary elements of Jewish thought which we have now outgrown. "And so the 'Religion of the Spirit' presents itself as an improvement on the religion of Christ, a distillation of its highest and most purely spiritual quintessence. Thus Sabatier and his school tell us that Christ's own Christianity was not pure. This is a climax beyond which it will hardly be possible to go." We cannot admit that there is here any reductio ad absurdum such as the writer would clearly imply. To recognise that there were temporary elements in Christ's religion, and that it is only its essential spirit which remains to inspire our religious life, is not the same thing as saying that our religion is better than his. What it implies is that he gave to the world that supreme gift of spiritual enlightenment and the new impulse of faith, in the only possible way of human enlightenment, amid the historical conditions of his own time. The religion of the Spirit must, in every age, have its own historical limitations or conditions, and if in that sense it may be said that the religion of Jesus "was not pure" neither is ours, nor can it be; but what must go with it is not any form of a religion of authority. In the new age the religion of the Spirit must take on the forms of thought which belong to its fullest knowledge, and it must be free so to move onward to more perfect expressing and a fuller faithfulness. We readily admit that "spiritual religion lies not in negations, but in acts and habits of soul," but these should be in the ritual of daily duty and home affections, the whole of which is filled with the true spirit.

After this comes, very aptly, Mr. Carpenter's article on "How Japanese Buddhism appeals to a Christian Theist." There (p. 504) we read:—"The ultimate Truth, no doubt, is one; but Truth as it enters the world through human lips is always involved in temporary forms which subsequent experience enlarges or corrects. No historic religion, therefore, can ever claim finality; and the work of religious founders is not so much to create systems of thought as to impart those impulses of moral endeavour and spiritual affection which the Christian sums up under the term, 'life.'"

In this article the striking affinities between many forms of Buddhist and Christian teaching are clearly brought out, and also marked differences of ideal. "England and Japan," says Mr. Carpenter, in conclusion, "each has its own social sores. Comparative estimates of morality are of no avail, for, as Dr. Johnson one observed, each man knows something worse of himself than of anybody else, for he alone can tell against how much light he has sinned. On the one hand, an army of missionaries endeavours to convert Japan to Christian orthodoxy. On the other hand, a student of Japanese life, like the late Lafcadio Hearn, passionately desires that it may remain Buddhist. But the Buddhist of the future will not be the Buddhist of the past. The boys and girls in the elementary schools, who are said to write essays on the doctrines of Darwin and Spencer, will cease to worship the Seven Gods of Good Fortune, or to seek help from the all-merciful Kwannon. Little by little, as scientific culture spreads, the popular Buddhism and the popular Christianity will no longer satisfy. What will take their place? New syntheses of knowledge and experience will be demanded. The moral ideals of the two great religions will approach still nearer, and, in the midst of the spiritual anarchy which sometimes threaten to paralyse the energies of the West, fresh insight and patience may be won by contact with the reverence of the Far West."

Sir Oliver Lodge contributes to this number the second part of his study of "Christianity v. Science," on "The Divine Element in Christianity." We are not very clear as to what he actually means, but "the most essential element in Christianity," we read, "is its conception of a human God." "A crucified prophet, yes; but a crucified God! I shudder at the blasphemy," is a known quotation which I cannot now verify; yet that apparent blasphemy is the soul of Christianity. It calls upon us to recognise and worship a crucified, an executed, God." And yet, on the next page we read: "The Divinity of Jesus is the truth which now requires to be re-perceived, : : the Divinity of Jesus, and of all other noble and saintly souls, in so far as they too have been inflamed by a spark of Deity—in so far as they can be recognised as manifestations of the Divine." And towards the end of the article: "The Christian God is revealed as the incarnate spirit of humanity, or rather the incarnate spirit of humanity is recognised as a real intrinsic part of God." Thus we are perhaps to conclude that Jesus was not in his own person that "crucified God" whom the Christian is to worship, but because Jesus was crucified we may know that God shared in that suffering, was crucified with him, and thus men may feel that "their God was very nigh unto them in their midst, and of their fellowship, sympathising with their struggles, rejoicing in their successes, and looking even in their own poor nature some dim and broken image of himself."

The Bishop of Carlisle, writing on "Mr. Birrell's Choice," makes an earnest plea for unsectarian religious teaching in elementary schools:—

"I have no desire," Dr. Diggle writes, "to introduce either the Irish or Prussian systems into our English schools. These systems emphasise denominationalism; my desire is to emphasise catholicity, Heaven lies too near the infancy of children for us to hide it with clouds of disputation and debate. At least let little children's first sweet view of the religion of Jesus be of the white realms of peace and love in which all Christians are united; and not of the red fields of contention and war in which they are opposed. I am in favour both of hypothesis and dogma in religion, for hypothesis and dogma alike are part of the necessities of philosophic thought. But for the children, the one thing needful is love of the living Jesus. His love for all the child-hearted is the fundamental fact of the Gospel. It is the one passport into His kingdom."

Professor Henry Jones contributes the third of his articles on "The Working Faith of a Social Reformer"; dealing with "The Metaphysical Basis—Mine and Thine," and is to deal in the next article with the question of private property and the general relations of Individualism and Socialism:

Mr. E. G. Gardner writes on "St. Catherine of Siena," and there is an interesting laymen's dialogue on "The Resurrection," by Mr. T. W. Rolleston:

We each have all the time there is; our mental and moral status is determined by what we do with it.—Mary Blake.

THE GROWTH OF CHRISTIAN FAITH.*

THE volume on "The Growth of Christian Faith," by Dr. G. Ferries, is written from a psychological, not a historical standpoint. It is not a history of Christianity, but an exposition of the manner in which faith grows in the individual soul from small beginnings to what the author regards as its higher and more complete stages. Faith springs initially from ordinary human experience, he teaches; from "a multitude of mental and moral facts which go to form the better nature of everyone" this plant grows up, and, nurtured rightly, is destined to bear wonderful flowers and fruit. Through work, through moral sentiment, through the perception of personal freedom, and of the unity of life, through the craving for eternity, and for perfection, through Reason, that expression or attitude of the soul that we term "Faith" is engendered. On this natural plane Faith grows, advancing along its pathway, but having its natural limits. It advances from a merely moral to a religious form involving belief in God, which is an apprehension of Highest Truth, and in prayer.

But this is all a preparation for the larger growth which comes through the gradual appropriation of the various elements of the Christian Revelation. In the "initial" stage neither "God" nor "Righteousness" is sufficiently apprehended, and a further advance becomes necessary, which now involves Revelation. In Revelation the parts present themselves in a certain order, some being elementary, others advanced, and to rise from stage to stage involves a succession of purest joys. The transition from the "initial" to this "revealed" plane of spiritual development comes about, the author conceives, through an awakening appreciation of the lives of exemplary Christians, through which a grasp is obtained on the Christian character, which is the beginning of the grasp on the nature of Christ. The author expounds at some length the meaning and possibility of a spiritual perception of Christ, insisting that, apart from the witness of the senses, the Person of Christ is visualised through his recorded sayings, and through his work, which continue in Christendom until now. This is the crucial point in the scheme of psychological development presented. Gaining this perception of Christ, the soul's growth in Faith now proceeds on the higher plane. The perception of Christ grows into a belief in his sinlessness and in his unlimited knowledge of God, and this in turn evolves into the belief in the Divinity of Christ, and a perception of the meaning in the goodness revealed in Christ's cross. Thus the pursuit of the worthiest object in life opens up—Christian righteousness, which is devotion to the goodness revealed in the Cross of Christ.

This, in brief outline, is the author's scheme of the growth of Christian Faith. Incidentally we commend his view that the motion towards real personal religion is not normally through that convulsive struggle and psychological upset that is termed "conversion," but is "a calm process of development." The chapters on the Atonement and its various interpretations, ancient and modern, are valuable and deserve study.

Dr. Ferries has no doubt given a careful and correct exposition of one line of development that Christian Faith takes and has taken. The mistake is to imagine that this is the only line. We maintain that true Christian Faith can grow, and has in very many cases grown, to the highest expressions that it has ever yet assumed, quite apart from such a theology of Revelation, quite apart from a recognition of those dogmas concerning Christ and God, which are the essential elements of the higher forms of Faith as conceived by the author.

RESIDIUM OR FOUNDATION?

SIR,—In Sir Roland Wilson's courteous and interesting letter of last week an assumption is made, which I cannot accept, that simple Bible teaching is a residuum or greatest common measure of Christianity. It is to my mind rather a foundation or preparatory discipline than an abstract residuum. Without wishing to enter on any further controversy as to the merits of secular and religious education, it is perhaps worth while to suggest the difference between a residuum and a foundation, a greatest common measure and a preparatory discipline.

One of the classical examples of the greatest common measure method of attaining truth is to be found in chapters ii. and iii. of Herbert Spencer's "First Principles on Ultimate Religious and Ultimate Scientific Ideas."

He begins by eliminating all in which different forms of religions differ from one another as unessential, and, having done the same for the sciences, he arrives triumphantly at what he regards as the ultimate reality of which all religions are the more or less confused and mistaken exponents, "that the Power [which the Universe manifests to us is utterly inscrutable." This residuum is to him the only certain truth which religion has to teach. Such a method of attaining truth, by excluding all in which religions differ from each other, is a fundamentally false method. You do not get the truth about God and the soul by taking what is common to Christianity, Buddhism, and the Fijis. The highest type of religion which we may suppose to be nearest to the truth will have all that is highest disregarded as unessential by such a method.

You do not get the truth about human nature by taking what is common to Christ and the basest criminals and the lowest barbarians. We learn more of what is in man by knowing a few of the greatest men than by taking a greatest common measure of them all. I need not labour the point. This method of attaining truth is thoroughly discredited. A residuum may have its own uses, but it is not an ideal, nor is it the highest truth.

On the other hand, there are truths or facts or laws which, in a sense, are common to many sciences or languages or philosophies, and yet they cannot be fairly described as a residuum, but rather as a foundation. Grammar is common to all well-written books; it is neither a residuum nor an ideal, but a preparatory discipline. The multiplication table is common to all the sciences; it is neither an ideal nor a residuum, but a foundation on which the science of mathematics is built up.

So also there are certain preparatory truths and facts which it is well for children to learn in morals and in religion. Such truths are expressed most simply and beautifully in the parables and Lord's Prayer and other teachings of Jesus. Such facts cannot be well taught if the greatest religious history in the world is ignored. The Bible in many of the best parts of it is a children's book. It is for the childlike and the simple and the pure in heart. A knowledge of and love for Bible stories and Bible characters, and above all, a knowledge of the life and teachings of Jesus is a natural preparation for all children to whatever Church they may hereafter belong. The colouring may vary to some extent with the doctrinal predilections of the teachers, but I believe that if teachers are trusted and left free, they will more and more realise that their work is to make children know and love the simplest and most beautiful portions of the Bible, and to let doctrinal explanations or deductions wait until the years of riper experience and wider thought.

HENRY GOW.

LONDON IN WHIT-WEEK.

SIR,—Mr. W. S. Tayler and I have undertaken to make arrangements for a few small conducted parties of Sunday-school teachers and members of our churches who are visiting London for the first time. The programme of places to be visited in Whit-week will depend upon the number who express a desire to be taken round, and I shall be glad to hear as soon as possible from those who intend to avail themselves of the offer. A list of places of interest, with the days and hours for conducted parties, may be consulted at Essex Hall on application to Mr. B. C. Hare, in the Book Room of the Sunday-school Association.

THE artists of earth, when they become creators of beautiful and glorious things, impress their own thought upon their workmanship, and make it what they please: if they fail the failure is theirs, and not in the rebellion or disobedience of the material with which they work; but when they become, not creators, but fathers, their children may turn against them. And it is even so with the Supreme Father. His works must obey Him; His children may rebel. Otherwise He must cease to be a Father, and be to us only what He is to material Nature, the Almighty Artist of our souls.—John Hamilton Thom.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

II.—PHILOSOPHY AND RELIGION.

SPECULATIVE philosophy is an attempt by efforts of pure reason to penetrate the nature of things, and to frame some explanation of those problems of being, and of thought, which are beyond the reach of science.

In Greece, which was its home, philosophy was first natural, then mental, then moral; theories of material things were succeeded by theories of the mind's ideas of things, and these by theories of practical life and conduct. Physics, Metaphysics, Ethics are the terms which still serve to distinguish these stages.

It is in the middle region of metaphysics that the domain of philosophy comes nearest to the domain of religion. It would be strange if speculation concerned itself with the nature of things, and had no conjecture concerning the nature of God. Nor would it be any gain to religion to be protected from the conjectures of philosophy. It is only by philosophic theory that the religious consciousness can express itself. If the theorising faculty never came into play, religion would fail to justify itself to reasoning minds. Just as scientific theories are endeavours to explain natural phenomena, so philosophic theories are endeavours to explain the facts of spiritual experience. Philosophy religiously in earnest passes into theology. Through this theology, or religious philosophy, some of the most powerful intellects of past ages expressed the best solutions they could offer of the questions which perplexed mankind; satisfying inquiry from within, and answering objection from without. So long as human thought is baffled, so long will it attempt reasoned explanations of the unknown. There are few doctrines that do not deserve attentive study and respect, and some day, perhaps, it will be thought a great an impertinence to denounce a religious theory as to quarrel with a scientific hypothesis. It is only when doctrine is pressed into authoritative statement, and is made a test of spiritual condition, that we have any right to demur. Philosophy, like science, has its own apportioned bounds, and by these it is prevented from encroaching upon those essential and abiding truths of religion which changing systems of thought can neither give nor take away.

UNION FOR SOCIAL SERVICE.

MISS CATHERINE GITTINS, Salisbury-road, Leicester, has been requested by the committee appointed to draw up the Constitution of the Union for Social Service, formed by resolution at a meeting at Manchester College, on April 20, and to say that they will be glad to receive names of those who desire to enrol themselves on the list of original members, in addition to the signatories of the declaration published in THE INQUIRER of November 25, 1905, and the friends who signified their willingness to join at the meeting mentioned above.

Names may be sent in to Miss Gittins as convener of the committee.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

HAVE you ever noticed the way the leaves seem to dance, and smile, and catch the sunshine to send it out again over a larger space? When walking in a wood have you looked up and seen how the top leaves take in the sunshine for the sake of the lower branches and trunks right down in the shade? Longfellow, who was very fond of children, described this in his poem on "Children;"—

Come to me, O ye children!

For I hear you at your play,
And the questions that perplexed me
Have vanished quite away.

Ye open the eastern windows,
That look towards the sun,
Where thoughts are singing swallows,
And the brooks of morning run.

In your hearts are the birds and the sunshine,
In your thoughts the brooklet's flow,

But in mine is the wind of Autumn,
And the first fall of the snow.

What the leaves are to the forest,
With light and air for food,
Ere their sweet and tender juices
Have been hardened into wood,—

That to the world are children;
Through them it feels the glow
Of a brighter and sunnier climate Than reaches the trunks below."

Let me tell you about some children I have known, children who seemed part of the sunshine itself almost—so bright were they—and yet they couldn't dance or play even! Some of them were lying, hour after hour, day after day, and week after week, on their backs, suffering much pain; and all were ill in some way. Yet they were so sunny and patient that the whole ward—for they were in hospital—was brighter and better for their being in it!

One little boy, called "Jimmy," who had always to lie on his back, and not even raise his head, used to sing at the top of his voice, and we loved to hear him. It used to amuse all the men, who were also in bed, and as evening came on perhaps some of them would even join in the chorus of "The Rag-man" (Jimmy's favourite song)—"Any rags, any bones, any bottles to-day, the same old story in the same old way,"—not much of a song, but it made many people happy.

Then there was a still smaller boy—also a "Jimmy"—who was much too ill to sing, and we had to lean down to catch the words that came from his weak little throat; but he could smile! Poor little man, and what a smile it was, his thin little face was all smile! He didn't seem to want much, but one thing he set his heart on. When he saw the boy in the next bed, who was able to get up, with a broad white collar, Jimmy longed for one, too. And while his nurse was away on a holiday, he sent a message to her to ask if she would bring him a collar! She gladly did so and watched him open the parcel. No words could describe his delight! It kept him happy for so long; he showed it to everybody who came near his bed; and, crowning joy—he put it on! When that new collar went on, over a new pale blue bed-jacket that the Sister put him in, lying there—as white as the collar that must have been so stiff and uncomfortable in bed round that thin little neck, he seemed to reach the height of bliss and the effect remained long after the collar had to come off—which was in about a quarter of an hour—and for many a day after.

Many people sigh and say, "It is a weary world"; but I shall always think of a little girl who must have really found it very weary in her short life; but how differently she said it! Having caught the expression from an older person, she often used to say, in her quaint way, a dimple in each cheek, a smile in her eyes, and her mouth in half-mock gravity:—"It's a weerie world," sometimes adding, "It's just as well to get your troubles over while you're young!" I think she will never find her trouble quite so hard as they would otherwise be, because even at eleven years of age she had learnt how to smile over them; and it is wonderful how a smile will lighten even a heavy load.

Then there was "King," quietly patient; earnest Leonard, thoughtful and sunny; little Baby Dorothy, who had not learnt to speak, but whose face became radiant with some happy light that so often shone through it. Little Bertie, who had not been in the world as long as four years, but who had had to lose an arm because of injuries caused by a traction-engine which had gone over it—he did regular gymnastics in his crib and over his bed-table in the calmest and steadiest way, his other arm and sturdy little legs making up for the loss of one arm, a placid smile on his little round face. He would even tell us, in his old-fashioned yet baby way, how the accident happened, and took it all as a matter of course. I think he will always take life calmly, and find some fun where many people miss it. I hope so.

Golden-haired little Georgie, who was only two and a half years old, but who had had several illnesses already in his life, was one of the solemn, large blue-eyed children who rarely smile, and he never sang, but he had a patient way of saying "Better soon"; and even when the doctor went his round and little Georgie had a bad few minutes in spite of the doctor's gentleness, in between the gasps still came his own comfort, "Bet-ter so-on." It reminded me of the little girl who always cheered herself after a fall or disappointment by cheerfully saying, "But never mind."

The last little boy I am going to tell you about is "Tommy." He is another singer, and his favourite song is, "We've had a good day to-day, hurray, hurray!" Now his days at that time meant lying on his back and bearing pain, though afterwards he was able to get about again; and all these children were away from father, mother, brothers, and sisters.

Now, if ever you are inclined to be cross or impatient or discontented because you haven't got everything you want, you who can run about and play, and have so many things to interest and amuse you, think of those children. And then forget all about yourself, but think what you can do to make a little more sunshine for someone else.

THE MORAL OF THE FRENCH ELECTIONS.

UNDER ordinary circumstances we should hardly feel justified in making special reference to a general election in another country. But the result of the recent appeal to the French people is too significant to be lightly passed by. The late Government in France made that appeal after a fairly long period of office during which, as usual, many things occurred that could easily be turned against the ministry by their opponents. But the head and front of their offending—at least, if we are to judge by the noise that reached us across the Channel—was the law by which the system of endowment of the churches set up by NAPOLEON a century ago was abolished. Here was a measure indeed to rouse the most violent feelings; and no pains appear to have been spared on the part of the clerical party to present the law in its most odious aspect, and to represent the Government as a band of confiscators of property which belonged to Heaven itself.

Nevertheless, the French people have voted so solidly in support of the promoters of this law that an immense majority of deputies has been returned in their favour; and many conjectures are being made as to the real significance of this result. Doubtless the social aspirations of the great mass of the people have played a great part in deciding the crisis. The electors have no confidence that the loud champions of militarism and "patriotism"—for there, as here, we see a group of men going about arrogating to themselves the title of patriots—will sympathize with the popular desire for practical reforms within the State itself. They look more hopefully to the other side, and, as we now see, not even the most impassioned appeals to their religious sympathies have moved them to desert the party of their hope.

Now, is there anything significant in all this for ourselves? Allowing, as we must, for differences of national temperament, and in the details of political life, are the two democracies that face each other, happily with friendly glances, across the Channel so diverse that no argument for the one can be based on the action of the other? For our own part we believe, rather, that at heart the popular feeling is much the same on both sides of the water. We should probably yield something in intensity to the French mood, both in its likes and dislikes, its aims and its aversions; and we may balance the account, if we like, with a claim for more doggedness of temperament over here, both to endure and to resolve. But our respective peoples are too closely akin to allow either to be viewed as independent of a common principle of social evolution. In particular, we may grant that the Roman Catholic domination in France has induced a bitterness of feeling against the priesthood which we in this country have no present occasion to share. We may believe also that the anti-theological reaction has proceeded farther, and spreads more widely there than here. At the same time it would be absurd to think of the French as if we and they lived on separate planets. If we simply face the facts we must admit that a very large proportion of our people are practically out of touch with the churches. And, what is more to the point, even among those who are attached more or less indefinitely to formal religious culture there is, we believe, far more enthusiasm for the cause of social reform than for any theology whatever.

If such an opinion be thought groundless, if it be maintained that there is no parity between the drift of feeling in the two democracies, there is one clear way of testing the point. Let our own Government, instead of ingeniously inventing ways to please all parties which please none, cut the knot of the "religious difficulty" in regard to the schools by a firm and clear refusal to endow any of the sects in regard to religious instruction. Of course, there will be a great outcry. We shall be told that the nation will thenceforward go down to atheism and all kinds of evil—although our own colonies and the United States of America have not as yet sunk very far below us in morality, in spite of their secular systems. We shall also be told that the people of England will not stand it, and violent efforts will certainly be made to make the prophecy come true. And yet our confidence is that our people would, by a great majority, accept this solution as the most just and sensible one; and it would not be for passing such a law that they would withdraw their support from those to whom they look for substantial measures of social progress. We could almost believe, indeed, that the bulk of the electors would view with comparative equanimity the disestablishment of the Church.

ARRIVAL OF DR. TUDOR JONES AT WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND.

WELCOME AND OPENING SERVICES.

BY A WELLINGTON UNITARIAN.

FAR distant though we appear to you amid the rush and congestion of your way of life, we in New Zealand are all unconscious of our aloofness. We keep in close touch with you. We have a good deal of what we may call the news of the world a few hours in advance of you, and everything that is of general interest to the cives of the Empire or the world reaches us within a few hours, at latest, of reaching you. We, of course, forego much by hiving-off from the dear old mother-country, but after a few years' experience of the conditions of life obtaining under the genial Southern Cross, we feel, as a rule, more than compensated for all we have "foregone." Here we see the "promise of the future," a "vision of the world," and the "wonder that will be," under conditions that the great majority of our "home-keeping" Britishers can scarcely hope to dream of. We miss much, but rarely feel home-sick. Those of us who are parents would feel that we were doing our children an irreparable injustice were we to return to the home of our fathers. Our worst "climate" is as good as your best. Poverty, in the Old Country sense of the term, is practically unknown among us. Even in the matter of literary and æsthetic interests we are not under such handicap as many of you seem to suppose. All your best literature reaches us a few weeks after publication, and the best thought of the great American continent reaches us about the same time as it reaches you. Our people enjoy larger leisure and are freer from the "yoke of necessity" than the majority of "home" friends, and so are in a position to make good use of such literary and æsthetic privileges as offer. Our geographical detachment tends to keep us physiologically and socially "select," while our general way of life ("far from the madding crowd" as we are) affords us opportunity for thought and work that should in the near future be fruitful of result in letters, in art, and in science.

Even in religion there is, among us, such a detachment from the yoke of tradition and authority as is full of promise for the future. What many of your scholars get from the study of Comparative Religion, we get in a practical way as part of our everyday experience. We have, too, a considerable number of able divines who keep in touch with the theological thought-movements of Western Europe. The New Zealand Outlook (more especially its monthly literary supplement) puts it beyond dispute that we have among our New Zealand Nonconformists a number of divines who are friends of liberal religion; yea, who are Unitarian in all but name. In the circumstances the future of Unitarianism is all the more promising. Such are the conditions which Dr. Tudor Jones, who comes to us with the highest credentials from the friends of liberal religion in the old country and Germany, finds obtaining among us.

We Unitarians of Wellington were on the tiptoe of expectation for some days prior to his arrival. We knew from the day of his sailing from London that he and Mrs. Jones would reach Wellington between March 25 and 27. We are apprised here (ten to twelve hours before their arrival) of the approach to our port of all direct liners. Hence some twenty-five of the leading Unitarians of Wellington (whose business engagements permitted of their doing so) turned up at the Queen's Wharf to accord Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones a hearty welcome. The Gothic steamed up the harbour about 1 p.m. on Monday, March 26, and anchored in the stream for inspection by the health officer, Dr. Pollen, who got aboard the stately liner as soon as she came to anchor. Professor Mackenzie, of Victoria University College, accompanied the health officer, and was privileged to offer Dr. and Mrs. Jones, on behalf of the Unitarians of Wellington, a hearty welcome to New Zealand; and in less than an hour later had the honour of introducing Dr. Jones and his genial partner to some twenty-five representative Unitarians at the Queen's Wharf. The reception was of the most cordial character. The occasion was an eventful one in Unitarian circles, as in that of the friends of liberal thought and religion. Dr. and Mrs. Jones seemed to feel quite at home among their friends from the very first. As soon as the Doctor and his lady, with their portable belongings were got through the Customs, without (so far as the writer knows) even the most militant Unitarian literature imported being placed on the "Index Expurgatorius," the whole party were entertained at afternoon tea. Thereafter Dr. and Mrs. Jones were driven by Lady Stout, wife of the Chief Justice of the Colony, to the suite of rooms provided for their temporary accommodation.

The Doctor and Mrs. Jones looked well. They had had, on the whole, a pleasant voyage. They must have had the usual mixed feelings and conflict of emotions incident to leaving friends of long standing and tried worth, and coming to a country and a people that were but little more than a name to them. Whatever misgivings they may have had on their way out must have soon disappeared on their finding themselves among the Unitarians of Wellington. Dr. Mason, the chief officer of the Health Department of the Colony, who was a fellow-passenger by the Gothic, had done much to relieve the tedium of their long journey, and also to enlighten and reassure them as to the condition of life, as of things in general in the Colony.

A "social" to welcome Dr. and Mrs. Jones was held on Thursday, March 29, at which many prominent citizens of Wellington were present. The greatest enthusiasm prevailed, and Dr. Jones made a highly favourable impression. The audience felt that they had come by a minister who had been in touch with the best minds of our time, and who would be an influence in the community. Dr. Jones has a high sense of his calling. We all felt that sincerity, reverence, and charity are "writ large" in his soul. We cannot, therefore, doubt that his mission among us will be attended with the greatest success.

Here is the account of the "Social" which appeared in the Wellington Evening Post of the following day. [Of this account some passages are appended.—Ed. Inq.]

On the following day Dr. and Mrs. Jones were among the guests of the Council of Victoria University College, at the opening of the new University buildings by the Governor, and were introduced to quite a number of prominent citizens.

On Sunday, April 1, Dr. Jones began his ministry among us. He preached in the morning at 11, and in the evening at 7. Over a hundred people were present in the morning and nearly three hundred in the evening. Both services were highly appreciated. In the evening Dr. Jones took as his subject "The Message of Modern Unitarianism and its Need To-day." The service was very impressive. The sincerity, the enthusiasm with which the preacher dealt with his "message," the modesty and self-suppression of his manner, and the familiarity with the best minds and thought of Western Europe evinced, were the subject of general comment after the service. In Dr. Jones we have a man who can touch Unitarianism with emotion and make it a living force in our midst.

We are under incalculable obligation to you, our Unitarian friends in England for securing us the services of one who has already (we are amply convinced) proved himself capable of achieving great things for liberal religion in Wellington and the Colony generally.

THE WELCOME MEETING.

There was a large gathering in St. Peter's School-room on Thursday evening, March 29, to welcome the Rev. Tudor Jones, Ph.D., and Mrs. Jones to Wellington. Among those who took part in the welcome were the Rev. W. Jellie, B.A., and Mrs. Jellie, of Auckland, who had an adventurous journey, and only just arrived in time. When they sailed from Auckland they were met by such a storm on the West Coast that their boat was obliged to put back. On the East there was a quieter sea, and they were there just in time to get a boat that took them round to Napier, where they arrived on the Thursday morning, some 200 miles from Wellington. Then taking the train and travelling all day, they reached Wellington at 7.15, just in time for the meeting. Mr. Jellie, as our readers are aware, is the only other Unitarian minister in New Zealand. The gathering was strongly representative of the intellectual forces of the city, and much enthusiasm was displayed during the evening in the hearty reception offered to Dr. and Mrs. Jones. An apology for his unavoidable absence was sent by the Rev. W. A. Evans, who wrote that he had no doubt that Dr. Jones would be an addition to the religious and ethical forces of the city. A congratulatory letter was also received from the Sydney Unitarian Church.

Mr. JOHN GAMMELL, B.A. (Lond.), presided, and after an opening programme of music, gave an earnest address, telling of the rise of the Unitarian movement in Wellington, and setting forth the claims and aspirations of Unitarianism. Theirs was an unmuzzled church, he said, with a minister free from ecclesiastical control, and it was needed that men might have room to grow, both intellectually and religiously. An up-to-date church was the need of the time, and in Dr. Jones they had a well-equipped leader. Dr. Jones and Mrs. Jones were then formally welcomed.

Sir ROBERT STOUT added his welcome, and said he did not think Dr. and Mrs. Jones would regret their coming to Wellington. One of the weaknesses of colonial life was the failure of our young men to think for and assert themselves intellectually. The national life in New Zealand was stronger forty years ago than it was to-day. To-day the people were fonder of sport than of truth, and our young people wanted intellectual training and wisdom in order to cope with the problems of the day. This work the church under Dr. Jones should help to carry out.

The Rev. W. JELLIE offered a hearty welcome to the newcomers on behalf of the Auckland Church.

Replying, Dr. JONES made an earnest and thoughtful speech, marked with modesty and broad-mindedness. He had already found himself, he said, in the midst of many able men, and trusted they would work together for the up-building of themselves and their fellows. They had a religion which was capable of satisfying the whole nature of man. The time had come for the most modern knowledge on theology and religion. On behalf of himself and Mrs. Jones he thanked them for their hearty reception.

Subsequently, greatly to his surprise, a presentation was made to Mr. Gammell of the cosy armchair in which he had been sitting, and of a student lamp, as a mark of the esteem in which he is held by the congregation.

The meeting was altogether full of encouragement for the future.

An Auckland paper, of a somewhat earlier date, gives the following account of the annual meeting of the Unitarian Church in that city:—

The annual business meeting of the church members was held on the 14th inst., when very encouraging reports of the year's work were read and adopted. The annual balance-sheet showed that the church was in a healthy condition financially; for, notwithstanding the increased expenditure during the year, the income was equal to the demands, and there were respectable credit balances to carry forward. A very hearty vote of thanks was accorded to the Rev. and Mrs. Jellie, who, at a previous meeting, were the recipients of a handsome marble timepiece from the congregation. Special reference was made to the church at Wellington, and the expected arrival of Dr. Jones, their new minister. The following resolution was unanimously approved:—"That the Auckland Unitarian Church, assembled in annual meeting, gives cordial greeting to the brethren in Wellington, and particularly to the Rev. W. Tudor Jones, Ph.D., and Mrs. Jones, on their assumption of work in this Colony. Believing that Unitarianism has a message of good for the advanced thinkers of our time, we rejoice in the prospect of extending usefulness now opened, and we wish the new minister and his people every success."

HUMAN improvement never wants the means where the purpose of it is deep and earnest in the soul.—Channing.

TOWARDS SOCIAL REFORM.

THE HOUSING QUESTION.

MR. JOHN S. NETTLEFOLD, Chairman of the Housing Committee of the Birmingham City Council, has embodied the results of much practical work in a booklet* that cannot fail to be of interest to all who care about the condition of the labouring classes. He has worked personally at the better housing of the poor in Birmingham, and has studied what has been done by others both at home and in Germany in the same field of action, and he has come to certain definite conclusions.

Municipal building is not recommended. Municipal houses are often let at cheaper rents than the surrounding houses, but this can only be done by making a loss on the transaction, which loss falls on the rate-payers. The charge on the rates for certain municipally built houses in Birmingham is as much as 2s. 8d. per tenement per week. Therefore, the many are taxed for the benefit of the few. High rates press most severely on those just above the poverty line, and often push them below it, so that it is very important to keep the rates down.

The people who occupy these artificially cheapened houses are generally not the very poorest, for whom they are intended. You cannot inquire into a man's income before accepting him as a tenant, and if smallness of income were made a reason for giving a man the right to a rate-aided house it would only be an inducement to idleness.

Another strong reason against the municipality erecting buildings is that it stops private enterprise. "No one can compete with rate-aided competition, and the total result is that every house built by the local authority stops at least four being built by other people, which means that municipal house-building will eventually decrease rather than increase the supply of houses in proportion to the demand." Whereas it is only by having a supply of houses in excess of the demand that tenants have a fair chance of getting what they require at a reasonable price.

Much can be done with advantage in the way of "mending" so as to preserve cheap houses for those who cannot afford higher rent.

The work of the Birmingham Housing Committee involves much labour and personal attention to details. It is done under Part II. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890. The procedure is as follows:—

Houses are represented to the Housing Committee by the Medical Officer of Health as being unfit for habitation. The members of the committee then visit the houses, and afterwards serve notices on the owners to make such houses fit, and often see the owners personally so as to make what is required of them quite clear. The Housing Committee endeavour to work in harmony with the property owners, and only take extreme measures when forced, and a considerable time is always allowed to elapse after the notices have been served, to allow the owners time to do the repairs themselves before closing orders are applied for.

In the case of confined courts, one or more houses are pulled down to give light and air and free access to the street, and there are interesting photographs in the pamphlet showing courts before and after they have been dealt with in this manner. Every house is dealt with on its own merits, with careful attention to detail and consideration of the interests of both owner and tenant, therefore the negotiations often take a considerable time. Yet the record of work done from January, 1902, to June, 1905, is very considerable. No less than 2,365 houses were represented as unfit for habitation. Of these, 560 have been rendered habitable. In every case the sanitary arrangements which were very bad have been brought up to date; 283 houses are being repaired, 258 have been demolished, in 1,254 cases the notices are unexpired, and closing orders were obtained for 589 houses.

Thirty-three courts have been opened out by a removal of 60 houses at a cost to the corporation of £1,400, and at a cost to the owners, including repairs done to houses in the courts, of £15,260, showing an expenditure by the owners of over £10 for every £1 spent by the corporation. These figures apply exclusively to courts that have been opened out by removing buildings.

It is noteworthy that the tenants in very many cases remain in the mended houses, willingly paying a little more rent for the sake of better and healthier homes.

Mr. Nettlefold speaks strongly in favour of Miss Hill's system of weekly rent collecting by ladies, dwelling on the influence for good these ladies are able to exert, as they become trusted friends of the tenants, and are able to advise and help them in many ways. Money help is rarely given, but help in the form of work is now and then contrived to enable them to pay the rent when times are bad.

The Housing Committee of the Birmingham City Council has gone carefully into the question of whether or not drink is largely responsible for creating slums, and the result of evidence given to them by missionaries, relieving officers, school attendance officers, and others who work in the slums, goes to show that it is. Interesting quotations are given to this effect, as for instance—Mr. A. H. Barker, Birmingham City Mission: "To a very large extent drink is the cause of this state of things, and no housing reform will be of the slightest use until temperance reform is advocated more vigorously than it is at the present time."

The evidence given before the Glasgow Municipal Commission on the housing of the poor contains striking statements to the same effect. J. R. Motion, inspector and clerk of Glasgow Parish, says: "Drink, premature marriages, and gambling are the main causes of pauperism. Again, if we could get rid of the drunken and immoral people there would be very few to provide for, as far as housing is concerned; 95 per cent. of crime is caused by drink."

Miss M. B. Blackie, Glasgow Kyrle Society, says: "Drink is the root of the housing problem. If we had less public-houses we should require less police."

Mr. J. W. Addiscott, Chief Inspector of Nuisances, Plymouth, says: "If one half only of the money spent on drink and self-indulgence was spent on the house there would be no housing problem."

Mr. John Burns, M.P., says: "The one supreme remedy immediately at hand is for the overcrowded to drink less and to think more."

Mr. Nettlefold, being much struck by this evidence, made careful personal inquiries on the subject of drinking habits when visiting the houses represented to the Housing Committee as unfit for habitation, and he says: "Time after time I have found the inhabitants of small and dirty houses to be in actual receipt of large wages. Where little or nothing is spent on drink the houses and the children are cleaner and more respectable, even when wages are low, than where there is plenty of money spent on the parents' drink." He also found that the drinking tenants soon made their houses dirty again when they had been repaired.

He also came to the conclusion that diminishing temptations by reducing the number of public-houses to "the legitimate needs of the neighbourhood would help very much indeed towards the removal of the present unhappy housing conditions." In certain small areas of Birmingham this has been done, under the "Birmingham Surrender Scheme," with marked good results, so much so that, to use the graphic words of a local brewer, "The Birmingham Surrender Scheme had to be stopped because it was reducing the consumption of drink," and a great agitation put an end to it. The plan of this scheme was to select an area and value the licensed houses upon it. It was then determined which of these houses should be surrendered, and the owners received compensation from the owners of the houses which remained. Mr. Arthur Chamberlain describes this scheme fully in a pamphlet published by Cornish Brothers. Mr. Nettlefold concludes the pages of his pamphlet that deal with drink licences by an appeal to politicians to thoroughly study the drink question, as it affects the housing problem, and, regardless of political and social influences, to "strike bravely at the root of a great evil that causes so much misery. . . . No excuse of ignorance or apathy, or of financial, social, or political influence will relieve from blame those responsible for the present licensing conditions in England. If better housing and kindred work are to make any headway these unnecessary temptations to drink must be removed."

The difficulty of obtaining enough land at a reasonable price is another reason why the housing question is such a serious one, and while Mr. Nettlefold admits the difficulty of altering our land laws, he considers that it ought to be done, and that probably the best plan would be to tax the value of land at the price the owners put upon it, and to give local authorities power to buy the land at that price. Local authorities could then buy land at fair instead of at exorbitant prices, and could let it out to building societies or to private individuals. The Town Council could then control the kind of buildings to be erected, and they could make comprehensive plans for the laying out of land, reserving a sufficiency of open spaces, and thus prevent the rapid creating of new slums which is perpetually going on around our large towns.

* "A Housing Policy," By John S. Nettlefold. (Cornish Brothers, 37, New-street, Birmingham. Price 6d.)

In Germany the towns themselves own land to a large extent, and with eminently satisfactory results. Ulm, for instance, has managed its land so well that it has been able to spend large sums on new schools, new streets, &c., without increasing its rates. In May, 1905, the Birmingham City Council Housing Committee decided to send a deputation to Germany to find out exactly what is done, and how it is carried through.

Other points touched on in this interesting little book are the necessity of altering bye-laws so that they shall not unduly raise the cost of building cottages, as is often the case now, and the importance of a fair day's work on the part of the men employed in building. Given cheap land and reasonable bye-laws, still, if the men who actually build the cottage do their work slowly under the idea that thereby they make more work for other men, the cottage will be dearer than it ought to be, and therefore fewer cottages will be built. Mr. Lever, of Port Sunlight, said in 1902 that cottages which thirteen years ago cost £200, now cost £330 for this reason alone, and this along with the land question he considered to be at the root of the housing question to-day.

Mr. Nettlefold's little book is so practical, so evidently the work of one who has studied this difficult subject from the inside as well as the outside, that it should be widely read. For—as he says in his own concluding words—“the time has come for the people of England to refuse to allow important and urgent domestic questions to be any longer neglected, even for the sake of our children across the seas. No empire can be in a really safe, sound, and satisfactory condition unless the heart of that empire is pure and healthy.”

OBITUARY.

MR. FREDERIC JOHN BROOME.

As we go to press news reaches us of the death, on Saturday last at Llandudno, of this venerable member of our Sale community. His gentleness, courtesy, and uprightness rendered him conspicuous amid a wide circle of friendly and business acquaintances; and it may be truly said of him that he “adorned the gospel which he professed.” He had nearly attained the age of eighty, and for thirty years was Commissioner of Income Tax.

MR. A. S. WRIGHT.

THE congregation at Filby, near Yarmouth, has recently lost its oldest member in the death of Mr. A. S. Wright, in his 99th year. He was all his life connected with the Old Meeting, and interested to the last in its welfare. The funeral was on Thursday last, and was largely attended. The Rev. J. Birks conducted the service, the first part in the chapel, which was filled, and the second part in the churchyard. Several friends were present from Yarmouth.

THE CAPERNAUM AQUEDUCT.

SIR,—Adverting again to Mr. Tarrant's article in your issue of the 5th inst. I should like to add a Capernaum note to the Bethsaida note which you have done me the honour of printing.

The passage to which I take exception is as follows:—“Simply as a matter of evidence it must be said that if ever the rock-cut passage was a channel for water, the present contours of the hillside, with a track leading to it on each side, are entirely out of level, and I failed to see how any stream of water could have been conveyed that way. On the south side, too, where the ruins are . . . there is no trace of the continuance of the ‘aqueduct.’”

The interest attaching to this rock-cut channel arises from the belief that it was through this that the stream “et-Tabigha,” the largest stream in Galilee, was conveyed into the plain of Gennesaret. If this belief is well-founded, there can scarcely be a doubt that et-Tabigha is that fountain “called Capharnaum,” of which Josephus said that it “watered the plain throughout.” But Mr. Tarrant seems to think that “the contours of the hillside” forbid the idea.

Now, there are two very strong pieces of evidence in favour of the aqueduct, and against Mr. Tarrant's negative judgment. The first is that the late Sir Charles Wilson, who conducted the Ordnance Survey of Galilee, actually traced the remains of the aqueduct both on the north and south sides of the rock. It will be simplest to give Sir Charles's own words. They are as follows:—“Connected with this fountain are the remains of some remarkable works which at one time raised its waters to a higher level, and conveyed them bodily into the plain of Gennesareth for the purposes of irrigation. The source is enclosed in an octagonal reservoir of great strength, by means of which the water was raised about twenty feet to the level of an aqueduct that ran along the side of the hill. . . . After leaving the reservoir the aqueduct can be traced at intervals following the contour of the ground to the point where it crossed the beds of two water courses on arches, of which the piers may still be seen; it then turns down towards the lake, and runs along the hillside on the top of a massive retaining wall, of which fifty or sixty yards remain; and, lastly, passes round the Khan Minyeh cliff by a remarkable excavation in the solid rock, which has been noticed by all travellers.”* Sir Charles goes on to say that it was traced on the south side for a few hundred yards inland.

The second piece of evidence is from “The Voyages of Master Iohn Sanderson,” in “Purchas's Pilgrims.” I am astonished that this passage has not attracted more attention. Macgregor of the “Rob Roy” is the only writer I know of who refers to it, and he by no means fully appreciates its significance. Master Sanderson visited el-Minyeh and his description seems to me something like proof that the rock-cut aqueduct was actually in operation as late as A.D. 1601.

Sir Chas. Warren confirmed Sir Charles Wilson's observations in 1877, but Colonel Conder in 1882, doubted them. One element of doubt was that which I fondly hoped Mr. Tarrant might have helped in removing. Wilson and Warren both found that the reservoir containing the spring would, before it was ruined, have given sufficient fall to carry the water into the rock-cut trough; but Conder found that the level of the channel “as far as could be judged by observations taken with an Abney's level, seems to be possibly ten or twenty feet above the top of the reservoir.” It is surprising that, so far as I can discover, this crucial point has never yet been settled. When I was in Palestine I visited the octagonal reservoir, and I should say that the difference between the pronouncements is probably due to a difference of estimate as to how high the reservoir was in its original condition. I trust, however, that next time any of our friends goes to Gennesaret and Tabigha, he will take a level with him and have time to make some careful observations.

To the general reader these topographical questions may seem to be of little interest. But it is by means of them alone that we can hope to construct a vivid picture of the home of Jesus. Such a reconstruction I have attempted in a work which is now awaiting a publisher. If it should ever see the light, their bearing, and, I hope, their justification, will perhaps more plainly appear.

HERBERT RIX.

MESADIYEH AND KHAN MINYEH.

SIR,—Careful students will share my thanks to Mr. Herbert Rix for his two very valuable letters (including the above) on these subjects, and they will wish earnestly for the publication of his book. His intimate knowledge of the topography and literature concerned make one wish that it had been he and not I who lately wandered in these parts. I can only give the evidence of my eyes, and that I have endeavoured to do faithfully.

Sir Charles Wilson's authority is conclusive, and yet I am surprised that he was able to trace the Khan Minyeh “Aqueduct” inland from the rock-cut passage for “a few hundred yards.” This was a portion of the site that we closely examined, and certainly no substructures of such a work were visible between the passage and the walls of the Khan. Possibly they are to be found beyond, i.e., to the west of the present walls. These are built of materials evidently previously used, and they include some notable blocks of marble. Fragments of marble of various sizes lie on the grassy slopes around and below the Khan, which is a square enclosure of (I should say) forty yards front, and contains ruins of dwellings of a rude type. The most interesting suggestion to me is that the hillside to the north, on the eastern cliff of which, looking toward the lake, the cutting is found, may be “the mount” where the Great Sermon, or its nucleus, was spoken. There is no such elevation near Tell Hum, the more generally accepted site of Capernaum.

As to Mesadiyeh, a village might have been there at any time, as now. It could never have been a large place, I think, for though Mr. Rix has a photograph, which he has kindly shown me, in which the spit-of land is fairly elevated above the lake, this must be due to a very dry season, such as occurred when his visit was made. When we stepped ashore it was from the boat on to the grass, and all the ground was marshy except close up to the huts.

Supposing this village to be one of the fourteen which Josephus says lay about Julias, we may think it possible that the name "Bethsaida" clung to it after the "village" (κώμη) of that name was raised to the rank of a "city" and called Julias, the ruins of which are recognised at El-Tell, several miles off, a little way up the Jordan. This possibility is heightened, of course, if this particular village was in some way (perhaps as a fishing harbour) recognised as the head of group. But that it could ever be called a "city" (Luke ix. 10) seems to me only possible by a very loose application of the term.

I wish I could have seen some sculptured material in the walls of the huts at Mesadiyeh, or some mounds around; but whatever may have been there once, the actual look of things now is as I described in my letter to you.

W. G. TARRANT.

THE VAN.

IN response to a cordial invitation from the minister, the Mission Van arrived at Warrington on Saturday night from Earlstown for open-air service on Sunday. The Rev. Harvey-Cook had taken the chair at the evening meetings throughout the week at Lymm and Earlstown, and on the Sunday conducted the ordinary services in the ancient chapel in Cairo-street, preaching in the morning a powerful sermon on "Empire day" to a congregation of about fifty. Announcing the advent of the van he invited his people to attend at Bridge Foot by three o'clock, when he took charge of the proceedings, supported on the platform of the Van by the Rev. F. Francis Matthews, of the Latchford Baptist Chapel, who spoke generously commendatory of our new venture. It had been raining all morning, but the rain, though threatening, held off during the afternoon. Mrs. Harvey-Cook presided at the harmonium, and in the singing of the hymns was assisted by some fifty ladies and twenty gentlemen connected with the chapel. The "pitch" or site was most appropriately selected, for it was facing the Warrington Academy, the birth-place of Manchester College, containing a portrait of Gilbert Wakefield, the great-great-grandfather of the resident Van-missioner. Wakefield was an enthusiastic Unitarian who died a martyr to the cause of political and religious liberty. The crowd was larger than at any previous meeting, sometimes exceeding 200. Much literature was given away, and was eagerly accepted. After the evening service at Cairo-street, attended by a large congregation of at least 200, Mr. Cook again conducted the van meeting, which lasted till 9 o'clock, and in spite of the coldness of the weather proved an immense success. Some 70 Unitarians were known to have been present, another 400 outsiders thronged the Van for the greater part of the service, probably between 900 and 1,000 people hearing something from the speaker. Many hundreds of copies of Unity and tracts supplied by the B. and F., were carried away by thoughtful and interested people, of whom the larger proportion were men of the wage-earning class, several known to be socialists.

WESTERN UNION OF UNITARIAN AND FREE CHRISTIAN CHURCHES.

ANNUAL ASSEMBLY.

THE sixtieth annual meeting of the Union was held at Sidmouth on Thursday, May 10, and will be remembered as one of the most pleasant and encouraging gatherings in the history of the society. Kind arrangements for the day were hospitably made by the minister at Sidmouth, and by the members of the congregation, special acknowledgment being due to Miss Julia Barnby for her unremitting and effective assistance.

Divine service was held at the Old Meeting, where a large congregation assembled. The devotional service was conducted by the Rev. Edgar I. Fripp, of Clifton, and the preacher was the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, who spoke from Joshua xxiv. 15: "Choose ye this day whom ye will serve." He pointed out that in Dante's "Inferno" the spiritual hideousness of heresy was its arrogance and its isolation. There was a danger in the present day of a narrow spiritual provincialism; nay, spiritual parochialism of the most narrowing kind. They said they were not afraid of truth, not because they believed truth to be on their side, but because they wished to be on the side of truth. Their desire was for truth rather than belief. They were in danger of being narrower; they had an opportunity of being wider. As they extended their sympathies and enlarged their knowledge so their opportunities would increase. Their opportunity of breadth of sympathy, their combination of the sense of home with the sense of universal sympathy, should make them tolerant in the widest sense. They should realise that those things which they had sacrificed, and were willing to sacrifice, for the pearl which was to them of great price had other values for other minds; that the thing which to Unitarians was a worn-out symbol and negation might be to others a hold by which they could cling to the central realities. They must be tolerant, and they must not ask for success, as commonly conceived. What was success? There was no failure if they served the Lord. The only success they ought to value was the success of holding open a spiritual possibility to others which might else be closed, and not numerical or external signs of success. The existence of free Christian communities, however weak and neglected, kept open that possibility. How deeply it was needed many of them know, all of them might guess.

After the service, luncheon was held at the small Manor Hall, when a large company sat down under the presidency of Mr. Dennis B. Squire, of Sidmouth.

The health of the King having been cordially proposed and received, the Rev. Jeffery Worthington proposed, and the Rev. Walter Lloyd acknowledged, the time-honoured sentiment of "Civil and Religious Liberty, all the world over."

Mr. J. Kenrick Champion, as hon. treasurer of the Union, gave hearty expression to the thanks due to the Sidmouth friends for their generous hospitality that day.

The annual assembly was afterwards held in the Old Meeting. The chair was taken by the President of the Union, the Rev. John McDowell, of Bath. The roll was then called, and in his opening address, the PRESIDENT said he had long had a feeling that in their wide, geographical area, where the congregations were so very widely scattered, a little more frequent visiting on the part of their officials, a little more preaching on the part of their older ministers from Sunday to Sunday, would be regarded by those congregations as a great kindness, and might also be a great help. Having tried that experiment it had made his year of presidency one of the most delightful year's work that he had experienced for many years. There could not be a doubt in the minds of any who might visit the congregations constituting that Union that there was a great deal of vitality in them.

The Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD, in presenting the committee's report, thankfully acknowledged the faithful and efficient services of the district minister, the Rev. Rudolf Davis, the careful work of Miss Julia Barnby in the management of the Postal Mission, and the self-sacrificing work so willingly performed by the lay preachers of the district.

In their report the committee stated that they had endeavoured to the best of their ability to foster the interests of those congregations in the district which needed the friendly support of the Union; and they desired to bear thankful testimony to the co-operation which they had enjoyed with the committee of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. From the foundation of the Western Union its name had been found on the subscription list of the Association, whilst at the present time the links that united the two societies were as strong as ever. The committee were happy to report also an increase of friendly co-operation between themselves and the congregations that sought their help. The returns which such congregations had made as to their position and prospects had revealed a complete and fraternal recognition on their part of the purposes of the Union. The scheme initiated last year for the amalgamation of the work hitherto carried on by the congregations of Plymouth and Devonport had had a fair trial, through the efforts of the Rev. J. H. Belcher, throughout the past year. The committee noted with satisfaction a decidedly more hopeful outlook for the Plymouth congregation, but in that advance the Devonport congregation had unfortunately not shared as was once hoped. The Rev. John Belcher was now concentrating his efforts at Plymouth, while the congregation at Devonport was, for the present, dependent on lay help for the sustentation of religious worship. A course of special services, with the view of spreading their principles and doctrines, had been held with much advantage at Newton Abbot.

treasurer, in presenting the annual balance-sheet, was able to make a hopeful and encouraging statement. The somewhat large debt with which the past year had opened had, through the generosity of several friends, been more than wiped out. The subscriptions and collections had distinctly improved, and he looked forward very hopefully to the work of the coming year, in view of which he advocated the gathering in of many small subscriptions, as evidencing a wider, as well as a more satisfactory, foundation for the work of the Union.

On the motion of Mr. T. Alfred Colfox, seconded by the Rev. A. E. O'Connor, the reports, after open discussion, were unanimously adopted.

Major-General Jacob proposed, and the Rev. E. Parry seconded, the election of the officers and committee, Mr. H. E. Thomas being the new president. The other officers were re-elected.

The Assembly approved the grants for the ensuing year recommended by the committee; these being moved by the President, and seconded by the Hon. Treasurer.

Mr. G. Philpott, of Taunton, then moved, and the Rev. J. Wain, of Trowbridge, seconded a hearty vote of thanks to the preacher and supporter for their most acceptable services that day.

The resolution was fittingly acknowledged by the Rev. Edgar I. Fripp, and by the Rev. Philip H. Wicksteed, who dwelt especially upon his by-gone, and very happy, association with his old friends of the Taunton congregation and his brother ministers in the West.

Mr. C. M. Taylor proposed, and the Rev. A. Lancaster seconded, a motion of hearty welcome to the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie as the representative of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, of whose varied work Mr. Bowie gave the meeting an interesting glimpse. He took occasion also to express his sense of the earnestness and life happily observable in the West.

The Rev. Walter Lloyd, of Gloucester, was appointed representative of the Western Union to the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and the Rev. J. McDowell as a representative of the Union on the Triennial Conference Committee.

The Rev. Jeffery Worthington moved, Mr. W. Matthews seconded, and it was heartily and unanimously resolved: "That the sincere thanks of the members of the Western Union be accorded to the Rev. John McDowell for his most helpful services, as President of the Union, during the past year."

The President, in acknowledging the vote, referred to the pleasure which he had found in his endeavours to bring the congregations of the district into even closer knowledge and sympathy, both in regard to each other, and to the committee and officers of the Union.

Mr. C. H. Truman, of Newton Abbot, having offered a warm invitation to the Union to hold the next annual assembly there, the business of the meeting concluded.

Tea was then served in the Old Meeting schoolroom, where a public meeting, which was numerous attended, was held at seven o'clock, when the chairman (the Rev. J. McDowell) was supported by the Revs. W. Copeland Bowie, P. H. Wicksteed, H. S. Solly, Rudolf Davis, J. H. Belcher, Walter Lloyd and A. N. Blatchford, Major-General Jacob, Messrs. D. B. Squire and J. Kenrick Champion.

The Rev. W. Copeland Bowie (representing the British and Foreign Unitarian Association) said he was recently a member of a conference of twelve to consider the Education Bill. Those sitting around the table represented Anglicans, Nonconformists, Positivists, and Unitarians. He suggested to the conference that if they wished to seek a settlement, the only thing to do was to put aside for a moment their own individual theories and special views, and to try to fix their minds on the parents and the children who were to be served by the schools. It was very interesting to notice that when that line was taken how very soon those twelve—Anglicans, Nonconformists, Positivists, and Unitarians—came to a common conclusion.

The Rev. H. S. Solly, in an address on the Education Bill, pointed to the opposition of the Bishops, and said in his opinion the attitude they had taken was disastrous. He believed that if we arrived at a system of purely secular education it would be the Bishop's work. Unitarians supported Bible teaching, but if they were to have secular teaching they would accept it.

The Revs. Rudolf Davis, Walter Lloyd, and J. H. Belcher afterwards spoke.

GENERAL BAPTIST ASSEMBLY.

THE 253rd annual meeting was held at Billingshurst (Sussex) on Tuesday and Wednesday, May 15 and 16. The proceedings commenced on Tuesday 15, with a public service, the devotional part being taken by the Rev. J. J. Marten, of Horsham, the sermon being delivered by the Rev. J. Wain, of Trowbridge, the text consisting of John ix. 25. This was followed by a Communion Service, at which the Rev. S. Burrows presided. There was a large gathering present.

Wednesday, 16, opened with a short devotional service, after which a vote of thanks was given to the retiring president, Rev. A. J. Marchant, followed by the opening address by the new president, the Rev. J. Watmough.

A cordial welcome was given to the Rev. C. Ginever, B.A., of Dover, on his introduction as an Elder of the Assembly. Also to Rev. J. J. Marten, as representing the Provincial Assembly, and other friends.

The roll of the Assembly was then called. Letters from the various churches were read by the Secretary, followed by the committee's annual report. The Messengers then gave brief statements of their work during the past year.

The committee was re-elected, as also the Rev. C. A. Hoddinott as the general secretary. The Rev. A. J. Marchant having resigned the treasurership, a very hearty vote of thanks was passed for his previous services, and Rev. S. Burrows was elected to fill the office.

At the close of the business proceedings a debate on public questions took place, resulting in the following resolutions:—

Education Bill.—"That this meeting expresses its unqualified approval of the present Government's attempt to find a settlement of the vexed education question, but is of opinion that the only satisfactory solution will be the adoption of the principle of pure secular teaching." Copies of the resolution to be sent to the Right Hon. Sir H. Campbell-Bannerman, the Right Hon. Augustine Birrell, K.C., M.P., and to two daily newspapers.

Rating of Places of Worship.—A resolution was also passed with reference to the present unsatisfactory state of the law in the matter of rating, or otherwise, of places of worship, as illustrated by the present attitude of the Paddington Council toward Dr. Clifford, and urging upon the Government the introduction of a short Bill for the relief of Dissenters in this connection. This resolution was sent to the Right Hon. Sir Campbell-Bannerman, the Right Hon. John Burns, and to two daily newspapers.

MUSINGS.

BY A MINISTER.

XL.

THE dog in Scripture is not an engaging animal, but that is not his fault. He can only be what he is allowed to be. Here and there he plays a worthier part—in one place a watch-dog, in another a sheep-dog, in a third a companion in travel—but everywhere else in the Bible he is an object of loathing and contempt. "Thy servant is but a dog" is the form to use, when you are submissively polite; "Am I a dog?" the question to ask, when you are justifiably angry. Saul persecuting David is reminded by David himself that he can gain little honour from pursuing "a dead dog." "Dog" is the word reserved for those who are totally depraved, and in one passage "the power of the dog" seems to hint at even darker evil than that of sinful man. Nor is this name of reproach found only in the Old Testament. As in Isaiah, so in St. Paul, false teachers are "dogs"; that which is holy, says the First Gospel, is not to be given unto "dogs"—the unholy; and in the Book of the Revelation it is told how "dogs" shall be shut out of the heavenly city, like those which roam round the walls of the earthly Jerusalem. And the dog himself is as far from man as ever; it is part of the misery of Lazarus that he cannot drive him away.

To turn from these pictures to that of the "Old Shepherd's Chief-mourner," drawn by Landseer, and not less tenderly described by Ruskin, is not only to pass from East to West, but almost to pass to another world. Toleration has become companionship, and companionship has deepened into a partnership which is as nearly as possible a community of nature. The unclean animal has entered the sanctuary of grief, for he, too, can mourn. It is a perilous acquisition—this dimly realised sympathy with man, making the canine life impossible even to the dog; yet it is part of the universal risk whereby increased capacity for happiness is also increased capacity for pain. The alarming fact is not so much the sensitiveness of the dog as the senselessness of man; for man, when he does not ennoble him, corrupts him. Art alone would testify to this. The dog in art is the dog in history. Here you may see him, sometimes raised, but as often debased by human association. Now he is a Dutch boar-hound incited to savagery beyond his own instincts, and now a Venetian lap-dog enfeebled by luxury more sensual than his own appetites. With the latest follies of London and Paris the degradation of the dog through feminine fashion cannot now be far from its lowest depth.

The dog in literature bears the same witness. Now his lower and now his higher qualities are dwelt upon, but more often the former. As thoughtless painters—Teniers, for instance, and Hogarth—have used him for unseemly jest, so also have thoughtless writers. If Homer in the Odyssey has done him honour, Latin authors have done their best to make him vile. Terence and Plautus show him in his worst light. When Cicero would draw a cringing parasite, a dog is his model; when Horace would rebuke a cowardly slanderer, he likens him to a dog which snarls at unoffending strangers, and runs away from a wolf. As afterwards in sacred pictures, so in heathen fable, the dog is a convenient puppet for preaching prudish morals. Our own poets have not been slow to observe his faults, but the balance is held more fairly now, and by the side of Landseer's Chief-mourner we may place the Old Tray of Browning, the Owd Roä of Tennyson, and the Geist of Matthew Arnold.

Common speech tells the same tale. The dog has coined more phrases for human spite than any other animal. You call me cut-throat dog, complains Shylock, but the Gentile has been in his turn a dog to the Jew, just as the Christian is still a dog to the Mahometan. And even amongst ourselves there are proverbial expressions in which the dog figures as the familiar example of that which may be treated with scorn. The dog, in truth, is so near to us that we deal with him as we deal one with another. The dog in history reflects the history of man.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Birmingham: Moseley.—On Sunday, May 20, flower services were held at the Moseley and Bal-a'l-Heath Institute, Birmingham, the preacher being the Rev. Thomas A. Gorton. There was a good attendance, and the flowers with which the hall was tastefully decorated were on the following day sent to a local hospital.

Evesham.—The 752nd monthly meeting of Protestant Dissenting Ministers of Warwickshire and neighbouring counties was held at Evesham, on Tuesday, May 15. At the service in the chapel the Rev. Samuel M. Crothers, D.D. of Cambridge, U.S.A., was the preacher. His sermon was an eloquent and impressive appeal to ministers to apply themselves to strenuous thinking in the pursuit of truth. At the Ministers' Meeting, held immediately after the service, under the presidency of the Rev. G. L. Phelps, a resolution of welcome and thanks to Dr. Crothers was passed, and also a resolution approving the fundamental principles of Mr. Birrell's Education Bill—namely, popular control and the abolition of religious tests for teachers. The ministers and their wives were afterwards entertained to luncheon by the Evesham congregation, Mr. A. H. Martin presiding.

Leicester: Narborough-road.—A very successful meeting was held in the school-room on the 15th inst., when the Rev. F. Hahn, a German Lutheran missionary and superintendent of the Purulia Leper Asylum, gave an address on "Twenty-two years of work among the Lepers of India." Dr. Bond, F.R.C.S., presided, and was supported by various local doctors and ministers, several of whom expressed their appreciation of Mr. Hahn's beautiful and inspiring address. All present were deeply moved, and felt that there was a field of work in which all Christians and lovers of humanity might gladly join hands. In bringing the meeting to a close, it was pointed out by the minister of the Free Christian Church how foreign mission work seemed to be regarded with a certain amount of prejudice by our Free Churches, owing partly to the strictly evangelical character of the ordinary missionary societies and partly due to the paramount claims of social work at home. But, the conclusion ran, there can be no limits to human sympathy, no limits to Christian charity; the true missionary spirit could stop at no barriers, and foreign mission work such as this could not but prove a stimulating and inspiring influence through the length and breadth of our churches.

Leeds: Proposed Unitarian Club for Yorkshire.—A preliminary meeting was held in the Priestley Hall, Leeds, on Saturday afternoon, May 19, 1906, to consider the question of the formation of a Unitarian club for Yorkshire, the objects of the proposed club being the promotion of greater intercourse and fellowship among the members of the Yorkshire Unitarian Churches. Mr. Harry Lupton presided over an attendance of twenty-one gentlemen, representing the congregations of Mill Hill, Hunslet, Chapel Lane, Bradford, and Halifax, who had braved the inclemency of the weather. Information concerning the working of similar clubs at Liverpool and London was laid before the meeting. General sympathy and agreement with the movement was expressed, and a representative committee was appointed to deal further with the matter. Mr. A. Simpson, 17, Parkfield-mount, Beeston, Leeds, will be glad to hear from anyone interested in the subject.

Loughborough.—A sale of work was held on May 12 to raise funds to pay for recent repairs to the fabric of the church and school buildings. The Rev. W. H. Burgess presided at the opening. The proceeds were just over £27. Last Sunday the annual school sermons were preached by the Rev. Harry E. Haycock, of Bolton, a former minister. The collections, including donations from faithful and well tried friends of the school, were in advance over last year.

Mottram.—The Sunday-school anniversary services on May 13 were very encouraging. There were large congregations—afternoon about 400 and evening nearly 500, including visitors from neighbouring Unitarian and other churches. The Rev. H. Kelsey White, of Ashton, preached helpful and appropriate sermons; the collections, including donations sent for the occasion, were over £21, being slightly above those of last year; and there were solos and anthems from an augmented choir.

Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association.—The annual spring conference of this association took place at Barnard Castle on Saturday, May 19. In spite of the inclement weather, there were representatives from Newcastle, Sunderland, Middlesbrough, Gateshead, and Darlington. In the afternoon the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, of Gateshead, read a paper on "Unitarianism and the Social Problem," which was followed by a most interesting discussion. Tea was served in the school-room of the Unitarian Church at five o'clock. At the public meeting in the evening the chair was taken by the Rev. A. G. Peaston, the minister of the church, and addresses were also delivered by the Rev. W. H. Lambelle, of Middlesbrough, president of the N. and D.U.C. Association, Rev. F. Wood, Rev. G. A. Ferguson, Mr. Wright, of Stockton, and Mr. Tremaine, of Newcastle.

Southend.—On Saturday a bazaar was held at Victoria Hall in aid of the fund for a new organ. Mr. John Harrison presided at the opening, which was performed by Mrs. W. Wallace Bruce, wife of the president of the London and South-Eastern Counties Provincial Assembly. The net proceeds will be between £60 and £70—a result considered more than satisfactory.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE terms of the resolution on the Education Bill, to be moved by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, at the Annual Meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, on Wednesday next, June 6, are as follows:—"That this meeting accords its hearty support to the main principles of the Education Bill now before Parliament, recognising moreover its generous spirit in dealing with the denominational system which it is designed to supplant by one truly national, under complete public control and without the imposition of tests upon teachers, accompanied with an earnest endeavour to put an end to the religious strife occasioned by the Act of 1902, outraging as it did the conscientious convictions of Nonconformists by levying rates for the support of denominational schools. That this meeting congratulates the Government on the passing of the First Clause, embodying the principle of public control in all schools, by a triumphant majority, and expresses the hope that, when the Bill leaves the House of Commons its second great principle of the abolition of religious tests upon teachers will be equally triumphant. This meeting, however, in view of the fact that secular education and the universal right of entry, as alternatives to the Cowper Temple system and extended facilities, have been rejected, feels grave concern lest the adoption of Clause IV. should lead to the reimposition of tests upon teachers and the re-establishment of Denominationalism at the public expense."

VISITORS to Essex Hall in Whit-week will find the book-room transformed for the occasion into a reception-room, but the books will still be accessible, and there will be, we understand, a book-stall in the vestibule. Among the volumes which friends should certainly take the opportunity of looking at are those by Dr. S. M. Crothers, this year's Essex Hall lecturer. Of "The Gentle Reader" and "The Pardoner's Wallet," these delightful volumes of essays, to which we recently called attention, there will not, we expect be enough copies for those who will want to buy, but orders can be given. Then there is the Ingersoll Lecture on "The Endless Life," and a volume of sermons, "The Understanding Heart," published three years ago by the American Unitarian Association.

OUR own Association has been unusually active in publication during the past year, and, in addition to the sixpenny edition of standard works, there is last year's Essex Hall Lecture by Professor Henry Jones on "The Immortality of the Soul in the Poems of Tennyson and Browning," the Memoir of Richard Acland Armstrong, with a selection of his sermons, a new edition of Réville's "History of the Dogma of the Deity of Jesus Christ," and other books. Among pamphlets to be bought are twenty-four sermons by as many Unitarian ministers, either separately, or, the first twelve, in a volume, the collection of twelve essays on "What Unitarians Believe," an essay on Giordano Bruno, by Mr. Maurice Adams, and the Rev. H. S. Perris's suggestive manual on "The Distinctive Principles of the Liberal Free Churches."

WE are glad to hear that among the foreign Associations to be represented at our anniversary meetings next week is the German Union of the "Freunde der Christliche Welt," in the person of the minister of the German Church at Denmark-hill, Pastor Hackmann. We can assure him of a very cordial welcome. Mr. Hackmann, who has only recently come to London, has had experience as a missionary in the Far East, and is the author of three little books on Buddhism in the series of Religionsgeschichtliche Volksbücher, edited by Lic. F. M. Schiele, of Marburg.

THE programme of the annual meeting of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, it will be seen from the advertisement, has had to be modified owing to the sad bereavement of the Rev. A. Thornhill, who was to have read the paper at the afternoon Conference. In his place the Rev. Arthur Hurn, of Acton, has kindly consented to open a discussion on "Temperance and Social Problems." The committee of the Association have expressed their deep sympathy with Mr. Thornhill in the great loss he has sustained.

THE Swiss "Verein für Freies Christentum" is to hold its 17th general meeting at Chur on Sunday and Monday, June 10 and 11, under the presidency of Pastor Altherr, of Basle. The Union was founded in 1871, and has since held meetings every two or three years. Heinrich Lang was among the founders. At the coming meetings, which will include an address by Professor Schmiedel, of Zürich, on "The Person of Jesus in the Present-day Conflict of Opinions," the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is to be represented by the Rev. E. W. Lummis, who is at present at Davos, and thus not far from Chur. We shall hope to receive from him some account of the meetings.

THE Rev. Frank L. Phalen, who last year represented the American Unitarian Association at our anniversary meetings, sends greetings to his English friends, made both in London and when he preached at Leicester, Bournemouth, Birkenhead, Southport, and elsewhere. Mr. Phalen is now minister at Fairhaven, New Bedford, Mass., and has a fine church building and parsonage. There he will be glad to see any of our ministers who may be over on that side.

THE great majority of the present House of Commons is clearly against the "secular" solution of the education difficulty. Mr. Maddison's amendment in favour of that system was rejected on Monday by 477 votes to 63. Mr. Birrell made an able speech in reply to the arguments advanced against the "Cowper-Temple" policy, which, he maintained, had been successfully applied for more than 30 years by the School Boards, and which his Bill proposes to be practically universal in the public elementary schools of England and Wales. This policy has, indeed, won considerable approval from dignitaries of the Church, while it appears specially desirable to orthodox Nonconformists. For ourselves, accustomed as Unitarians are to doing battle against long odds and vast prejudice, we could be well content to let this system go on without protest, if the spread of our own opinions were the only consideration. True, under the broad label of undenominational teaching some rich types of doctrinal instruction have been found, and doubtless they will be so again under the new Education Act. But as the Bible is far from being an orthodox book when read intelligently, and as we may distinctly hope for a rise in the intellectual level of the teachers as time goes on, there can be little reason to doubt that the "Cowper-Temple" principle makes broadly for us.

"Is not that a good thing, then?" Yes, and no; yes, in so far as less erroneous notions may be diffused; but no, if large bodies of the community who hold far different views and opinions are to be taxed to diffuse ours or anybody else's. The Cowper-Temple policy has only in a lame sort of way succeeded. As a compromise between distinctive denominational teaching and no religious teaching at all it has inevitably laboured under the disabilities of a middle course. Mr. Athelstan Riley and Mr. Balfour will still be able to ask triumphantly how even undenominational religion can be taught without some kind of "test" upon the teachers. Zealous partisans of the Church as the sole authority in the exposition of Scripture will still deplore the confusion and poverty of religious conceptions that must result from entrusting the Bible lessons to teachers who are inadequately prepared, and who may give any tint they like to the neutral background supplied in the syllabus. But Mr. Birrell says the people at large want the Bible kept in the schools; the majority of members think so too, and apparently we are in for another period of struggle. Well if it is a period of growth also.

MR. CHAMBERLAIN'S amendment to Mr. Maddison's amendment fared better as regards numbers than the latter, securing a minority of 172 votes against 367. But this, of course, included a great part of the Roman Catholic section of the House, as well as the regular Opposition. We cannot think that his proposal would win more support on its merits, at least from those who have had practical experience in the management of schools. The interference of all and sundry voluntary teachers of religion in regular school hours would surely be most injurious to the discipline of the school. Sir William Anson had another rather futile suggestion to offer. He proposed that, so far as possible, religious instruction should be given during school hours "according to the wishes of parents." The voting on this amendment was almost exactly as on Mr. Chamberlain's; and Clause 1 was finally carried by a majority of 203.

TUESDAY'S Morning Post, among a large number of communications on the subject of the Education Bill, contained the following letter on "The Way to Unitarianism," from the secretary of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association:—
"SIR,—Will you allow me as a Unitarian to say, in reply to the Rev. Stanley Baker, D.D., who, in your issue of May 24 suggests that the logical outcome of undenominationalism is Unitarianism, that this can only mean that the Bible, when read and interpreted in a perfectly simple and intelligible way, without creed or ritual, inculcates Unitarianism and not Trinitarianism? It would certainly puzzle an unsophisticated teacher to discover the Athanasian or even the so-called Apostles' Creed in the Bible. Personally, I am in favour of what is termed the "secular" solution of the education difficulty, but I recognise that the bulk of the parents probably desire "simple Bible lessons," and so I am willing to support Mr. Birrell's Bill, not because it answers to my ideals, but because it suits the people whose children frequent the schools.—Yours, &c., W. COPELAND BOWIE.

Essex Hall, London, May 28."

"THE Government has refused us amnesty, land and liberty. We voted that the Government ought to be dismissed. Read this in the villages and factories." The laconic style of these sentences is explained when we notice that they are from a telegraphic message. They represent the response of members of the Duma to the insolent and impolitic rejection by the Russian Government of the loyal address to the Tsar referred to in these columns last week. Perhaps the fact that such a telegram can be published throughout Russia, and its authors remain at liberty is as striking an example as we could find of the immense movement which has already taken place. Persons who know Russia well think that the tension cannot last long. Will the Duma be incarcerated or will the Government resign into obscurity? Mr. Stead sums up the position by asserting the probability of the Duma being in prison within a fortnight, qualifying his prophecy by the remark that in Russia the improbable only happens.

MEANWHILE the St. Petersburg correspondent of the Times continues to furnish us with interesting extracts from the debates. The most striking fact in an intensely dramatic situation is the action of the peasants: They are, e.g., quoting the Scriptures with telling effect, though hardly in the sense of their priests. "Give us this day our daily bread," and then comes the unorthodox comment how can a peasant have bread if he have not land? Or, "the peasants are indeed like poor blind Sampson." Will Sampson stretch his arms to pull down and destroy? For the full poignancy of such utterances, we must look away from the Duma to the country. A multitude estimated at 20,000,000 of persons are living (or dying) under famine conditions. In some districts a prolonged drought threatens a failure of crops, which would still further extend the terrible want of food. In a word, Russia is at close grip with starvation, and the revolution must succeed if disaster is to be averted. When men die of hunger any how they are less timid of the risks of sudden death from the guns.

AFTER M. Goremykin had announced the refusal of the Duma's demands for amnesty, land, and liberty, the Government made its first proposals of reform. A credit of £4,000 was asked for the reconstruction of the washhouse and other works in the University of Dorpat. We are not surprised to hear that the motion was received with ironical laughter. The representatives of the Russian people are set on larger issues, as was shown when speaker after speaker rose in fiery denunciation and appeal. The speeches, and especially those of the peasant deputies, are described as eloquent. This is very different from the character of the men who till our British fields. And, indeed, strange as it sounds, every Russian peasant may be described as an orator. That is, perhaps, a slight exaggeration. However, these men are not untrained in the ways of public assemblies. Russia has always had its Mir and Zemstvo. In them the local life of the nation has flowed deep and strong. They have afforded, in some respects, a more genuine instrument of self-government than Western Europe has known since the Middle Ages until the present generation, or even than is yet enjoyed. These assemblies have been schools of rhetoric. In the history of the Mir we may trace the explanation of the appositeness of speech in the Duma, and indeed the explanation of many a riddle besides in this struggle of nascent Russia.

Is it Well with the Child? is the title of a new pamphlet by Miss Harriet M. Johnson, of Liverpool, who has already done so much for the children, pleading for their protection from the evils of drink and the drink traffic in her earlier pamphlets "Children and Public Houses," "Our Future Citizens," &c. The pamphlet, which is published by Mr. H. J. Osborn (29, Paternoster-row, E.C. 1d., and 6s. a hundred) is a strong plea for the amendment of the Act of 1901 "to prevent the sale of Intoxicating Liquors to Children." Miss Johnson shows the effect of the Act was weakened by the introduction of the word "knowingly" by the supporters of the trade, and the permission to sell to children in "closed" vessels. From the disastrous results in this country and the happier experience of other countries, amendment on these points is urged, and also the raising of the age limit at least to eighteen, and the excluding of women with infants in their arms from public-houses.

"You English," said the observant African chief Khama, when in this country, "take great care of your goods, but you throw away your people." And Mr. Samuel Smith, M.P., after a study of Continental education some years ago could say: "Since I left home I have not seen a single ragged or begging child. No country has suffered more from the abuse of individual liberty than England." Careful inquiry has shown that the death rate of young lambs is 3 per cent., but that of infants 16 per cent. on an average, and rising to 48 per cent., and higher, among drunken parents. These are quotations from Miss Johnson's pamphlet, in which will be found a large amount of evidence of the cruel wrong done to the children by the neglect of adequate safeguards against neglect and contamination due to drink. Whoever has the cause of the children and of Temperance reform at heart should help in the circulation of this pamphlet.

"VERACITY" is the subject of the tenth of the Rev. J. H. Weatherall's Sermons Preached in Bank-street Chapel, published by Mr. G. Winterburn (65, Deansgate, Bolton, Id.). Truth, it is urged, is the state of health, and untruth the state of disease. "The value of language as a means of social intercourse is based upon mutual trust; and neither the Jesuit nor the journalist can impose for ever upon the trustfulness of the public. 'It is the suspicious man,' observes Rothe, 'who is most frequently deceived.' So, those who are always ready to believe that the world around them is an untruthful world are more deceived than the others who rely upon the general soundness of human nature."

THE annual meeting of the Society for the Relief of Aged and Infirm Protestant Dissenting Ministers was held on Tuesday, May 29, at the Sunday-School Union House, 56, Old Bailey, Mr. Edward Towers in the chair. The report showed that 78 ministers were relieved during the past year, among whom £898 were distributed, an increase of four cas s and £46 on the previous year. Contributions in aid of the Society will be thankfully received by the treasurer, Mr. W. Lepard Smith, of Ravello, Rosslyn-road, Watford, or by the secretary, the Rev. P. G. Scorey, 10, Hartington Villas, Hove, Sussex.

THE attention of friends in London is called to the recital to be given by Miss Beatrice Herford (Mrs. S. W. Hayward) on Thursday evening, June 14, in the Hampstead Town Hall, Haverstock Hill. Mrs. Hayward, who is on a brief visit to this country, is giving this recital for the benefit of the Hampstead District Nursing Association and the Ladies' Association of the Hampstead General Hospital, in both of which her mother, the late Mrs. Brooke Herford, was deeply interested. The recital, which begins at 8.30, we need not remind our readers who remember Miss Beatrice Herford's very clever and original monologues, will be extremely entertaining. The programme includes "The Lady Packing," "At the Registry Office," "An English Party," and "The American Shop Girl." Tickets are to be had at Hewetson's, 11, High-street, Hampstead; Livingston's, 229, Finchley-road; and at the Town Hall.

THE golden time, the perfection of society, the purity and beauty of humanity lie in the future, not in the past, and life is to be spent not in sighs of regret, but in the joy of hope and the power of faith.—James Martineau.

RESIDUUM OR FOUNDATION?

SIR,—Mr. Gow has brought out in a very clear and interesting way the difference between the residual and the fundamental, but I am not sure that he has not himself fallen into a like fallacy—the fallacy of supposing that that which is simple is therefore fundamental. Teach children, he says, the parables and the Lord's Prayer, and give the doctrinal explanations in later years. Now the parables could not have been fundamental, or the disciples would not at once have asked for doctrinal explanations. Take, for instance, the seven parables of the kingdom: Taken as they stand, they are bare accounts of ordinary every-day natural facts, adding nothing to what even a child already knows, and, without the doctrinal clue to their meaning, absolutely unspiritual. Parables, in fact, are only illustrations, and illustrations cannot themselves be fundamental. So with prayers; prayers are applications of principles already received, and cannot, of course, be primarily that which they apply. The Lord's Prayer pre-supposes a whole range of theological conceptions, and demands acquaintance with these, even for intelligent recitation. I find myself therefore, I confess, in agreement with those who think that, to teach Biblical Christianity, you must begin with the facts, and the doctrines connected with the facts, that these, as summarised in the closely scriptural Apostles' Creed, are as easily taught as parables and prayers; and that, without these as the groundwork, the foundations of Christian instruction are—in the air.

E. P. BARROW.

ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS:

SIR,—May I suggest that members of our churches and teachers in our schools, when attending the Anniversary Meetings in London next week, should introduce themselves to ministers and others whom they happen to meet at the Conversazione or other gatherings. Both Mr. Pritchard and myself will be glad to do what we can to welcome visitors; and we shall be grateful if people will not be afraid to rebuke our ignorance or forgetfulness by telling us who they are and where they come from! Perhaps the members of the Laymen's Club and the Women's Social Club will come to our aid whenever they see an opportunity. To meet together, to get to know one another better, and to encourage each other in the work that lies before us, is the chief object of the anniversary meetings in Whit-week.

May I add, in answer to inquiries, that application was made to the railway companies for the fare and a quarter tickets, but without success. At Whitsuntide there are, however, opportunities for procuring cheap tickets from many parts of the country.

W. COPELAND BOWIE:
Essex Hall, London, May 30, 1906;

HENRIK IBSEN.

IN 1865 Ibsen was already the author of a series of varied and powerful works, culminating in the magnificent drama of "The Pretenders." But he had obtained only the scantiest and most grudging recognition. Even the indignation which had greeted "Love's Comedy," though it had broken an otherwise monotonous indifference, had not carried off the first edition of the work. The buoyancy of Ibsen's youth was killed by the struggles and the neglect of these years. He had become taciturn and reserved, perhaps embittered; but his spirit was not quelled. His conviction that he had said significant things, and had yet more significant things to say, and his determination to say them, were absolutely unshaken. He could, in a measure, reconcile himself, even to neglect and exile, if they increased his independence. Friends, he declared, are an expensive luxury to a man who wants to be himself; not because of anything you have to do for them, but because of the many things you must not do or say because of them. The more detached he was, the more completely and unreservedly could he fulfil his mission, and few men have ever been more directly and personally conscious of a mission than was Ibsen. What he means by that much-misunderstood phrase "being himself" is invariably being faithful to his mission, giving visible and unmistakable utterance in his life of the thing "God meant when He made him." Ibsen was perfectly sure that God meant something distinctly significant when He made him, and that He had a sufficient working knowledge of what it was. To "be himself" was to utter it in absolute fearlessness and scorn of consequence. At the time of which we speak he was in Italy, and had long been toiling at the conception of a great historical drama which finally took shape in the "Emperor and Galilean" eight years later; but suddenly another inspiration laid violently hold on him, and under its pressure he composed with extraordinary rapidity the metrical drama of "Brand." The impression produced by this poem (published in 1866) was instantaneous and overwhelming. Elitism after edition was called for, and before the Scandinavian world had recovered from the shock, Ibsen followed it up, in 1867, by "Peer Gynt," which rivalled it at once in its wide and deep popularity. After this there could be no further talk of neglect. Whatever Ibsen chose to say, he would at least be sure of a hearing, and interest and appreciation gradually extended backwards, till one after another of his earlier works began to be discovered and sought after. The amazing series of social dramas which invaded and conquered Europe followed; but it is still the opinion of many competent critics that "Brand" and "Peer Gynt" are the most permanently and profoundly significant of Ibsen's works. It is certain, at any rate, that they show a side of his genius which is not elsewhere manifested. From the technical point of view they are not dramas but dramatic poems, and they manifest a wealth and splendour of diction, and a mastery of metrical form, which distinguish them sharply from the severe simplicity of the prose dramas that succeeded them: In "Brand," Ibsen's sympathies and reason are in obvious conflict. The whole progress and structure of the poem show us a heroic career wrecked by the false and inhuman formula "everything or nothing"; yet it is impossible not to feel that the author's sympathies are with his titanic hero as he drives his formula, like a sword, through his own heart and the heart of his devoted wife, and is himself driven by it into his fanatical worship in the "ice church" where he is crushed. The effect of the poem on Ibsen's contemporaries was determined by his sympathies, not by his reason. Testimony is unanimous as to the far-reaching influence of the poem in bracing the character and exalting the ideals of the generation of Scandinavians who first read it as young men. "Peer Gynt" is a poem of a very different stamp. In appearance it is immensely more complex than "Brand," but in spite of its bewildering kaleidoscopic changes, and the random brilliance of its wit and satire, it is, nevertheless, far clearer and more unified in its central conception, and more intimately related to the problems which henceforth engaged its author than the turbidly magnificent or darkly tragic "Brand." But if "Brand" could appeal powerfully to those who only half understood it, "Peer Gynt" would be immortal if nobody had ever understood it at all. For the sustained brilliance and pathos of its several scenes, or even lines or couplets, will furnish any man who knows it well with an epigrammatic comment on all the experiences, all the scenes, and all the characters with which life can present him. After reading "Peer Gynt" one may well ask, "What is there left to say?" On those lines apparently there was nothing left, for henceforth Ibsen threw aside the mechanism of verse and the spirit of epigram, and gave the world a series of dramas in prose so unadorned that its native ease inevitably becomes baldness in translation. Ibsen, whom visitors found scrupulously courteous, and strictly observant of etiquette, but most disconcertingly taciturn, read very little, and never entered into society; and yet, apparently by the mere intuition of genius, he was able to keep in touch with the colloquial language of a country he never visited, and to write the easiest and most absolutely convincing dialogue of any writer of his time. So much, together with his mastery of technique, was admitted by everyone; but what the thing he had to say amounted to, and whether he was a messenger from Heaven or hell was a matter so hotly disputed that we are told that in sending out invitations for social functions it was at one time customary to add a request that the guests would abstain from discussing "The Dolls' House." Indeed, though Ibsen's fame was secure from 1866 onward, the storms of indignation which surged around one after another of his works, can have few parallels, if any, in the history of modern literature.

The same violent controversies which agitated Scandinavia were more mildly renewed later on in Europe. So short a time ago as in 1892 Ibsen was considered an improper subject for treatment at the University Hall Settlement, and when the secretary of a well-established University Extension centre, greatly daring, organised a short series of lectures on him, a serious protest was entered at the central Board. Meanwhile Ibsen's position was being gradually secured. First his countrymen, and then Europe, found that whether they liked him or not, they had no choice but to accept him. Then came to Norway pride in the possession of a great man, universal recognition and honour, and finally something like a sense of national triumph, when Ibsen repealed the sentence of exile which he had passed on himself, and came to spend his last years in his own country.

But he was still an enigma. Even his most intelligent interpreters were driven, for instance, to the desperate hypothesis that "The Wild Duck" was written in a moment of depression when he had lost faith in his own formulas, whereas all that he was really doing was kicking the bottom out of theirs! His reserve was impenetrable; yet he was anxious to be understood; and in 1880 he actually laid before his publisher a scheme for a systematic exposition of the connection and significance of the whole series of his works. It seems hardly credible to us now that the proposal was rejected. In 1898 the scheme asserted itself again in his mind, but his failing powers and the difficulty of breaking the life habit of dramatic expression combined to bring the design to nought. The word of revelation as to what he meant by his works will now never pass those close-set lips, and Socialists and Individualists, Revolutionists and Conservatives, Optimists and Pessimists, will continue to claim him as their own.

Perhaps the fact is that, whereas Ibsen had an intense feeling of the value of life, it never could express itself in the positive form of presenting life as a worthy thing and directly quickening the sense of its worth in others. It only expressed itself negatively in an almost supernaturally keen vision into the ways in which life may be wrecked. Before Ibsen's insight into self-deception and his analysis of the hidden dangers, or the secret rottenness, of institutions, movements, passions or characters, the reader positively quails. The inmost secrets of his heart seem to be revealed; he is warned where he thought he was secure; and the things which custom and convenience had most conclusively decreed he should not look into are dragged relentlessly before his eyes. "Ibsen's works," said Björnson, "are lighthouses. They show you where not to sail." And with characteristic picturesqueness and characteristic generosity Björnson added another point of similarity between Ibsen's works and lighthouses, "They are the first thing that a man sees when he looks toward Norway."

BEARD'S HIBBERT LECTURES.*

To the popular sixpenny edition of Armstrong's "God and the Soul," Carpenter's "First Three Gospels," Newman's "The Soul," and Savage's "Passing and Permanent in Religion," it was a happy thought to add an abridged edition of Beard's Hibbert Lectures.

For justification of this republication, and appeal to a wider circle of readers, we cannot do better than reproduce here what Mr. Gow says in the preface, stating three good reasons for the selection of this particular volume from the notable series of the Hibbert Lectures:—

"First, Dr. Beard was by general admission profoundly versed in his subject, and united with his great learning a very unusual charm and mastery of style.

"Secondly, in his treatment of Luther and the Reformation he is strictly impartial, and fair to all parties. There are few periods of history where it is more difficult for a man to avoid allowing his own prepossessions to influence his judgments. Anglican, Roman Catholic, and Nonconformist, each has its own history of the Reformation coloured by its own prejudices.

"Dr. Beard was an earnest believer in freedom as the condition and in reason as the method of finding truth. But he never allowed his faith in freedom and in reason to warp his judgments of men who believed in authority. He had a deep insight into character, and could sympathise with churches based on principles with which he himself did not agree.

"High Anglicans like Mr. Gladstone wrote to him on the publication of the Lectures expressing sincere appreciation of his work, and the well-known Roman Catholic writer, W. S. Lilly, has said: 'Among English writers on Luther, the first place must be given to Dr. Beard.' At the same time Dr. Beard was a believer in reason and conscience as ultimate authorities; he was minister of a church unfettered by tests and creeds, and in theology, like Dr. Martineau, he was a Unitarian. No one can fail to find not only the impartial scholar but the believer in liberty and the lover of truth in these pages.

"Thirdly, as Dr. Beard himself felt, we are on the eve of another Reformation in religion. 'The facts and arguments' of his lectures, he said, 'establish the necessity of a new Reformation of Religion.'

"Since Dr. Beard wrote, two things have happened. The results of scientific Biblical criticism have been more and more widely accepted by serious students not only in the Nonconformist and Anglican, but also in the Roman Catholic Church. And at the same time the leaders of philosophy and science have become more religious. The whole tendency of the best men of various schools has been to urge that religion is safe whatever happens to the Bible or the Church. There is a deeper confidence in the capacity of man to know God, united with a stronger dissatisfaction with sectarian narrowness, and a greater readiness to accept without fear the results of Biblical criticism.

* "The Reformation of the Sixteenth Century in its Relation to Modern Thought and Knowledge." Lectures by Charles Beard, B.A., LL.D. People's Abridged Edition. Edited by Henry Gow, B.A. (British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 6d. net.)

"This growing disbelief in the old creeds, this dislike of denominationalism, this longing for a larger and more catholic spiritual religion constitute a condition of things in which everything points to the need and the nearness of a new Reformation. Love for the old creeds and the old ways has long led men to strive against the claims of science and criticism, which seemed to them merely negative and destructive.

"Now men are, in spite of themselves, being forced to accept the conclusions of science and criticism, and are discovering that these conclusions are not the enemies but the friends of spiritual religion. The old creeds of Roman Catholic and Anglican are out of harmony with modern thought, nor will men be content much longer to remain in orthodox churches without some restatement of doctrine. Whether the new Reformation will come from within or without the churches, and what amount of change and readjustment it may involve, no man can foretell. But there can be no doubt amidst the present unrest that such a book as Dr. Beard's study of the Reformation of the sixteenth century has much to teach both by way of warning and encouragement."

These are good reasons, which should send many readers to the lectures themselves, and from this abridged edition to the complete work, and to Dr. Beard's other volume on Martin Luther, though, unhappily, he did not live to complete that greater work. It does, however, cover the first heroic period of Luther's life, ending with the Diet of Worms and the Reformer's seclusion in the Wartburg. These lectures were delivered in London and at Oxford, in 1883, the year of the four-hundredth anniversary of Luther's death, a "humble wreath" added by the author to the various tributes of honour, affection, and gratitude in his native country, which marked that celebration.

The lectures on "The Sects of the Reformation," "The Reformation in Switzerland," and "The Rise of Protestant Scholasticism," are omitted in this edition, and a greater part of the opening and closing lectures. The Reformation in Germany, under Luther's inspiration, and the Reformation in England are the centres of chief interest in the volume, followed by lectures on the Growth of the Critical Spirit and the Development of Philosophical Method and Scientific Investigation, pointing to the Reformation which is to be.

As a further inducement to readers to procure this book, which might be used to admirable purpose in reading circles, and for serious study in class, we will add here the conclusion of Dr. Beard's last lecture:—

"I know that in thus pleading for the simplification of doctrine, for the enlargement of terms of communion, for the reconciliation of theology with new knowledge, I have never left the critical ground. We have looked at religion from the outside as a datum of history, a subject of speculation—a thing which it lies with ourselves to accept or reject according as it satisfies the tests by which our intellectual nature compels us to try it. And from one point of view it is and must be this. With the best will in the world we cannot believe what is intrinsically incredible to us. Some tour de force of logic is necessary before we can abandon ourselves to the authority of a church, however complete may be our submission afterwards. But there is another attitude to religious truth which is not critical, though we may call in the critical judgment to justify it when the first storm of enthusiasm which compelled us to assume it has spent its force. Sometimes, under happy stress of circumstances, we do not choose a religion, but religion chooses us. In this higher order of things, Christ's was the natural procedure: his apostles did not, after long hesitation and much questioning, attach themselves to him; but he chose them, he called them, he took possession of them, and they obeyed. They were carried away by a force generated beyond the bounds of their own nature; their enthusiasm was the motion of a God within. Changes of theological opinion are, I know, produced by intellectual causes and run an intellectual course; but when no religious impulses intervene, they are rarer than is commonly supposed, and all spiritual upliftings and transformations conform to the law of which I have spoken. And so I venture to think that to restore Christianity to the place which it has lost and is more and more losing in the hearts of thoughtful and educated men, still more to give back to it its old victorious energy in dealing with the sinful and the wretched, what is chiefly needed is a prophet of this latter day who, in the keenness and directness of his religious insight, will speak at once a piercing and reconciling word. Such a one will be deeply penetrated with the scientific spirit, rejoicing in the interpretation of nature as an unveiling of God, and desiring only the plain truth of history that he may trace in it the working of the Divine Hand. But he will be too full of the awe of direct vision to lose himself in the arid wastes of criticism, or to be led astray by the pedantries of scientific investigation. I dare venture to predict that, like every other true prophet, the future will fill his eye and heart too completely to suffer him to be a bond-slave of the past: present revelations always overbear old theologies, and no living church ever supplies the model of the New Jerusalem. I have no fear lest he should fall out of the ranks of Christ's soldiers; for I do not believe that religion has anything to offer to man that the Gospel does not hold, and I notice that what is strong and inspiring in newer systems is Christian in essence, if not always in name. I know that when he speaks men will crowd to hear him, and lay their hearts and lives in his hands; for the religious instincts of humanity are ineradicable, and even if they sometimes sleep, wake always to life and energy again. And though his clear and penetrating accents may not fall upon our living ears, and we can do nothing to direct the operation of the Spirit of God, which, like the wind, 'bloweth where it listeth,' yet it belongs to us of this generation to make straight the way of his coming by living and working in the light of our best knowledge and most intimate convictions. Intellectual difficulties we can, to some extent, reconcile: hindrances to church-fellowship we can remove: we can go back to the simplicity of primitive piety: we can acknowledge the oneness of the religious life. So, as age follows age, and each pours fresh wealth into the treasury of human knowledge—as men accumulate a ripper experience, solving ever more perfectly the problems of life and entering upon wider possibilities—Christianity too, will receive a fuller development, and mankind, with the acknowledgment of mystery and the cry of imperfection always upon its lips, will penetrate more and more deeply into the glory and wonder of God."

SHORT NOTICE.

James Martineau: the Story of his Life, by Alfred Hall, M.A. This is the little book promised in the last annual report of the Sunday School Association, and now happily ready for Whitsuntide. It was very fitting that the present minister of the Octagon Chapel, which was Martineau's religious home as a child, should tell this story for our young people, and Mr. Hall has thrown his whole heart into the work. He has made skilful use of a large amount of material, working it into a simple, straightforward narrative, quoting occasionally with happy effect from Dr. Martineau's writings, and introducing many touches which should be of special interest to children. We are very glad to see that he has incorporated in his chapter on the Paradise-street days in Liverpool those delightful reminiscences of their home life which Miss Gertrude Martineau contributed to our Children's Column at the time of the Centenary last year. We have only two or three small points to note in criticism. On p. 35 Mr. Hall speaks of Dr. Martineau's engagement to Helen Higginson, "whom he had met when he was Mr. Fox's apprentice" at Derby—which hardly describes the fact that he lived in her father's house as a member of the family all the time he was at Derby. Then as to the Dublin settlement (p. 39), if the invitation had been to become at once co-pastor with the Rev. Joseph Hutton the question of the Regium Donum would have had to be faced at the outset. Our impression is that Martineau went as assistant to his aged relative, Philip Taylor (though with all the work to do), and only became actually co-pastor with Mr. Hutton on the death of the senior pastor. Then, as to Dr. Tuckerman's visit to England (p. 47), his modesty would have shrunk from the suggestion that he came "for the purpose of urging the churches to care for the poor." He came really for rest and change, to recruit his broken health. But undoubtedly, his personal presence, and the fervour of his zeal in the work, did give a powerful impetus to the movement which had already begun in this country, kindled by reports of what he was doing in Boston, some time before he came: Describing the congregation of Little Portland-street Chapel (p. 75) Mr. Hall mentions Charles Dickens as among Martineau's hearers. He belonged to this congregation in Mr. Tagart's time, but did he ever attend the later ministry? Mr. Hall's opening of the story is very happy, telling of the Huguenots of France and the English ejected ministers of 1662, with both of whom Dr. Martineau was connected by direct descent. Then follows a chapter on "Ancestry and Parentage," and another on "Early Influences." The story ends with a chapter, "Young to the Last," concluding with some sentences from Mr. Stopford Brooke's beautiful tribute:—"His life and work were a complete whole—a web woven closely throughout, and finished to the last flower in the pattern. What pleased him when he was young, what he projected then, he carried through in a long and active life; moving onward to the end.

"From well to better, daily self-surpass." He, in his humility, was not likely to think of his completeness, but we think of it:—It is good, indeed, to think of it, admire it, and love the man who realised it. And it is still better to think that he, who never thought his work complete—that high and aspiring spirit—rejoices now, with infinite energies, in the vaster work God gives him in the illimitable universe of love." We congratulate Mr. Hall on his little book, but could wish that the print from the well-known portrait of Martineau, by Agar in 1847, which stands as frontispiece, had been more successful. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall, Essex-street, Strand, W.C. 1s. net.)

George Smith, of Coalville: A Modern Knight-Errant, by J. E. Brown, author of "Elizabeth Fry, the Prisoner's Friend," is another story for young people, telling of what that remarkable man, who himself worked as a child in the brickfields, did both for the cruelly-used children who had been the little slaves of that industry, and also for the children of the canal boat population and for the gipsies. Miss Brown will certainly succeed, through her picture of the man in all his simplicity and unselfish devotion, in sending many readers to the larger life of George Smith by Mr. Edwin Hodder, on which her little sketch is based. (Sunday School Association, Essex Hall. 8d. net.)

The Sunday School Code Book and Teachers' Manual, edited by Marian Pritchard, should be in the hands of all our teachers, and will be found to contain much interesting and helpful matter for home use also. The first edition of the Code Book was issued five years ago, edited by the Rev. W. Copeland Bowie. This second edition has been prepared by Mr. and Miss Pritchard, Miss H. M. Tayler, and the Rev. W. G. Tarrant, Miss Pritchard being the editor. The book is divided into three parts, the first of which deals with the arrangements of a Sunday School, buildings, staff, meetings, order of school, &c.; subjects of lessons, festivals, excursions, teachers' gatherings, &c. This first part occupies more than half the book. The second part is on school institutions, from the library and singing class to exhibitions, rambles, and even mothers' meetings. The third part is on aids to teachers, including, of course, books and pictures. The suggestions are throughout thoroughly practical and ably presented, and the book will be found of the greatest service to young teachers seeking to fit themselves more thoroughly for the work. We would call attention to the practical hints to all Sunday school workers; and further, to superintendents and teachers in particular (p. 33). The following is the conclusion of Miss Pritchard's preface:—"We sincerely hope that no teachers will be discouraged because they feel that their staff of officers is small, and, perhaps, less fully equipped for their duties than some pages seem to imply is necessary. Nothing is absolutely necessary, save a really sincere wish to serve, and the determination to do one's best. With that, however, will assuredly come the determination to seek to learn what experience has to teach, so that our best may grow yet better. And it is in order that our fellow teachers may have an opportunity of gaining some knowledge of this, that we have gladly undertaken the task that was entrusted to our charge." OBITUARY.

MRS. R. D. HOLT.

LAST week brought heavy losses to the congregation of the Ullet-road Church, Liverpool, and sorrow to a wide circle of friends. On Monday Miss Emily Booth passed away, after only a few days illness, and on Thursday Mrs. Robert Holt.

On the following morning a leading article in the Liverpool Daily Post, doubtless from the pen of Sir Edward Russell, paid a striking tribute to her memory. Mrs. Robert Durning Holt, who was in her sixty-first year, was the eldest of the eight daughters of the late Richard Potter, of Standish House, Gloucestershire. Mrs. Courtney and Mrs. Sidney Webb are two of her sisters.

"She had a character," says the Daily Post, "of singular vivacity, and tough, resolute strength. She did not come prominently forward as a political leader either among her own sex or in public affairs generally. But there was no woman better informed, more eagerly well read, more competent to form judgments which it was difficult to shake, than was this remarkable lady. Although public appearances of a political character were not her habit, Mrs. Holt's conversation was as clear, as cogent, and as searching as that of any master of contemporary affairs; and her opinions of these were governed by fixed principles which it was useless to besiege, not merely because of the native determination of her character, but because they had been formed by intense thought and fortified by continual observation of mankind and of affairs.

"Mrs. Robert Holt preserved the older usages of comparative family seclusion, but it was not possible for her to remain entirely in the shade of domestic privacy. It is well remembered by those who are old enough, how at an early age, Mr. Robert Holt was induced to throw himself into local political warfare, and how from first to last—amid general gladness that a son of George Holt had gifts which secured for him the Liberal lead in Liverpool whenever he chose to accept it—he fulfilled with unrivalled and reasoned popularity the duties of that eminent and responsible position. These involved Mrs. Robert Holt in a good deal of social activity, and her hospitalities and intercourse in society, especially on her own side, were not only devoted and abounding, but always had a special spice of originality owing to outspoken, striking, lively, and sometimes caustic characteristics. When Mr. Robert Holt, by a change in the local political barometer, was installed in the Mayoralty, the traditions of the family assured a noble fulfilment of all the obligations of that office, understood in the highest sense of municipal spirit. At the Town Hall, and in all the functions of the year, Mrs. Robert Holt added to her husband's term of office a dignity that was universally estimated at a high value."

It was in that year that the added dignity of the Lord Mayoralty was granted to Liverpool. Of what Mrs. Holt was in her home, and as a very loyal friend, we must not attempt to write here, nor of her many activities and interests in work of a public and beneficent kind; but must quote once more from the tribute in the Daily Post, the conclusion of the article, referring to the noble influence of such a home as Mrs. Robert Holt's:—

"It is a great example for any city and for any period to apprehend and appreciate the merits, the motives, the impulses of such a family, into whose even most private and casual intercourse no small prejudices, no flippant perversion, no frivolous disregard of principle, and at the same time no want of charity or pleasantness could come. Such has been for many years the home which is now bereaved of the wife and mother who has throughout its history maintained in it the energy of good endeavour; the intellectual and moral elevation of a humane liberality; and the constant and natural allegiance of every dweller in it to all great causes."

The funeral service, before cremation, was held in the Ullet-road Church on Monday, conducted by the Rev. J. Collins Odgers.

MISS H. E. BOOTH.

Miss Hester Emily Booth was the surviving daughter of the late Charles Booth, of Liverpool, and sister of the Right Hon. Charles Booth, author of the great work on the "Life and Labour of the People of London." Her father, who died in 1860, was a leading member of the Renshaw-street congregation, and she was thus brought up under the ministry of the late John Hamilton Thom. She was one of those in whose life his profound influence bore its most beautiful fruits.

Miss Booth, who was sixty-four at the time of her death, served for many years as a Guardian of the Poor of Toxteth Park; and we quote here the words of the present Chairman of the Board, who at a meeting on Thursday week moved a resolution expressing their profound sense of loss. "During her term of office," he said, "Miss Booth took the liveliest interest in all the work of a Poor Law guardian, an interest which she maintained unbroken up to the time of her death, although for some years she had ceased to be a member of the board. Miss Booth made the welfare of the children under the care of the board her special personal study, devoting much thought and labour to their advancement long after they had ceased to be under Poor Law control. By her personal qualities, always those of a very perfect gentlewoman, Miss Booth endeared herself alike to the poor, her colleagues, and the officials."

Her home had been for many years with her sister, the late Mrs. Philip H. Holt, and with her brother-in-law.

The funeral service, at the Ancient Chapel of Toxteth, on Wednesday week, was conducted by the Rev. Charles Craddock.

MRS. ALBERT THORNHILL.

THOUGH not widely known among our churches, the wife of our minister at Carlisle, the Rev. Albert Thornhill, M.A., was respected and beloved by all who knew her. She was a Stalybridge girl, as her husband was a Stalybridge boy. She received her ordinary education at the day-school connected with our church, and her religious education in our church and Sunday-school. A member of the Young Women's Class, conducted for many years by the Rev. W. Harrison, she showed remarkable interest in Biblical and religious subjects. As long as she was a scholar, she never failed to sit for the examinations conducted by the Manchester District Sunday-school Association, always passing in two subjects and mostly in honours. When, after their marriage some years ago, Mr. Thornhill resolved to prepare himself for the ministry, she accompanied him to Cambridge, and then to Oxford, where he took a full course at Manchester College. While encouraging her husband in his studies, she was ever on the alert to prepare herself for the position of a minister's wife, and for this purpose, attended some of the lectures. She won the respect of professors, students, and all who knew her at Oxford. She had a finely strung nature, a keen sense of duty, and was so sympathetic, that the pain and sorrows of others weighed upon her gentle spirit. Her health was never robust, and in less than a year after their settlement at Carlisle, her health completely broke down, and the end came on Sunday, May 20. The funeral took place on Thursday, May 24, and was conducted by her old friend and teacher, the Rev. W. Harrison, at the Carlisle Cemetery. The whole of the congregation showed their respect by attending, and the scholars and teachers sang a hymn by the grave side. It might be truly said of her: she loved all sentient creatures, and would rather yield up her own life than cause one a moment's needless pain.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

III.—HISTORY AND RELIGION.

HISTORY is the attempted presentation of past events in right order and relation. Historic criticism is the criticism of such attempted presentation. It tests the testimony, and, so far as is possible, the testifiers also. As to the events, there can seldom be complete certainty. Yet there are few groups of alleged occurrences out of which some central fact may not be extracted. That the death of Julius Cæsar shook the hearts of men is certainly true; that outer nature was at the same time convulsed may be true, but is probably false. That men were so moved as to think prodigies is the notable fact, and the reports of prodigies help to confirm the fact, whatever may be thought of prodigies themselves. To be free from preconception as to the truth or falsity of circumstance which he can neither prove nor disprove, is the honest critic's first care.

There are religious beliefs which rest on supposed historical events, and the question arises whether such beliefs can really be vital to religion. It is certainly difficult to see how the evidence of things eternal can be interwoven with the witness of things temporal, and not be jeopardised thereby. Absolute truth can hardly be thought of in connection with probable evidence. We are almost forced to the conclusion that religion, for its own security, must be free to untwine itself from that which in course of time may be felt to be historically unassured. It is in spiritual intuition, by which the things of the spirit are spiritually discerned, that the roots of religion take sure and unshaken hold.

(1) It will be said, perhaps, that in revelation—communicated knowledge—we have a guarantee of historic reality. If by revelation is meant communication through dream and vision and spoken word, then it must be remembered that these are themselves occurrences in time and place, and so fall into the mass of uncertified events. If by revelation, on the other hand, is understood the successive developments of religious consciousness and religious experience, then even these, it will be allowed, cannot of themselves determine questions of historical fact.

(2) Nor can authority be safely appealed to as the voucher for historic record, for the claims of authority are themselves based on historic testimony, and stand and fall therewith.

(3) Nor can faith be called in to resolve historic doubt. Faith is a moral effort. It is the faculty to trust and act upon conviction; it has nothing to do with the process by which conviction is formed. It must not be forced into an intellectual court, and made to support arguments which, by their very nature, are addressed to the reason and to the reason only.

B.

THE so-called secularism which is in reality blind to what is permanent, has shown itself incompetent to deal with the complicated conditions of modern life. We cannot live without ideals and hopes, and without the worship of that which is beyond our present attainment.—S. M. Crothers.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

AT the beginning of last week's column, there were some verses from Longfellow's poem "Children," and I hope you know that other charming poem of his, "The Children's Hour," with its picture of his own little girls as they used to come down to their father's study every evening, in days now long ago. We can imagine what splendid stories he used to tell them then!

And there are two other poems of Longfellow's which it is good to read together. The one on "The Village Blacksmith," of course; everybody knows, the one which begins,

"Under a spreading chestnut tree
The village smithy stands," and describes how the blacksmith works there, and then goes on:

"And children coming home from school
Look in at the open door;
They love to see the flaming forge,
And hear the bellows roar,
And catch the burning sparks that fly
Like chaff from a threshing floor."

Long afterwards when the poet was an old man, nearly, if not quite, forty years after he had written "The Village Blacksmith," that spreading chestnut tree must have been cut down, for the children of Cambridge in America, where Longfellow lived, had an arm-chair made of some of its wood, and gave it to him as a present.

Then he wrote another poem "From my Arm-chair," to thank them for their loving thought. He tells them how he remembers the old tree in its prime, when in the summer its great branches made a beautiful shade.

"And when the winds of autumn, with a shout,
Tossed its great arms about,
The shining chestnuts, bursting from the sheath, Dropped to the ground beneath."

And now some of the wood of its branches, made into a chair, have come into his home, and whisper to him of the past:

"The Danish king could not in all his pride
Repel the ocean tide,
But, seated in this chair, I can in rhyme
Roll back the tide of Time."

"I see again, as one in vision sees,
The blossoms and the bees.
And hear the children's voices shout and call,

And the brown chestnuts fall.

"I see the smithy with its fires aglow,
I hear the bellows blow,
And the shrill hammers on the anvil beat
The iron white with heat."

"And thus, dear children, have ye made for me
This day a jubilee,
And to my more than three-score years and ten Brought back my youth again."

It is a beautiful memory picture that the old man saw, and made the Cambridge children see, in his poem of thanks. You should read the whole of the two poems together. Thousands of children have learnt "The Village Blacksmith" by heart. This other poem is worth learning too.

AN APPEAL OF THE SPIRIT.

IN the earnest and touching address which Dr. READ gave on Wednesday afternoon at the drawing-room meeting held through the kindness of Miss LISTER at Hampstead, in the interest of the London Domestic Mission, he dwelt upon two points in particular which have the closest connection with the vitality of our religious life. Those who give themselves to Domestic Mission work are brought into close contact with much grievous suffering among the poor, and often with appalling instances of degradation and those tragedies of human life in which the innocent suffer with the guilty. And yet how often amid the most desperate circumstances one finds courage and heroism in the lowliest places, and a great unselfishness and helpfulness in bearing the heaviest burdens. The faith of the poor often rebukes the wavering faith and courage of those who are cut to the heart by what they see others suffering. For a bitter cry, "Does God care?" will at times break from those who realise the mass of suffering and degradation in the poorest quarters of our great cities. But then comes in the thought which Dr. READ put very forcibly. These are evil conditions which man has made, and the passionate protest of human hearts is witness to us that God does care. How else, indeed, in the steadfast order of this universe, is His will in the matter of pity and righteousness to be made known, but through the living conscience, the pure affection, the determined will of faithful men and women? And we have to realise that this is the appeal to us all of the Divine Spirit. Out of the heart of this marvellous universe, in which it is spirit that is supreme, comes the cry, and the deep conviction of faith, in those who give themselves even in the humblest ways of service to helping their brother's need and fighting against the evil conditions that have arisen. There is divine meaning in life, and God does care. But if the Divine compassion is to be manifested, if the Divine will is to be done amid this confusion of our human affairs, it is we who have got to do it. God has set us here, and is calling us to this work.

There are specific ways of helpfulness in the Domestic Missions in which there is urgent need for more workers, to which we shall allude directly. But it is well to bear in mind that this appeal concerns the whole order of our life. The chief speaker at the drawing-room meeting was Mr. C. S. LOCH, of the Charity Organisation Society, who gave a most interesting exposition of the true meaning of charity, out of what the chairman, Mr. P. M. MARTINEAU, called his wide and wise experience of the poor. True charity, said Mr. LOCH, is not the mere giving of what after all may not nourish at all, but only lead to further waste and degradation; it is a quality of life, the principle of a good life. It is not a passing mood, but a settled habit of mind, from which springs constant personal endeavour. It is a disciplined habit, which would remain considerate of the welfare of others, even were there no longer any need for the giving or receiving of outward gifts. This charity, in the broadest sense, is the ability in a good life to do good. In the practical organisation of life it covers paid and unpaid workers alike. What is required of both is an intelligent understanding of the needs to be met, and the conviction that independent character, above all things, must be encouraged. Mr. LOCH showed in a very lucid manner what great differences there are among the poor amid exactly the same outward circumstances, the quality of life in the people themselves determining whether there shall be a wretched and degraded home or good order and happy human relations. To strengthen the personal element of goodness must be the supreme endeavour of all workers for charity, as it is in the Domestic Missions. The present tendency is to discourage efforts of voluntary charity and throw all responsibility for the better organisation of life on the public authority and the rates; but however much might be done through public institutions and officials, there would always be need for further voluntary help, but help of a non-pecuniary kind. Such helpers could not, and ought not to try to meet all the material wants of the people, but must rather aim to make them good "want-fighters" themselves in response to that searching question, "Can I improve social habit?" There must be intelligent insight into social order, and for this research was of the utmost importance, yet not so as to become a refuge from work and the realities of life. Science was needed, but at the same time religion and morality, to bear on charitable work, to unite all in a common aim. The true love of one's neighbour could not be taught in school; life must teach it, and thus the spirit of all true charity was secured, which must pervade conduct in all the relations of life, whether official or non-official. Ultimately, charity rightly understood would make sons of the prophets of all who were vividly interested in the social problems of the day. These are most imperfect notes of an address in which one felt, as Mr. Gow afterwards said, the passion for intellectual truth combined with the passion of humanity, as it is in all Mr. Lock's work.

In that spirit of true charity we have to take the whole of our life, and in the work of our Domestic Missions is offered one of the most fruitful opportunities for its exercise. Dr. READ, in speaking of the work at Rhyl-street (and the same is true of Bell-street and other missions), pictured the large classes of children gathered in the afternoon Sunday-school, their eager young lives susceptible to all good influences, but left without a full measure of that good for lack of sufficient teachers. It was idle, he said, for us to lament the alienation of the people from the churches, if we neglected the children, who were so ready to be helped and for whom so much could be done. This appeal to the young people of our cultured families, to sacrifice some part of their Sunday afternoon leisure for the sake of helping in this work, Mr. Gow very earnestly enforced, and spoke also of the further opportunity of helpfulness offered to older workers in the weekly visits for the Provident Bank. On this he quoted the judgment of Mr. CHARLES BOOTH: "Taken all in all, when we consider its effect in every direction, no social development of the day seems to me more promising than this of the organised collection of savings by those who seek with single minds the physical, moral, and spiritual welfare of the people."

In these two branches of the work, in teaching the children, and in friendly visits, for a specific helpful purpose, to the homes of the poor, simple and very fruitful opportunities are offered to people of goodwill for natural and most beneficent endeavours of true charity, in that high sense explained by Mr. LOCH. Those who give themselves to such unselfish work find the way opens to larger vision and deeper sympathies, and new powers of helpfulness. They it is who are least ready to doubt the Divine purpose that all this evil is to be overcome by good.

We have added here some passages from the recently published reports of our Missionaries. Let it not be forgotten that to maintain and share in this good work is a veritable call of the Spirit to the Churches.

LONDON DOMESTIC MISSION.

PASSAGES FROM THE MISSIONARIES' REPORTS.

The Rev. F. Summers, of George's Row Mission.

I PRESENT the report of another year's work. In it there is nothing sensational or startling. Still, it is the record of that which, I think, has been the means of doing some good in the district to which it pertains. That district is one of the poorest, as it is again the most unhealthy—judged by the death-rate of all London. In it casual labourers of the poorest kind abound. The docker with his "tanner" an hour is aristocratic compared with the coster, the street seller, and the traveller's porter who haunts the railway termini and hotel doors in hope of wheeling commercial samples or carrying a gentleman's bag. Working women, too, are very numerous. The washerwoman and the charwoman seem to live almost everywhere. And where these are not, the home-worker, as brush-drawer, artificial flower-maker, box-maker, or seamstress, abounds. And if women do not work at home, then they go out to labour in one particular handicraft or another. Indeed, door after door may be knocked at, or room after room may be reached, without being able to find anybody within. The children, in fact, are not brought up—they are dragged up, or they are left to their own devices. Large numbers go to school without meals. On the Committee for Feeding Underfed Children, of which I am secretary, a thousand meals are given in a comparatively short time. It is a sight to see the little army in the act of satisfying its hunger. Apart from this frequent help, how masters and mistresses could teach them, Heaven only knows.

What is wise or unwise in proposed legislation I do not pause to inquire. The politician must do that. The worker among the poor must practically deal with distress as he finds it. The poor and suffering children must have a friend even though the father be worthless or in prison (as I have sometimes found), or the mother be unable to provide even a crust of bread. Some parents can manage to struggle on during the earlier days of the week, but fail for those that follow. Some can find just a bite for the tiny "tots," but can do little or nothing for those who are older. In many cases, of course, the breadwinner has, very likely for many weeks, been out of work. I am not exaggerating. I am speaking what I know and testifying what I see. As to covering, it may be said that limbs are plentiful, but clothing is less obvious. The men, women, and children with mere apologies for shoes meet one at all turns. The sight is often distressing to see. Day-school children, having traped through wet and muddy streets to school with almost soleless underwear, have constantly to sit for the school hours with wet feet, and in some cases are thus contracting diseases which may soon bring misery and shorten life. So much have I felt this that I have started a Boot Club during the present year, in which parents may pay a few pence per week to obtain by degrees boots for themselves or their children. In some circumstances a little bonus may be added. In this particular direction a gentleman has kindly offered continued help, and from some others special assistance has come. I am glad to say that Miss May Withall has taken up the honorary secretaryship of this society, and I hope that some real and lasting good is going to be done.

With the matter of the children on my mind, I may as well say that, what between parental poverty on the one hand and parental wickedness on the other, the rising generation among the very poor have often a cruelly hard time of it. I find this, and I do what I can to mitigate it, either by counsel or help, or firm direction, when fortnightly, on behalf of the local educational authorities, I sit two hours determining whether successive batches of an average of about fifty local parents brought before me by School Visitors shall be more drastically dealt with or not. In some cases I find considerable parental neglect, while in others their parental thoughtlessness or ignorance as to what, in the particular case, can be done is at the bottom of the mischief. In this way I can often so assist or persuade or direct a parent, and can nearly always help or mitigate the sufferings of a child.

The longer I work among the poor, the more I see that one of the most important ways of helping them is by encouraging thrift. I have just alluded to the boot club. I have also a savings bank, a medical club, a coal club, a benevolent society, three sharing-out clubs, and four Phoenix Lodges, with burial funds. Additionally, our Mothers' Meetings are institutions of the same nature. In them large numbers of garments of all kinds have been made. In both these latter directions the labours of Mrs. Enfield and Mrs. Summers, carried on for so many years, are worthy of all praise. In the Wednesday evening Mothers' Meeting, too, Mrs. Carlier renders useful help. A Girls' Club and Sewing Class in which children are taught to make garments for themselves or their parents is carried on by Miss Violet G. Withall, in which capable and competent instruction is given, the children, of course, paying for the materials they use. In the same way, too, holiday funds both for children and adults are kept going. The total sum of money thus week by week collected is very considerable.

I am also engaged on the Thrift Committee of the Social Workers' Union—an association of local clergymen, ministers, guardians, councillors, and others—for the purpose of urging methods of thrift upon the parents of the day-school scholars of the whole borough. Several meetings have already been held, and more are to follow.

Of course, a great obstacle to all such work has been the recent and, in some directions, the still continued unhappy condition of the labour market. I do not think I ever remember such hard times as we have had during the last few years. In my actual knowledge, numbers of people have had not only to pawn clothing and other things, but also to sell right out much of their scanty stock of furniture. Neither the Queen's Fund—a fund not quite as wise as she is good—nor the Act of Parliament has yet been able to deal with the terrible calamity which has unfortunately overwhelmed so many. With the Poor's Purse I have been able to do some little good, but of course it has been little. What has been this among so many?

In all such work I can truly say that what I have been able to do has been done in the unsectarian spirit and purpose of the founders and supporters of the Mission. I can unhesitatingly affirm that where help or guidance or counsel which in this district I can give is needed, it is, without let or hindrance, given irrespective of party or creed or no creed. And I think this fact is locally very well known and appreciated, and I should be sorry if such were not the case.

Dr. Charles Read, of Rhyl Street Mission.

I am in touch with the School Children's Relief Committee of North St. Pancras, Group I., this section comprising three schools in the immediate neighbourhood of Rhyl-street. On their behalf I visit and examine any children for whom certificates are required, or in whose case any other medical judgment is called for. In all these ways my special knowledge and experience in the past seem to have been fitting me for my present duties as a missionary to the poor, so far, at least, as their material well-being is concerned, and this, as we are coming increasingly to recognise, is the necessary basis of all the higher developments of the nature. For if there is one thing more certain in our knowledge than another it is this; that, as with every organism in nature, so with every power and faculty in the complex nature of man, there must be the appropriate conditions of growth if the unfolding life within is ever to attain its full and proper development. This law is inexorable, and there is no possible escape from it; it holds good from the material base to the spiritual summit of man's being, and the laws of nature are the laws of God. I cannot help laying stress on this point, because all my training as a student of medicine, with its preliminary scientific studies, and all my many years of life in the practice of it, have gone to confirm its truth.

The object of our Mission as regards the welfare of the poor is, I know, all-inclusive—it seeks to benefit the body, mind, and spirit of all it can possibly influence. But in my visitations among the very poor I increasingly feel how hopeless it is to expect anything but a dwarfed and stunted growth of the higher faculties of the nature while the material surroundings are so painful and depressing. It is impossible to describe the dreadful condition of most of the houses in the poorer streets that I visit—the dirty state of the passages, the ricketty stairs, the staircase windows with broken panes of glass, begrimed with smoke and dust, the rooms, the floors, walls, and ceilings of which are black with soot and dirt, and the scanty furniture, bed, and bedding, all to match. In the midst of these unholy surroundings, where to mention even the name of God seems to be the veriest mockery, human beings have to live and children have their first experience of what God's world is like. How is it possible, under such conditions as these, that men and women can be even decently clean and self-respecting, much less know what the higher life of man should be? No! until the laws of nature are so altered that we can grow sunflowers in cellars we shall never rear saints in slums.

It is right, no doubt, that, accepting the conditions of life as we find them to-day, we should help our poorer brethren and sisters to make the best of them; but it is wrong if, in accepting them, we should for a single moment acquiesce in them, and come to regard them as an inevitable necessity in the nature of things. If He who said, "The poor alway ye have with you" could speak to us again in this twentieth century, He would surely say, "Shame on the Christian Church if it should always remain so." Whilst, then, we do our best to mitigate the great evils of poverty as they at present exist, we of the Free Christian Churches should be among the foremost of social reformers, and strike at the root of this great Upas tree, under whose baneful shade evils of every kind grow and flourish. And we should begin with the children, for our hope for the better future lies wrapped up in them; but, as things are at present, how pitiful is their condition! I know of nothing more painful than the sight of the children in the poorest families, half-clothed and often hungry, with their pale faces and their mute, appealing looks. We want another Mrs. Browning to stir the nation's heart as she did in her poem, "The Cry of the Children," which largely helped to carry the Factory Acts, and put a stop to the cruel labour enforced on the little ones. To our shame be it said her words are almost as true to-day as they were when uttered now so many years ago:—

"Do you hear the children weeping, O my brothers, Ere the sorrow comes with years?
They are leaning their young heads against their mothers,
And that cannot stop their tears.
They look up with their pale and sunken faces
And their looks are sad to see,
For the man's hoary anguish draws and presses
Down the cheeks of infancy.
They look up with pale and sunken faces,
And their looks are dread to see,
For they mind you of their angels in high places
With eyes turned on Deity."

"How long, O Lord, how long," we may truly say, "shall these things be?" And the only answer is, "As long as the comparative apathy and indifference of the Christian Church lasts in relation to them."

There is knowledge enough in the world already to enable us to put an end to a large proportion of the evils of our social state if only we had moral earnestness enough to make use of that knowledge and give it due effect. What we all need is a fresh baptism of the Spirit, to quicken within us a greater enthusiasm of humanity, and then a better and brighter social day will speedily dawn.

The Rev. S. H. Street, of Bell Street Mission.

In looking back over the work of the twelve months that have elapsed since our last report, my first thought is how impossible it is to attempt to sum up the result of it all. This impossibility, of course, is implied in the very nature of the work our Missions are trying to do, for such result could only be looked for in the lives of men, women and children. Our teachers have plodded on steadily with their work Sunday by Sunday in our School. Our visitors have gone in and out among the homes of the people. Our other workers have laboured in various ways to promote habits of kindness and temperance, to stir up an ambition for better things in the minds of our children and young people, and to urge them to make use of the opportunities they have. We have tried to make our Mission a centre of brightness and an uplifting influence, and to encourage a feeling of comradeship and mutual helpfulness among those who have gathered within its walls.

I can tell of how we have tried to work, the methods we have adopted; but, while I am satisfied that the self-sacrificing efforts that have been made by our workers have been helpful, and that many lives have been made brighter, many temptations resisted, and new efforts made because of it, I cannot sum these results up in a report.

With regard to our district, I do not know that there is anything to say that has not been said before. Many of our neighbours have had long periods of out of work, while many others have been sadly overworked; but, unhappily, this seems to be equally true every year, and the past year has been no worse than usual. Our people seem to be more closely packed every year, and the tendency seems to be for rents to increase. New dwellings are put up from time to time, but the man with the large family and low wage has little chance of getting into them. The rent he would have to pay for the number of rooms he would be required to take is quite prohibitive, and he has to seek a less particular landlord, who allows his rooms to be overcrowded because they are not very desirable and more fortunately situated tenants will seek elsewhere. Another crying evil that forces itself continually on our notice is the overworking of the women and girls, the mercilessly long hours many of them have to work. They are afraid to protest against the continual overtime lest they should lose their work altogether, and the normal working hours are far too long without this added burden. One cannot fail to be struck with the fact that the men fare much better in this respect. These two facts—the overcrowded homes and the girls and women worked beyond their strength—are sufficient to prevent surprise when we find our district produces more than its share of mentally and physically deficient children.

Our Mission is placed close to a wealthy district, and hardship and want and the never-ending struggle to keep the wolf from the door are apt to be emphasised and embittered when brought into close contact with luxury and self-indulgence. The difficulties and hardships of our people make our work the more needful and the better worth doing, and the thanks of all those who are interested in such work are due to the band of workers who have so faithfully tried to lighten the burden somewhat. I would that by some word of mine I could increase their number. Year by year we have to make the same appeal. Our Sunday School steadily increases in numbers. At the time of writing this report we are getting 160 children each Sunday afternoon, and practically we have the same number of teachers that we had when our numbers were 100. We are very unwilling to refuse to admit new children; it would be a misfortune to have to do so. Cannot some of those churches within easy reach of us, and without afternoon schools of their own, come to our help in this matter? To me, the Sunday School seems the best opportunity we have of really permanently helpful work. We are very fortunate in the teachers we have, but their number is too small for the work, and a few volunteers would encourage us all greatly. In other departments recruits are needed, too, but in none so badly as in the Sunday School. Miss Sharpe is always on the look-out for fresh visitors for the district Provident Society, and always ready to help new workers till they get used to their work.

A very useful part of our work in connection with the Sunday School has been the arranging for country holidays for the children during their school vacation. In previous years the Sunday School Society had come to our aid in this matter; but they decided to discontinue this work last year, and we were thus thrown upon our own resources. I am glad to know that they are again undertaking this good work in the coming summer. We decided to try an experiment on somewhat novel lines. We secured the use of a field for a fortnight at Billingshurst, and arranged for the erection of a tent of sufficient size to serve as dining-room and headquarters generally for a party of fifty or sixty. The field was close to the Mission Cottage, and the tent was placed as near as possible to the cottage, so that the needful cookery might be done there and readily conveyed to the tent. I need not here enter into all the details of the arrangements. Suffice it to say that we took a party of 50 children to Billingshurst, arranged for them to sleep in various cottages in the village, and provided all meals and made our headquarters generally in the tent. There was no hitch of any kind in the arrangements. Tea was ready for us shortly after our arrival, and all subsequent meals were ready promptly to time.

Mr. Lansdowne met our party at the station, and after tea he and I distributed the children among the cottages, and found the task a long and somewhat difficult one, for we had to consider both the available accommodation and the children who would be best together. The children were very satisfactorily housed in all but one case, and this case illustrates how careful those who are responsible for sending children to country cottages need to be. The children were, of course, at once removed. The other cottagers were most kind to the children, and tried to make their holiday a thoroughly happy one. I heard on all sides of kindly things that "our lady" had done.

Perhaps it may be of interest to mention our daily bill of fare:—

Breakfast at 8.30, preceded by morning prayer.—Tea, bread and butter and marmalade.

Dinner, 12.30.—Joint and sweets.

Tea, 5.—Tea, bread and butter, and jam or cake.

Supper, 7.30.—Milk and biscuits, or bread and butter.

Workers and children all fared alike, except that we and the children on duty for the day (laying tables, waiting, &c.) had our meals after the others, and were allowed an egg for our breakfast, which caused being on duty to be considered to have its advantages.

We organised all sorts of games for the children—cricket, stoolball, athletic sports, &c. The boys played the girls at cricket, and our boys had a great match with the village boys, which, unhappily, they lost. The athletic sports took several evenings, and the village children entered for some of the events. We had conducted walks for the whole party, and wandered off in small parties as well. Happily we had very little rain. On the one morning that was really wet we had an extempore concert in the tent, which was quite a success.

Our greatest trial came from the wasps, who were unbidden guests at all our meals, and many of us were stung before our fortnight was ended.

On the two Sundays our party attended the little chapel in the village, which we almost filled. I conducted the services on the first Sunday, Mr. Lansdowne taking my place at Bell-street; and on the second Sunday Mr. Lansdowne himself officiated. I had with me as co-workers my wife, Mrs. Abbott, and Mr. Walter Tyler for the whole time, and Mr. Larking and Mr. Rockliffe spent a few days with us also.

It would be impossible to wish for more cheerful and willing workers. Then there was Mrs. Yarrow, our matron at the cottage, and Miss Yarrow, her sister, who looked after the cooking and helped in many other ways. I expect we worried them a good deal, but they never showed it, and were cheerful to the end.

Last, but by no means least, we owe a great debt of gratitude to Mr. and Mrs. Lansdowne. Mr. Lansdowne not only made all the necessary arrangements for us with great thoughtfulness, but both he and Mrs. Lansdowne helped in all sorts of ways while we were there.

The children thoroughly enjoyed their holiday, and certainly looked wonderfully better when they returned home. The inclusive cost worked out roughly at 7s. 9d. per week each person.

To love one's neighbour in the immovable depths means to love in others that which is eternal; for one's neighbour, in the truest sense of the term, is that which approaches nearest to God; in other words, all that is best and purest in man; and it is only by ever lingering near the gates I spoke of, that you can discover this divine in the soul.—Maeterlinck.

THE Almighty Father aims not to make us the workmanship of his hand: that He could do at once, without our co-operation or against our resistance, and then all this world of moral misery could have been avoided; but he aims to make us what His children must be, if they are the children of His Spirit and not the machines of His hand—voluntary fellow-workers with Him, sharers in His purposes; and this can be done, not whether we will or not, but only with our will through our love and loyalty.—John Hamilton Thom.

AMERICAN NOTES.

BY CHAS. W. WENDTE.

THE terrible disaster at San Francisco overshadows every other interest in our country at present. The spectacle of 300,000 homeless and hungry people to be sheltered and fed appealed to all the mental and moral resources of the American nation. Grandly have they met the demands upon their sympathy and abilities. Nearly 20,000,000 dollars in money have been contributed, besides material supplies and private gifts impossible to chronicle. New York, our great financial centre, gave 4,000,000 dollars, Boston, 800,000 dollars. But the generosity of the smaller towns is even more remarkable and touching. The self-restraint, fortitude, and devotion of the stricken thousands in the doomed city were no less inspiring testimonies to the essential excellence of humanity. I have somewhere read that the worn-out impression of an antique coin may be restored by submitting it to a strong heat. So in these furnace-fires of affliction the divine stamp of human nature, effaced by worldliness and evil-doing, has come to the surface again, and we behold once more the lineaments and superscription of Him who created man in His own image, and designed him to become on earth the ministering angel of His beneficence.

Realising that our liberal churches in all that region must have suffered heavily President S. A. Eliot took prompt steps for their relief. Thus far 40,000 dollars have been contributed by our Unitarian churches, through the American Unitarian Association, for the aid of the needy of our communion and the reconstruction of their shattered temples of worship. Our First Church in San Francisco suffered by the earthquake, but escaped the fire. The tower fell through the roof, the gables into the street, and other damage was done. The parishioners, almost without exception, lost their places of business, and heavily in their private fortunes, but few lost their homes. The Second Church, a wooden structure in a remote district, was uninjured, but its congregation is dispersed, and temporarily without means. Across the bay the Oakland church, a handsome stone structure, suffered the loss of its tower and gables. The remaining church edifices, being of wood, escaped the earthquake's blind, unreasoning fury.

The great city will be speedily rebuilt in stronger, securer fashion, of iron and steel, cement and wood, with every safeguard against earthquake and fire. The lesson will not have been learnt at too great a cost if it leads to these precautions and a vastly more beautiful San Francisco. Behind the energy and intelligence of its citizens are the grain fields, farms, orchards, forests, gold mines, oil-wells, and other giant resources of the state of California, with its 168,000 square miles of territory as yet peopled by only two million inhabitants. The 150,000,000 dollars of insurance which San Francisco will recover (half its loss), will make a beginning of its reconstruction possible. Its superb situation, magnificent harbour, vast resources, and intelligent and indomitable people will assure its ultimate restoration and metropolitan growth. From 1812 till now no earthquake of any consequence has disturbed California. A hundred years hence any recurring shock will find itself innocuous against the safeguards of modern civilisation. So we reason, and so we believe.

Turning to Unitarian affairs, we look forward eagerly to a new review devoted to liberal theology. The late Rev. Professor C. C. Everett, of Harvard Divinity School, the scholarly and beloved editor-in-chief of the New World, was deeply grieved at the demise of that journal. On his own death it was found that he had bequeathed nearly his entire estate for the purpose of founding a similar review, subject only to a life-interest for his daughter. This estimable lady has since died, and it is hoped that the new theological journal, which is to be edited by the faculty of the Harvard Divinity School, may soon make its appearance.

The interest taken in Europe in the conversion to orthodoxy of the youngest son of Rev. Dr. Edward Everett Hale, leads me to note that the venerable Master of our Unitarian faith, wrote his son a tender and beautiful letter, assuring him of his sympathy and affection, and wishing him great happiness in his religious awakening. We should have expected as much from Dr. Hale, but should hardly have thought that his son would have desired, under all the circumstances, to repair to Washington, where Dr. Hale is acting as Chaplain of the National Senate, and to take an active part in the conduct of a religious revival in a Presbyterian church.

The preparations for the coming International Congress in Boston in 1907 are well in hand. Perhaps the most notable occurrence thus far in connection with it is the cordial acceptance by Rev. George A. Gordon, D.D., pastor of the Old South (Trinitarian) Congregational Church in Boston, of an invitation to be one of the local committee of eight charged with the organisation of the Congress. Dr. Gordon, a Scotchman by birth, occupies an eminent position in the ranks of the American clergy. His church is the wealthiest and most conspicuous in Boston. It has lately substituted, for its ancient and complicated creed, a simple and broad statement of faith, proposed by its pastor. A preacher of great ability, a lecturer, a writer of scholarly books, and a powerful and independent thinker, Dr. Gordon's accession to the committee counts for much, and assures the interdenominational breadth of the coming Congress.

The Unitarian Women's Alliances of the United States will take for subject of their next year's study classes, "Liberal Religious Movements and Leaders in Foreign Countries." The countries to be studied are Great Britain, Holland, France, Germany, Hungary, Switzerland, India, and Japan. A leaflet outlining the topics and giving references is in preparation. One purpose of this course is to prepare the way for the coming International Congress.

A charming action by one of these alliances was the recent transmission by the Woman's Society of "the ancient Puritan Church of Milton, Mass. (founded in 1678), to the ancient Huguenot churches of the Cevennes, France," of a gift of £20, as an expression of regard and sympathy in their present struggles.

The Ancient Boston Association of Ministers, formed by the Puritan divines, and now conducted by Unitarians, is listening to a series of addresses on "The Ministry as it appears to the other professions and vocations." Doctors, lawyers, editors, business men, have spoken to us, and next week we are to listen to an educator, President Chas. W. Eliot, of Harvard College. It has been a highly interesting and profitable series of meetings.

Two members of President Roosevelt's Cabinet, Minister of War Taft and Attorney-General Moody, are Unitarians. So are the present Governor and Lieut.-Governor of Massachusetts, and the chaplain of its Senate, Rev. Edward A. Horton.

The Unitarian Anniversaries in May are close at hand. Your Rev. Joseph Wood will preach the annual sermon. He will be warmly welcomed.

WAYFARING AT CHAMPEL.

As I went on my pilgrimage I came into a vale. It was not the Valley of the Shadow, whence I had escaped for a time, but the Valley of the Rhone. This is a great river and a swift, whose fountain is beneath the ice, though it flows into sunny seas; and midway it gathers itself into a great water, with vineyards upon its banks and pleasant villages, which look up to the high mountains. And at its flowing out from this mere is a city of no mean note, wherein aforetime dwelt Jean Chauvin. This was a great father in the church, and save that he slandered God and mishandled men, a person of singular virtue.

Now I was leading about a wife, like Cephas and the rest of the Apostles, and my wife adhered to the teaching of the Unitarians, which are a people neither great nor much beloved, for that they accept not the tradition of the elders, but of much vigour and fair repute. And I said unto my wife: "Here are we arrived at the city Calvinus, and forasmuch as we cannot tarry long here, let us make haste and seek out the relics of so great a saint as the chair he sat in, and the church in which he prophesied." But she answered me, and said: "Nay, not so. For there came once to this city a Unitarian, Michael Servetus, whom Calvinus seized and slew; and they have raised unto him a stone near the place where they burned him, for thus do the sons honour the prophets whom their fathers persecuted. And I, who in this age worship God after the same fashion without danger, am moved to look upon this monument. Do thou come thither with me." "That will I right readily," said I unto her, "for this same Servetus was a physician, and a notable man in his art. He was the first who denied that blood flows through certain openings from one half of the heart to the other, for indeed these openings are not to be found; but he held that the blood flows downwards through the arteries and upwards again through the veins; and gladly will I honour the first inventor of that which all our doctors now teach." Wherefore we sought to know where the monument might be found; and this was a hard task, for the inhabitants of this city do not speak the kindly tongue of the Alemanni, but a sort of corrupt Latin, which is called Frankish. Yet, at the last, we understood that what we sought lay far aloof, on the further side of the city. Then said I to my wife, "Let us then rather go to the church and the library, for there are relics not alone of Calvinus, but of other famous men also. He that made a mock of all things in heaven and earth dwelt here, and here is the book in which another pilloried his own soul naked." But she answered and said, "I would liefer look for one moment upon the monument of Servetus than waste hours upon that sorry trinity," for thus, without reverence, she spake in her haste, "Chauvin, Voltaire, Rousseau." So we went through the city a great way.

Then came we at length into that neighbourhood where the man whom we revered had died in pain and reviling, and we sought hither and thither, but in vain, to find his monument. The streets were fair, and beset with goodly houses in gardens, but no man walked therein. Wherefore, I was constrained to enter one of the gardens, where a man who dwelt there was reclining, and to hail him, and say, "Pardon, monsieur, ce chemin conduit-il au monument Michel Servet?" which is, being interpreted, "Sir, can we by this road come unto the monument of Servetus?"

"Nay, verily," answered he, with all courtesy, "but ye are rather going from it. Return along this road to the crossways, and ask whom ye shall there meet, for the monument is not far off." So we thanked him and returned. And at the crossways we waited a weary while. Then espied we a certain dame who was walking afar off; and I approached her and inquired as before. And she sent us along a street, whence at a turn we should pass into another street, and thus and thus should we be satisfied of our search. So we followed her guidance until we were lost, and after that we wandered long, seeking another guide, but finding no man. After a time there came one whom we questioned, and he bade us follow certain ways, which brought us, after many windings, to the place where we had been aforetime. Then said I to my wife: "Can it be that these people make their sport of us, or is it that the monument is invisible?" But she said, "Have patience; perchance the next who tells us our way will know it." So we went forward, and came into a place where there were people, and some traffic. Then said I to one who seemed wise and kind, "Sir, we have long sought a monument to Michael Servetus, which is reported to be in this region. We have had many guides, who have led us, as it were, through a labyrinth, but of the stone we have seen nothing. If it be not a fable, I pray thee direct us on our way thither, for the day is far spent, and we are weary of going." Then this man, being, indeed, as he seemed, both kind and wise, drew a chart for us of the way we should go, and delivered it unto us with clear words, and we thanked him, and by the aid of this chart arrived, after some time, at the stone.

We read what is graven on both sides of it, and were moved by the piety of the sons of Calvin, who follow their father in all righteous ways, but not in the path of hatred and cruelty. And, having long considered it, we departed.

And my wife said to me, "I am indeed weary of this long search. But chiefly I have compassion on thee, for that thou has lost in it so much time, which thou hadst destined for the manuscripts in the great library, both ancient papyri and figured missals, and letters of Theodore Beza, whom thou so much lovest; and the learned Grotius, and it may be—though indeed, Bædekerus saith nought thereof—thine own Erasmus. But wherefore is this monument so painfully hidden? Are the men of Geneva ashamed of it? It is not hard to find the heroes' monument at Basil, or the Lion of Lucerne—nay, it were hard to miss them. Were it not well to move the magistrates and rulers to suffer posts to be set up, with pointing hands, and a writing on them, telling that thus and thus shall men come to the stone of Servetus?" But I answered here, "Nay, I am not of repute or authority enough to move these people; but I will write what hath befallen us, and some who read, and have power to bring this to pass, may, peradventure, do what thou counselest." And we went to see the relics of Calvinus.

A NEW CHURCH FOR ACTON.

THE Acton congregation, which has for four years past worshipped in the Marketplace Auction Room, opened its new building, a pleasant iron church in Creffield-road, on Sunday last. In the morning the Rev. Arthur Hurn, the minister of the church, conducted the service, his subject being "Ideals of our Church: Religious, Intellectual, Social." In the evening the Rev. F. K. Freeston preached to a good number on "The Place of the Sanctuary in Personal and Social Life."

On Monday evening a public meeting was held to celebrate the opening. London Unitarians were well represented, and there was a good attendance. After partaking of tea and coffee, and after a pleasant time of conversation the more formal proceedings commenced with the singing of a hymn and prayer offered by Rev. T. E. M. Edwards.

Mr. JOHN HARRISON, who presided, spoke of his association with and interest in the church since its commencement by the agency of the Provincial Assembly when he was president. He made the welcome announcement that the church might hope to open free of debt.

Mr. J. A. BARNES, the hon. secretary, followed with a statement of church affairs. He told briefly the history of the four years' struggle in the auction room, and gave details of the building scheme; £400 is the cost of the building and furniture; £180 has been raised locally, and by the kindness of other friends practically the whole sum has been realised.

The Rev. W. COPELAND BOWIE spoke of the help that the British and Foreign Unitarian Association had been able to give to the congregation, both by a grant towards its expenses and by finding it a minister.

The Rev. ARTHUR HURN said he had been told by his friends when he first became a Unitarian, a year ago, that he would find no enthusiasm. That was falsified at Acton. They had been able to get on so far because they had a band of people who believed in the gospel of a Unitarian Church and would work for it. So little rested with the minister. He was only one. So much rested with the people. Then he was told a second thing: that Unitarians had no organisation, and were selfish groups of intellectuals. He believed in being intellectual, and did not find it have those evils which were feared. That church was a proof of organisation and sympathy. Alone they could not have done it. And that meeting proved the unity of London Unitarians. They had come to help the beginners at Acton. After the singing of an anthem the Rev. HENRY GOW spoke, dwelling on the necessity for agreement in a church in spite of differences. The Rev. CHAS. ROPER gave some memories of his work at Moss Side, Manchester, and encouraged the Acton church to go ahead, and Dr. C. HERBERT SMITH urged the cultivation of the social side of a church. Their idea of a tennis ground attached was an excellent one. They must get the young people, and they must have good lectures. Mr. Harrison would come and tell them "How I became a musician." Mr. Bowie would come and give them, "How I spend the day at Essex Hall." He himself would come and tell them, "How I raised the Boston Fund." A collection was then taken to help to complete the Building Fund, and Mr. A. Barnes and Mr. J. A. Wilkes proposed and seconded a vote of thanks to the Chairman and speakers. Mr. H. L. Jackson and Mr. Hooper also submitted a vote of thanks to the ladies who had prepared the tea. The singing of a hymn brought the meeting to a close.

THE VAN MISSION.

SIR,—Our friends at Warrington and Bootle made arrangements during the time the van was in their neighbourhood for open-air services on the Sunday afternoon and evening. We were glad to put the van at their disposal, and to learn that at Warrington hundreds of people attended. At Bootle the bad weather unfortunately spoiled everything. There may be other churches along the road we are travelling who would like to have the use of the van on Sundays, and I shall be glad to make arrangements wherever possible. The responsibility for the services would, of course, rest upon the local minister and his people, while we would supply hymn papers, &c. Our Missioners return home on the Saturday evening as a rule, but Mr. Talbot would always render his valuable assistance; and it would be a satisfaction to us to know that the van was not lying idle. May I also make a request to Unitarian friends who attend any of our meetings? We want in some way to be able to distinguish them from strangers, and it is suggested that the wearing of a leaf (without a flower) would enable us to do this. It will, perhaps, interest our friends to know that experience is showing us new opportunities, and that we have now added to our programme mill-gate noonday meetings for factory workers, and evening meetings (6.30 to 7.30) for children. As a result of many inquiries for information, and of the many signatures which are readily inscribed in our visitors' book, we have decided to adopt Unity as a mission monthly. Two pages of the magazine have been placed at our disposal. I shall be glad to send a copy to any friends, and I think it will be possible to obtain copies at the London meetings next week. May I add one further note—that a weekly announcement will be made in THE INQUIRER "Calendar" of the meetings for each succeeding week? With happy acknowledgments of all kinds of willing service which have been rendered, I am, yours,

THOS. P. SPEDDING.

TO VARUNA.

(VEDIC HYMN BY NASHAKA.)

Who is God but the God
Who in wisdom of old
The blue deeps of the skies
Out of the chaos unrolled,
And built the broad earth in its beauty, and filled it with treasures untold?

Centred, enthroned
In each thing is He:
In the breath of the storm,
In the strain of the bee,
In the soul of the radiant morn, in the pulse of the marvellous sea.

Lo! he is Lord
Of the flaming star;
And his law hath gone up
From the nethermost spar
To the sun-kissed domes of snow that flash from mountains afar.

O Mortals, let praise
To your Master arise,
Who shepherd-like leads
The host of the skies,
When the rose-pearl glories have fallen,
and suddenly daylight dies.

With shield of defence
May He guard by our side,
When Vritra assails us
And evils betide,— Ere ever our meek-eyed hopes in the houses of Darkness hide.

What lacketh my prayer
Thy wisdom make whole:
By the might of thy power
Defend us from dole,
From sins that ensnare, and from evils that crush us, O Soul of my soul!

So our bark shall put forth
On a peaceful quest
O'er silvery seas
At thy sweet behest:
Not blown northward nor southward, but sunward to a haven of rest.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Aberdare.—The annual singing festival of the Unitarian Churches was held on May 21st at Tabernacle Congregational Church. The following churches were represented:—Hen-dy-Cwrdd, Trecynon; Highland Place, Aberdare; Cwmbach; Dowlais; Ceincoed; Gellionen; Clydach Vale, and Pentre, Rhondda; and Tabernacle Chapel was crowded both in the afternoon and evening. The afternoon meeting was presided over by Mr. W. R. Morgan, solicitor, Aberdare, who after prayer had been offered by the Rev. J. Hathren Davies, expressed his pleasure at seeing such a large gathering. The annual singing festival was organised to improve their congregational singing, and there was no doubt but that it was doing so. It also served another purpose—it gave them an opportunity of meeting each other to exchange views and to shake hands, and it gave them strength and inspiration for the work of the coming year. The conductor, Mr. J. R. Evans, Ceincoed, then proceeded with his work, and under his baton the vast choir sang magnificently. In the course of the afternoon service addresses were delivered by Mr. John Hopkins, Gellionen; Mr. John Morgan, Clydach Vale; and Mr. B. J. Edwards, Swansea. Mr. Gomer Thomas, Merthyr, presided over the evening meeting, and Councillor L. N. Williams, J.P., Aberdare, gave an address.

Barnard Castle.—The annual spring meeting of the Northumberland and Durham Unitarian Christian Association was held in the Free Christian Church on Saturday, May 19. The president, Rev. W. H. Lambelle, was in the chair, and the Rev. G. A. Ferguson, of Gateshead, read a paper "Unitarianism and Social Questions," which was followed by an animated discussion. After tea a public meeting was held, Mr. A. G. Peaston presiding. Among the speakers were the Revs. W. H. Lambelle, F. Wood, and G. A. Ferguson.

Birmingham: Small Heath.—The anniversary services of the Sunday school were held in Waverley-road Church last Sunday, the preacher being the Rev. William C. Hall, minister of the church. On Monday the scholars had their customary tea and distribution of prizes, followed by a service of song, entitled "Lloyd Garrison," specially arranged by Miss Matthews and Mr. Hall. At all services there were much larger attendances than Waverley-road Church has hitherto known, and the collections were proportionately larger. During the past year the growth of the school work has entirely exceeded the somewhat limited building accommodation.

Colne.—On May 20, the 28th chapel anniversary sermons were preached by the Rev. William Rosling, of Bradford. The morning service was specially for the children. In spite of the unfavourable weather there were good congregations, over 300 being present at the evening service. Mr. Rosling's sermons were most impressive and helpful, and were greatly appreciated.

Crewe.—The annual meeting of the South Cheshire District Unitarian Association of Sunday-schools and congregations was held in the Free Christian Church on Wednesday, May 23, and began with a religious service, at which the Rev. G. von Petzold, of Leicester, was the preacher. At the business meeting the Rev. C. D. Badland took the chair. Mr. A. Orret, of Chester, was elected president, and the Rev. H. Fisher Short, of Crewe, secretary. After tea Ald. J. Briggs presided, and addresses were given by the Revs. J. C. Street, Dendy Agate, and H. F. Short.

Hinckley.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons of last Sunday, at the Great Meeting, were preached by the Rev. J. C. Street, of Shrewsbury, whose direct manner and eloquent appeals found a sympathetic response in the hearts of his hearers. The chapel was full to overflowing at both services. Most satisfactory collections were taken. There was much cheerful singing with the scholars and choir, with Mr. Lewis Wykes at the organ.

Leeds: Holbeck.—The Sunday-school anniversary services were held on May 20, when increased congregations assembled morning, afternoon, and evening. The preacher was the Rev. Wilfred Harris, of Bolton, and his sermons were most appropriate to the occasion, and much enjoyed. The afternoon service was conducted wholly by scholars; their contributions carefully selected from the Bible and the poets, were delivered with good effect from memory, and the efforts of the children proved of much interest to themselves and their hearers. The service, drawn up by the Rev. W. R. Shanks, might be of use elsewhere, and can be had on application to him. The choir and scholars sang special hymns and anthems. The collections were a slight improvement upon last year's.

London: Bermondsey.—On Sunday, May 20, the Sunday-school anniversary and flower services were held. In the afternoon the scholars were addressed by Mr. George Callow. The church was decorated with an abundance of flowers, most of which were kept till the following Wednesday to enhance the effect of a Maypole entertainment and concert, provided by a troop of thirty boys and girls with their leaders, from Hill-street Church, which belongs to a different denomination. The audience, which included a very fair proportion of adults, numbered at least four hundred. A collection, amounting to sixteen shillings, mostly in copper, was taken for the benefit of the Sunday-school.

London: Brixton.—On Wednesday and Thursday, May 23 and 24, very successful performances of the operetta, "The Enchanted Glen," preceded by a musical programme, were given by members of the Girls' Club of the Effra-road Sunday-school. The financial result was also very satisfactory, the whole debt of over £7 to the treasurer of the school being paid off, and a small balance remaining in hand.

London: George's Row.—On Sunday last the Sunday-school anniversary services were held. In the morning the service was conducted by the Rev. F. Summers. In the afternoon Mr. H. G. Chincellor officiated, and gave a most excellent and appropriate address to the children. In the evening, Mr. Fred. Maddison, M.P., took the whole service and delivered a most impressive sermon from the text: "Pure religion and undefiled before God and the Father is, to visit the fatherless and widows in their affliction, and to keep himself unspotted from the world." In these words, he said, he felt that he had the people with him. Those things were the duty of them all. Religion was something more than belief; it was something for them to do. It was more than a creed; it was a life. The religious teaching of their children, he urged, was not a matter for the day school, but for the home and the Sunday-school. Let it be well understood that he was a sincere believer in religion and in God. No thought which ended here—which had no eternal outlook—was complete, or could possibly be satisfactory to the human mind. Reverence, love, and prayer were essential to human life. And the way of the text was the practical side of the matter and one which gave completeness to the whole. One point which very much interested the friends in the afternoon was the presence of Mr. John Harrison, who presided at the organ. The hymns, to popular tunes, were written by the minister. The congregations, especially in the afternoon and evening, were crowded, and the collections amounted to £3 6s. 0½d. On Tuesday last a tea party in connection with the Mothers' Meeting was held, at which about one hundred members were present. Mrs. Williams and Mrs. Moir gave an excellent entertainment, and Mr. Williams, Mr. Carlier, and Mrs. and Mr. Summers spoke.

London: Mansford-street.—The members of the Mansford-street Guild successfully entertained 100 blind people, with their guides, on Saturday, May 26. Tea was followed by a concert, and both were accepted with relish. About 40 friends helped with happiest results.

Manchester: Longsight.—Successful anniversary services were held here on Sunday, May 20th, when the Rev. J. J. Wright, of Atherton, occupied the pulpit. The evening congregation was a very large one. The music, rendered by an augmented choir, consisted of Dr. Henry Watson's Cantata: "A Psalm of Thanksgiving"; and additional interest was added to the performance of the work by the fact that the composer presided at the organ. In the afternoon a musical service was given by the choir, consisting of selections from the great masters.

Poole.—On Sunday, May 20, the Mayor of Poole, Alderman Charles Carter, attended the Hill-street Chapel, which is his own place of worship, in municipal state, attended by members of the Corporation and the borough officials. The service was conducted by the Rev. James Burton, minister of the chapel, and the sermon was preached by the Rev. James Harwood, secretary of the National Conference. The collection, made on behalf of the Cornelia Hospital, amounted to £8 17s. 5d.

Stockport.—On Sunday, May 27, the Rev. B. C. Constable completed a series of four Sunday evening discourses on "Questions for the Day," embracing (1) "Why go to Church?" (2) "Why be Religious?" (3) "Why Seek to do Good?" (4) "Why be a Unitarian?" The congregations were not so large as they have been when discourses explanatory of the Unitarian faith have been given, but they were above the average, and the subjects seemed to be appreciated. Collections were taken last Sunday for the local Infirmary.

Wolverhampton (Presentation).—At the close of the evening service at All Souls' Church on Sunday last a pleasant ceremony took place in connection with the departure of Mr. and Mrs. H. E. Perry from the town. Mr. Perry (who is joining the Rev. Lawrence Scott in the ministry at Denton) has for many years been chairman of the congregation, and has given unsparingly of his time, money, and personal attention to the work. In the deliberations of the church committee his advice and general knowledge have been invaluable, and as he has sat on the committee—and later on the council—of the Midland Christian Union, he has been a connecting link between the church and the Association to which it is so much indebted. As a lay preacher Mr. Perry was always acceptable in the numerous churches he visited. The presentation consisted of an illuminated address—done by one of the church members—a purse of money, and to Mrs. Perry an umbrella suitably engraved. The presentations were made by Mr. Councillor E. Evans and Mr. W. L. Teasdale, and Messrs. Blackshaw, Rickett, and Fletcher also spoke appreciatively. Mr. and Mrs. Perry suitably replied.

Yorkshire: Sunday-school Union.—The annual united ramble took place on Saturday, May 26, when friends to the number of thirty-four arrived by train, or on foot, at Apperley Bridge from Leeds, Idle, Ilkley, and walked to Otley, over the famous Otley Chevin. The weather was not propitious, and contingents from a number of schools did not put in an appearance. Those who were present did not fail, however, to enjoy the outing, being in excellent spirits when they arrived, not overtired, at the attractive Otley Recreation Rooms, where they had tea. The journey home was made by train from Otley.

HUMANITY gives one unvarying verdict. It pronounces the heartless man inhuman. It scorns the traitor, and venerates the patriot. It execrates the villain, and canonises the saint. The very word inhumanity is the testimony of mankind recorded in language itself; a testimony more enduring than the statues of stone that symbolise its reverence for the great and good. The answer is always coming in the soul itself, and in human history. Which do we accept as the true types of human nature—criminals whom society imprisons, the hollow-hearted, grasping, often more corrupt than the criminal himself, or the frank, generous, selfforgetting, whose lives touch us to admiration or tears, and take the soul captive for ever?—G. W. Briggs.

WHIT-WEEK ANNIVERSARY MEETINGS.

ONCE more we have had an anniversary week, at any rate up to Thursday evening, of perfect weather, with every promise of sunshine to the end; and that is a fitting emblem of the happy spirit that has pervaded the great gathering of friends and the proceedings of the various meetings.

The sunshine penetrated even into Little Portland-street Chapel, with mild but clear radiance, and the only shadow there was from the personal sorrow which had befallen our old friend, Mr. JOHN HARRISON, through the death of his brother, so that we could not have his familiar presence at the organ. The music of devotion, however, was not lacking, and the religious service was such that it was good to be there. Dr. DRUMMOND's sermon on "The Covenant of the Spirit," we print this week in full, and are thankful for its survey of the changes of theological thought which have marked the past sixty or seventy years, and for the earnest appeal of its closing passages. It is interesting to note that it is more than seventy years since Dr. DRUMMOND's father, Dr. WILLIAM HAMILTON DRUMMOND, of Dublin, preached the annual sermon of the Association.

With this week's sunshine we shall always associate the happy memory of the presence of Dr. CROTHERS once more in our midst. The report we have attempted of his Essex Hall Lecture on Tuesday evening on "The Making of Religion" leaves out nearly all the poetry, and cannot reproduce in the least the charm and power of its delivery; but the lecture as a whole will soon be published, and of his speech on Wednesday evening we hope next week to have a full report.

The week began, as has now become customary, with the meetings of the Sunday-school Association, the Conference of delegates, the luncheon, and the annual meeting in the afternoon. The paper by the Rev. A. W. Fox on "A Hill-side Sunday-school," and some report of the proceedings we must keep for next week.

On Wednesday, following the service, came the President's luncheon, which offered the first most pleasant opportunity for the greeting of foreign delegates, afterwards more formally given at the business meeting of the Association. The speakers in response were Pasteur E. Giran, minister of the Walloon Church in Amsterdam; Dr. G. C. Cressey, one of the representatives of the American Unitarian Association; Pastor Hackmann, of the German Church in Denmark-hill, representing the "Freunde der Christlichen Welt," Mr. J. C. Chatterji, who spoke for the liberal Hindus of modern India; and Dr. Baart de la Faille, minister of the Dutch Church in Austin Friars, representing the Protestantenbond. America was also represented by Dr. T. L. Eliot, who responded for "Civil and Religious Liberty," proposed by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, and Dr. Crothers, who responded to the toast of "The Essex Hall Lecturer," proposed by Dr. Herbert Smith. At the subsequent business meeting Dr. Giran again spoke, Mr. Charles E. Ware spoke for the American Unitarian Association, and Professor P. N. Chatterji, of Calcutta, for the Brahmo Samaj. The Unitarian Churches of Hungary were represented by Mr. Charles Raffay, and those of Australasia by Mr. Frederick Sinclair, M.A., both of whom are at present students at Manchester College, Oxford. A number of letters of greeting were also received, passages from which will be found in this number. In addition to those quoted, there were letters from the Rev. A. Altherr, of Basel, President of the Schweizerischer Verein für freies Christentum; Pasteur E. Rochat, President of the Geneva branch of that Union; Dr. Gustav Oppert, of Berlin; Signor Bracciforti, of Milan; Professor B. D. Eerdmans, of Leiden; Professor Jean Reville, of Paris; the Rev;

H. Haugerud and Mr. Kristofer Janson, of Christiania; Mr. Theo Berg, of Copenhagen; the Rev. J. Hocart, of Brussels; Miss Clara Tierbach, of the Free Church of Königsberg; Mr. V. R. Shinde, of Bombay, and Dr. W. Tudor Jones, of Wellington, New Zealand.

Of the business meeting we shall have more to tell next week, and simply record here the passing of a resolution, unanimously at last, on the Education Bill. An attempted discussion towards the end of the meeting on Wednesday afternoon resulted in a fine confusion, with amendment and counter amendment, attempting to define the various positions held on the subject of secular education, and the right of entry; and, although the matter was brought up again on Thursday morning at the end of the Conference, there was no greater success in the attempt to reach a clear issue on those points. The attempt was wisely abandoned, and the meeting was finally content to resolve simply that on which all were agreed, in the following terms :—

"That this meeting accords its hearty support to the main principles of the Education Bill now before Parliament, recognising moreover its generous spirit in dealing with the denominational system which it is designed to supplant by one truly national under complete public control and without the imposition of tests upon teachers, accompanied with an earnest endeavour to put an end to the religious strife occasioned by the Act of 1902, outraging as it did the conscientious convictions of Nonconformists by levying rates for the support of denominational schools. That this meeting congratulates the Government on the passing of the first Clause, embodying the principle of public control in all schools by a triumphant majority, and expresses the hope that when the Bill leaves the House of Commons, its second great principle of the abolition of religious tests upon teachers will be equally triumphant."

The public meeting on Wednesday and the Thursday Conference we shall report next week, but publish now the two papers, that on "The Service of Woman in the Early Church," by the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, and that on "Education in Relation to the State, the Church, and the Home," by the Rev. J. J. Wright.

The meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association concluded on Thursday evening with the always pleasant social function of the conversazione at the Portman Rooms, where the guests were received by the President and Mrs. Pearson.

This is an improvident number of THE INQUIRER, but we shall hope next week to pay up at least a good part of the debt in reports.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

IV.—MORALITY AND RELIGION.

MORALITY is the idea of duty; religion is the idea of duty involved in the idea of God. It is difficult to say what account can be given of duty apart from the idea of God. What is there to make it binding? Or, if binding on A, to make it binding on B? On what ground does it rest? Enlightened self-interest or social well-being may be a basis for expediency, but hardly for duty. Lying and stealing, for instance, are offences against society, but society cannot make lying and stealing wrong, it can only forbid them; how am I to know that they are wrong in themselves? What becomes of the idea of duty? What is there to prove obligation? Society may compel, but to compel is not to justify. What foundation is there for its unsupported "ought" or "ought not."

Sometimes the constraining power is found in conscience. But if a man's conscience is only his own, it justifies only his own actions, and only to himself. If it claims to be more, it appeals to a law higher than itself, to which it is itself subordinate. What, then, is that law?

That which alone satisfactorily determines the sense of duty is the sense of God. That which makes right right, and wrong wrong, is the supreme holiness of God. This it is that makes right binding, and valid, and universal, and eternal. Here is the sanction, the authority for morality. If there are in us innate ideas of right and wrong, it is because they correspond to and are derived from the distinctions in the Divine mind between that which is right in itself, absolutely right, and that which is wrong in itself, absolutely wrong. The moral sense is the holiness of God feeling its way through us; the moral law, "Be ye holy" is one with and issues out of the moral fact, "I am holy." Duty speaks with certainty, authority, security, only when she speaks as "the daughter of the voice of God."

Chivalry and honour are sometimes spoken of as if they were the sources of obligation, but a moment's thought will show that they are lacking in sufficiency and authority. They appeal only to those who have reached a certain stage of cultivated moral imagination. They may spring out of self-esteem, or a desire for approbation, or both. In their purest forms they had undoubtedly a religious origin, afterwards forgotten, before they were regarded as independent springs of action. The light of a lost world, it is said, would continue to reach the eye long after the body which sent it forth had become extinct. So, too, religion might die out, and the moral light of it would not immediately pass away. Men might still walk in it—until it grew dim and went out altogether.

CHARLES DICKENS AND LITTLE PORTLAND-STREET CHAPEL.

SIR,—I notice in the review of Mr. Hall's book on Martineau, contained in your last issue, the question is asked whether Dickens attended the Little Portland-street Church after Mr. Tagart's death. In collecting materials for a little work on "Charles Dickens and the Churches of his day," I have given some attention to his connection with Little Portland-street Chapel, and I have reason to suppose that it ceased some years before Dr. Martineau became the minister in 1859. Mr. W. Arthur Sharpe has kindly informed me that a list of subscribers of that year did not contain Dickens's name. There is good reason to suppose that Forster's estimate of two or three years as the duration of the connection is too short, but, if it lasted so long, I do not think it can have survived that year of revolution in Dickens's life, 1856. In the following year he removed to Gadshill for part of the year, and from that date distance alone would have prevented any regular attendance. The few yet remaining who remember Dickens's connection with the church might throw some additional light on the subject, and if some of them would communicate with me I should be grateful.

RESIDUUM OR FOUNDATION?

SIR,—I am afraid I must trespass on your space with one more letter. Mr. Barrow suggests I have fallen into a fallacy in supposing that the simple is therefore fundamental. We have to remember that the words foundation and simplicity, and Mr. Barrow's own word, "ground-work," which he uses as distinct from foundation, are more or less loose and metaphorical expressions, "terms thrown out" as Arnold says, "at a not fully grasped object of the speaker's consciousness." I see the danger, as I imagine Mr. Barrow does, of talking about "our simple and beautiful Gospel" as we often do. Any true conception of the reality of God or of duty, or of the nature of Christ, or the meaning of the world, must bring us into contact with the profound, the infinite, the mysterious; it must fill us with "thoughts beyond the reaches of the soul." But simple is not the opposite of profound; it is the opposite of complex with a suggestion that the subject described as simple has in it something which is easy. By speaking of the foundation of religion as simple I mean that the beginnings of religious education should not be confusing or apart from a child's experience. The Gospel of Jesus which the common people heard gladly is, in many parts of it, easy to begin to understand—and in that sense, simple. The wisest philosopher, the greatest saint will not exhaust its profound meaning.

The Lord's Prayer, the Beatitudes, the Parables of the Sower, the Prodigal Son, the Good Samaritan, have something in them which a child can understand, and they don't need the Apostle's Creed to explain them. Jesus never used the Apostle's Creed, or anything like it, in explaining them. Are we to refrain from teaching the Lord's Prayer until we have inculcated "a whole range of theological conceptions, acquaintance with which is demanded as a preliminary"? The theological conceptions needed to understand the Lord's Prayer are to be found in the Lord's Prayer; it is not subservient to or dependent upon the Apostles' Creed.

Even if the Creed were true the method which began with the Creed, or still even with the Catechism, belongs to the bad old educational ways of ignoring the child mind, and impressing on them conceptions which they could not even begin to understand. Even if it were true, what can a child make of "conceived by the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary—descended into hell, sitteth on the right hand of God the Father. From thence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead"? I do not see that the seven parables of the kingdom need any "doctrinal clue" in order that children should begin to understand their moral and religious meaning. They are not amongst the greatest parables or most suitable for children, but I cannot feel that they need the Apostles' Creed to explain them.

HENRY GOW.

On June 10, 1829, the annual sermon of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was preached by the Rev. William Hamilton Drummond, D.D., minister of the Strand-street Chapel, Dublin. That was six years, all but a month, before his son, Dr. James Drummond, the preacher of this year's anniversary sermon, was born. The sermon of 1829, which was published, was on "Reason the Handmaid of Religion," and it has a dedication, elaborate according to the manner of that day, which it is now interesting to recall:—"To the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, formed and established to promote the knowledge and the love of the One Only Living and True God, as revealed in the Volume of Inspiration: to its Secretary, the Rev. Robert Aspland, the evangelic advocate of that civil and religious liberty which forms the glory of the British Isles, and gives dignity and happiness to man; a minister of the Gospel who finds in religion a light to cheer and irradiate, and who exhibits its benignant influences in the ardour of his benevolence, the inflexibility of his principles, and the energy of his zeal; and to the Rev. W. J. Fox, his friend and coadjutor in the same glorious and triumphant cause, who blends the meekness of wisdom with the potency of truth; and adorns the character of a Christian teacher not more by the splendour of his eloquence, than he recommends it by the beauty of his example: This Sermon, published at the request of the Association, is respectfully inscribed by the author—London, June 30, 1829."

It is not enough to possess a truth; it is essential that the truth should possess us.—Maeterlinck.

THE ASSOCIATION SERMON.

THE COVENANT OF THE SPIRIT.*

BY THE REV. JAMES DRUMMOND, M.A., LL.D., LITT.D., PRINCIPAL OF MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

"A new covenant; not of the letter, but of the Spirit."—2 Cor. iii. 6.

In addressing a society whose determining function is theological, it is natural that one who has passed his seventy-first year should cast a backward glance at the theological changes which have occurred during his own life-time; and though in some of its aspects this is an oft-told tale, nevertheless some of our younger men may not be fully aware of the vast changes which have taken place in Unitarian theology in the course of the last century, and how deeply that theology has been affected, in common with older creeds, by the general trend of thought; and a brief review, accompanied by a summary of the principal results, will not, I trust, be wholly devoid of interest, and may bring before our attention some lessons for our future guidance. It will clearly be impossible, within the limits of a single discourse, to justify by solid argument the changes which attract our notice, and we must be content with suggesting lines of inquiry which have influenced men's thoughts without attempting to exhibit the detailed proofs. It is hardly necessary to remark that for any opinions which may be expressed I alone am responsible.

During the last fifty years a profound and far-reaching change has been slowly taking place in the theology of at least the Protestant section of Christendom, and, indeed, has not left even the Catholic Church wholly untouched. The change within the so-called orthodox denominations has, I think, been deeper and more significant than they themselves, with the exception of some highly trained scholars, have yet recognised; and it is probably among Unitarians that the change has been most complete, and most openly avowed. We may say, in the words of Paul, that old things have passed away, and all things have become new. The change is fundamental, that is to say, it affects the very basis of religion, and with it the whole superstructure of theology. Though it has happily been unaccompanied by similar convulsions, the revolution of thought is probably more far-reaching than at the time of the Reformation; for, while the revolt of the sixteenth century affected indeed the foundations of belief, it retained the ancient principle of reliance on an extraneous and miraculous authority. The Catholic Church accepted two co-ordinate Divinely sanctioned authorities, the Bible and unwritten tradition, both interpreted by the Church through its appointed organs; and from their decision there was no appeal. The reformers found it impossible to bring these two authorities into unison, and they consequently rejected tradition, and insisted that the Scriptures were the sufficient and only rule of faith and practice. Even the Church of England, notwithstanding the present horror of simple Bible teaching, is perfectly explicit upon this point. Although some authority is conceded to the Church, it is declared in the Articles that churches have erred even in matters of faith, and that even general councils have erred in things pertaining to God; and it is laid down that "Holy Scripture containeth all things necessary to salvation; so that whatsoever is not read therein, nor may be proved thereby, is not to be required of any man, that it should be believed as an article of the Faith, or be thought requisite or necessary to salvation." Thus the change brought about by the Reformation was fundamental, in so far as it rejected the supernatural claim of one of the two authorities on which the fabric of Christian theology was reared. The change in our own time, though it has been more gradual, and has not rent Christendom into two contending parties, is even more fundamental, for the progress of thought has removed what remained of the old foundations, and dissolved the miraculous infallibility of the Scriptures. It might seem indeed that this remark would not apply to Unitarians, and that the drift of thought has been towards their old position. As long ago as 1822 Belsham* denied the verbal inspiration of the Bible, and pointed out that Paul's arguments might be inconclusive; and in 1843, Professor Andrews Norton, of Harvard, rejected the "divine origin and authority" of the books of the Old Testament, and assigned a very late date to the Pentateuch.† But these negations were a matter of detail rather than of principle. Belsham maintained that "the apostle carried in his mind at all times, in all places, and to the end of life, a complete and infallible knowledge of the doctrine of Christ, so that whatever he taught or wrote upon that subject is to be received as true, and as of divine authority"; and Norton declared that "it is on Christianity, as a miraculous revelation, that religion must rest as its principal and only safe support," that it is guaranteed by "the immediate action of the Deity intervening in the course of human affairs," and is attested by "his miraculous interposition";‡ and in relation to the Gospels he affirms that "the essential facts of religion have been expressly made known to men on the authority of God."§ Thus, though the fallibility of the Bible was conceded, nevertheless, to Unitarians, as to others, it was the ultimate religious authority, as containing a miraculous communication of infallible truth, and this miraculous guarantee was the basis of faith. And, accordingly, it was usual, on occasions of this kind, to endeavour to prove, by a citation of texts, that the Bible taught Unitarianism, and to explain other texts which might seem inconsistent with this position. We are therefore justified in saying that the theoretic basis of Unitarianism was, at least in substance, identical with that of all the other varieties of Protestant theology.

Now, whatever may be thought of the historical character of recorded miracles, it cannot be denied that they occupy a very different place in men's minds from that which they formerly enjoyed. Paley's famous argument no longer lies at the root of Christian faith, and we have come to see clearly that with the infallibility of the Bible its absolute authority is gone. We cannot appeal to it as the ultimate arbiter in controversy, for its decision on any point in question may, for anything we can tell, if we are destitute of some superior principle of judgment, be among its fallible utterances. If Paul was mistaken about the approaching end of the world, though he avowedly bases his view upon "the word of the Lord," he may have been wrong in other elements of his thought; and if John went astray in his chronology, his philosophy may have embodied some of the transient notions of his time. If it be said that divine and eternal truth lies embedded in the fallible matter of the record, this fails of coercive power because it has no external marks to make it known; truth and error lie in an indistinguishable heap, and must remain so unless we have a sifting principle of spiritual discernment, and our faith responds, not to miraculous dogma, but to religious appeal.

We need not now enter upon the causes of this fundamental change—historical criticism, the advance of science, the theory of evolution, comparative religion, the enlargement of our outlook upon the universe in space and time. Whatever may have been the cause of change in individual minds, it swept with widespread desolation over the fields of educated thought. Numbers of those whose faith had rested upon miracle sank with a cry of despair into agnosticism, and while they saw with dismay the fading glories of the past they could not yet discern the glory that excels. Others, leaping forth as from the thralldom of superstition, rejoiced in the hard solidity of materialism, and looked back upon religion as a strange disease. But others believed that the core of religion was untouched, that indeed it was only shaking off its cumbrous integuments, and that the spiritual glory of Christianity, long dimmed by unhallowed accretions, was about to shine forth with more effulgent rays.

For the change which has taken place was not wholly intellectual, but in part resulted from the demands of the religious spirit. The conception of a God who could be only distantly adored, who had to intervene or interpose in his own universe, who could be brought into communication with his creatures only by miracle, did not correspond with spiritual experience or satisfy spiritual need. That the older theology nourished strong and manly characters and genuine piety, only prejudice could deny. Nevertheless there were men to whom it seemed artificial, and remote from the higher thought of Christianity. There were men whose souls seemed to themselves to tremble under the touch of God, whose hearts were filled with exalted emotion, and who could not believe that the Heavenly Father was to be found only in the miraculous dicta of ancient history, and not in the immediate revelations of spiritual worship. It was by such men that the situation was saved, men to whom religion came at first hand, who met God face to face in the solemn verdicts of conscience, who found in prayer a real communion of Spirit with spirit, who saw the beauty of the Lord their God in all the splendours of creation, and with reverent awe beheld in every man a sacred shrine of Divine mysteries. These men might still retain theoretically the old theology; but they dwelt more on the internal than on the external evidences of Christianity, and, perhaps unknown to themselves, their faith depended, not on questionable historical attestation, but on the requirements and perceptions of their own religious nature. And thus, when the supposed basis of faith, the infallibility of the Bible collapsed, they might experience, indeed, a temporary shock, but they found in time that their faith was unshaken, and that it rested on the immovable rock of spiritual experience, the experience, to use the words of an ancient writer, of God dwelling in man and man in God.

Thus the ultimate basis of theology lies in the religious nature of man when hallowed by the Spirit of God, and the great religious benefit that results from the breaking up of old forms of thought lies in this, that we are driven back upon the primary needs and aspirations and experiences of the human soul, and thus reach a foundation which does not perish with the shifting sands of knowledge, and finds a fellowship of the Spirit which extends far beyond the narrow boundaries of our divergent thoughts. Theology expresses the hidden contents of this religious nature in terms of thought and knowledge, and so it necessarily changes, as all the elements of our being grow in depth and range; and Christian theology has to interpret, in conformity with expanding knowledge, the Christian spirit of life, which is nurtured and sustained by the Scriptures and by the tradition of holy living in the Church, and which we trust is to grow purer and more powerful from generation to generation. "It is not I that live, but Christ that lives in me," expresses, not a dogma, but an experience, and in proportion as we enter into that experience do we reach the ultimate basis of Christian theology.

And now let us take a hasty survey of some of the particular effects of this fundamental change.

In the first place it follows immediately from what has been said that theology has ceased to be primary, and has become the secondary expression of an antecedent faith. Dogma has its source in religion, and not religion in dogma; and though religious emotion and the perception of religious truth are contemporaneous and mutually dependent, still religion grasps the reality of its object before attempting to describe its vision, or to express its immediate experiences in formulated thought. Christianity, accordingly, is not a miraculous communication of dogma, without which there can be no religion, but appeals to spiritual wants and capabilities which find in it their satisfaction, and infuses a principle of life which is at once felt to be divine, and to bring the soul into relation with a higher realm of being. The creeds might disappear, and nevertheless the beatitudes and the parable of the prodigal son would not lose their beauty or their power of appeal. Many a humble Christian loves Christ, and worships God, and fulfils duty, and looks forward to immortality, who would be quite unable to justify these things to a sceptical philosopher and the devout life which wells up within his heart may contain implicitly a multitude of truths of which he is hardly aware, and which certainly he has never attempted to define. Then, since man is intellectual as well as spiritual, theology steps in, and seeks, by interpreting the hidden life, to construct a system of religious truth, to justify it in the court of reason, and assign it its due place within the realm of knowledge. Theology is indeed as necessary to the perfection of religion as science is to our comprehension of the material world; but as sensation must precede science, so the soul must adore before it formulates.

Secondly, a new and precious light is shed upon the teachings of the Bible itself. These have ceased to be hard and detached grains of doctrine or statements of some transient miraculous fact, and have become normal outpourings of the spirit of man in its communion with the Spirit of God, exceptional indeed, as the genius of Shakespeare is exceptional, in range and power, but nevertheless illustrating and thereby liberating the secret forces of our own souls, and revealing universal laws of life and growth. Well do I remember how, in my young days, some of the deepest sayings of the New Testament were explained away, as pertaining only to the primitive age, and how my heart refused to acquiesce in these explanations. Some things were referred solely to the circumstances of the time, and Paley was regarded as an oracle of wisdom when he declared that such expressions as regeneration and conversion had no meaning for us. Other things were explained as descriptive only of the miraculous gifts of the Apostles; for instance, "God hath revealed them unto us by his Spirit." But now surely we can perceive that these utterances are declarations of universal truth, and we can enter with sympathetic insight into the spirit of the Apostles, and take home to ourselves, each in his own humble measure, the spiritual requirements and the spiritual revelations of the earliest disciples, yes, even of Christ himself. It is still to the pure and childlike heart that revelation comes. It is still true that men must be born from above, and that only the spiritual mind can search out the deep things of God.

Thus we are led to an altered view of revelation. Revelation was regarded, and in many quarters is still regarded, as a miraculous communication of dogma. The nature of revelation is a fair subject of inquiry; but it is hardly just to say that men do not believe in revelation because their conception of it is different from that which has been ordinarily held. Paul describes revelation as a taking away of a veil from the heart, so that God shines in the heart, to give the light of the knowledge of the glory of God in the face of Jesus Christ. Here there is an internal change, a Divine light rising within the heart. There is an external manifestation, the face of Jesus Christ, which so appeals to the heart that the veil of sense and prejudice and pride drops away, and the light is able to stream in. And what is revealed is not dogma, but the glory of God, the effulgence of his character, of his love, his forgiveness, his holiness, shining in a human face. Many of us may have seen faces which we have long remembered on account of the beauty and spirituality of their expression, a glory of God shining from them, a word made flesh, and tremblingly alive in every feature. We cannot look upon the face of Christ; but we love to picture it in our imagination, to feel the tender touch of his hand, and to hear the gracious words that issue from his lips; and though the impression conveyed by a record must lose in clearness and intensity, still the revelation is there, a revelation, not of dogma, but of spirit, not of the metaphysics, but of the character of God.

Akin to this is a changed view of inspiration. The words of Belsham represent the view which was formerly prevalent. He says: "Inspiration, that is, the supernatural communication of truth to the mind, being a miracle, is not to be admitted in any case but upon the clearest evidence. The apostles by their miracles exhibited the most satisfactory proofs that they were divinely instructed and authorised to teach the doctrine of Christ; whatever, therefore, they advance as such, must be received as a revelation from heaven."* In accordance with this doctrine unmeasured scorn was poured upon all who professed to act under the influence of any Divine illumination or impulse, if they were not able to work a miracle to prove that they were not fools or cheats; and great prophetic souls were contemptuously set down as fanatical dreamers or impostors. But now we see that even the inspiration of the apostles was no guarantee of intellectual infallibility. Paul describes with the utmost confidence the approaching advent of the glorified Christ; but the event never took place, and Paul's holiest inspiration must be found in passages which appeal to our own spiritual apprehension. We do not want a miracle to guarantee the reality of our inward strife, and of the peace which comes from simple surrender to the love of God revealed in Christ. Hence we can give a vast extension to the idea of inspiration, and recognise it in the normal exaltation of human faculty, though that exaltation does not preclude the possibility of intellectual error. Human conditions and limitations mingle with the Divine action, and the imperfection of knowledge does not prove the absence of God. It may be that a mind absolutely pure and surrendered to the Father's will would reflect Divine truth without distortion, as a sleeping lake may reflect the midnight heavens; but it is one thing for the pure in heart to see God, and another thing to describe the vision and all its accompaniments in faultless propositions. Theology may stumble, infallibility and miracle may cease, and still we can see inspiration exhibited in its various degrees in all who are led by the Spirit of God, while that Spirit blows where it lists, and refuses our artificial trammels.

This altered view has a world-wide range, and makes it easy to accept results which are suggested by the comparative study of religions. It is no longer possible to look upon Judaism and Christianity as the only heaven-born faiths amid the foul mass of falsehood and fanaticism. Imperfection, I repeat, does not prove the absence of the Divine. Even in Christianity the treasure comes in an earthen casket, and everywhere the Divine Word has mingled in the sordid cares and puerile thought and unhallowed superstitions of men, gradually leading them to finer issues, and, like a hidden leaven, slowly penetrating the reluctant mass, and unfolding the creative idea to which our nature must ultimately conform. Christianity may indeed be, as we believe, the highest among the religions of mankind; but instead of shining like a solitary beacon in the midst of a dark and ruined world, it sheds an interpreting light upon the struggling thoughts and the vague aspirations of men, and teaches us to see in all some traces of the guiding providence of Him who is above all, and through all, and in all, and who, amid the infirmities and the sins and the errors of nations, is still working out His grand designs. This view has lifted a terrible oppression from the heart. We no longer sit mourning in the midst of a God-forsaken world, from whose awful doom a little band of the elect are saved; for in every nation the Divine voice has been heard, and even now, in spite of all the greed and fraud and violence which afflict the nations, the discordant cries of men are yielding to that higher voice, and the Christian hope of universal brotherhood was never so bright as at the present day.

It is less easy to speak of Christology, for on this subject there is probably a much greater diversity of opinion and sentiment among Unitarians than there is in regard to the topics already touched upon, and I have no means of estimating the extent of the agreement. But, speaking generally, I may venture to say that the old view has disappeared which looked upon Christ as a kind of miraculous official, a man, indeed, but one who was quite distinct from all other men—the “ambassador,” whose duty it was to proclaim and establish certain doctrines, and the judge who was to discharge certain functions in the grand catastrophe which was to close the history of the world. He has now taken his place among men as one of the supreme spiritual leaders, who through a divine insight have interpreted the things of God, and, while like some others he is necessarily alone in historical position, he is unique, not in the nature, but in the richness and purity of his endowments. He is the Son of God, not because there are no others, but because it was he who impressed this grand idea upon the consciousness of men, and because he had all the tenderness of love and all the intimacy of communion which the term suggests. Hence we are drawn to him, not by dry theological proofs that we may trust his word, but by reverent and grateful love, by a perception of the deep things in his spirit, by a revealing of our own hidden life, with all its needs and possibilities, and by a sense of his healing and quickening power. Thus, while the doctrine of the person of Christ still marks the broad cleavage between the Unitarian and other forms of Christianity, there is, or at all events may be, a distinct approximation on the Unitarian side to the experiences and sentiments of evangelical Christians. But the approximation has not been all on one side. In circles known as orthodox there has been a growing tendency to dwell on the human side of Christ's personality. The hard and explicit dogma of the hypostatic union is sometimes converted into very vague expressions, such as “the incarnation of Divine love,” a phrase which in itself does not go beyond pure Unitarianism. And again the very unorthodox, and to my mind very irrational, doctrine of Kenosis—the notion that the second person of the Trinity, in becoming incarnate, emptied himself of some at least of his Divine attributes—has attracted a good deal of favour, though it is a distinct renunciation of the ecclesiastical dogma, and presents us with a Christ whose humanity has swallowed up his divinity. These approximations are due to the general recognition of the interpenetration of the human with the Divine, of God through all and in all, of man as the temple of the Holy Spirit, and at the same time to the felt impossibility of determining the precise extent and method of this union, and the perception that in its largest measure it does not wholly obliterate the limitations, the weakness, and the ignorance of man. Surely it is an immense gain if we can agree in acknowledging the intimate union of the Divine and human in Christ, and, in its degree, in the whole spiritual fraternity of the children of God, while we allow the various attempts to interpret this union dogmatically to sink into a secondary place.

And now, in conclusion, let us endeavour to deduce a few practical lessons from this altered condition of thought.

In the first place, now, as in the days of Paul, our speech and our preaching should not be with enticing words of man's wisdom, but in demonstration of the spirit and of power. If theology has its ultimate roots in the deep recesses of the spiritual life, then, even as theologians, we must make our appeal first and chiefly to the spiritual nature; or, in other words, we must go down to the universal elements where, in communion with God, men become united with one another. There must be more loving service, more self-consecration, a more direct appeal to the devout emotions, a stronger building up of the faith that overcomes the world. We are divided from one another by our intellectual views; for these are necessarily partial, and dependent on varying knowledge, culture, and powers of thought. But when we adore, and love, and aspire, we feel that one spirit is animating every heart, and one divine attraction drawing us all towards the same central light. Apart from this deep life in God, theology becomes a vain wrangle, which may puff us up with a sense of our superior wisdom, and debase us with a shallow contempt for beliefs which we are too dull to understand. But when theology supervenes upon a hidden life of the soul, which has been nurtured by the highest spiritual influences and been taught by its own profound experience, it will bring light and leading to the troubled thoughts of men; and if it be compelled to deny as well as affirm, it will go with loving and sympathetic touch amid the pathos of human error, and, lest too rude a hand should demolish the permanent truth along with its perishing form, it will seek above all to instil the nobler conception so that the soul will gently rise above its narrow views, and, when it dismisses a long-cherished error, will find itself already in a more glorious temple. Intellectual contempt and self-importance may destroy faith; only a soul on fire with the love of God and man can create it.

It follows from these remarks that in our endeavour, which to us seems to be a very necessary endeavour, to reconstruct the system of Christian doctrine, we must seek to understand the old theology, and to treat it with a reverent and kindly insight. This would be our duty even if the kindness were not reciprocated. But a great change has come over the controversial field. There is a widespread movement, of which distinctive Unitarianism forms but a small part. To a very large extent Unitarians and Trinitarians are engaged upon the same problems, and investigation is taking the place of controversy. The need of some reconstruction is acknowledged in sects which till lately were entrenched in unalterable dogma. Our free position gives us to that extent an advantage in this work. But what is needed above all is a large and illumined soul, which can understand the religious impulses out of which the older theology grew, and the spiritual wants to which it appealed, and therefore, in rejecting what appears to be error, is able to conserve the underlying truth, and to give it a form and expression in which the religious sentiment can rest with deeper satisfaction. It is easy to see what catholicity of thought and experience is required for this achievement. There are some who seem to pride themselves on their narrowness of mind, and give thanks that they are not as other men, full of childish sentiments and superstitious frailties. But the Christian theologian will know the limitation of his view, and be aware that clouds of error must hang over his thought and practice till he has reached the measure of the stature of the fulness of Christ. And so he will have a tender regard for what seem to him the mistakes of men; and for himself he will humbly aspire, knowing that he has not already attained, neither is already perfect.

Hence, lastly, we must endeavour to promote catholicity, and through catholicity the unity of the spirit. Christendom has walled itself off from the surrounding world, and within its own borders contentious parties have tried to shut up the Spirit of God within all sorts of sectarian cloisters. But the Word of God is not bound. It goes on its own free way, and heeds not our artificial barriers. When our Whitsuntide celebrations bring a fresh outpouring of the Pentecostal Spirit, our discordant cries will die away, and with one heart and one voice we shall adore the Father, who is above all, and through all, and in all. Christianity is a religion of the universal and eternal Spirit, and proclaims a kingdom of God wide as the world and lasting as the race of man. We are moving here amid shadows, and see as in a mirror, darkly, and yet we are guided by the light that never changes. There are diversities of thought, of modes of worship, of social service, but one Spirit; and all round the world we are members one of another. And even now the vision comes of a new heaven and a new earth, wherein dwelleth righteousness; and the glorious Christ, in whom the fulness of the Spirit abode, is enthroned above empires and churches, and shall reign till He has put the hosts of sin and error under

His feet, and at last God is all in all. And a great voice of praise is heard from heaven and earth and sea: "Unto Him that sitteth on the throne, and unto the Lamb, be the blessing, and the honour, and the glory, and the dominion, for ever and ever. Amen."

THE ESSEX HALL LECTURE.

THE MAKING OF RELIGION.

BY THE REV. S. M. CROTHERS, D.D.

THERE was a crowded audience on Tuesday evening for the Essex Hall Lecture, when the President of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, Mr. C. F. Pearson, took the chair.

The lecturer, Dr. Crothers, of Cambridge, Mass., did not speak as a stranger in that hall, for at the International meetings in 1901 he was present, and gave an address on "The Sympathy of Religions," and spoke also on "The Unitarian Message and Mission." He left with us then memories of a very charming personality, with gifts of the finest spiritual power, and a gift of speech, unencumbered and direct, to which it was a delight to listen. Such impressions were deepened by the lecture on Tuesday evening. The only note that Dr. Crothers had was of a quotation from Lowell which he used towards the close; but a verbatim report of the lecture was taken, and it will be published as speedily as possible.

"The Making of Religion" was the subject of the lecture. To understand this aright, said Dr. Crothers, and to keep a firm hold on the reality of the subject, one must not trust too much to the attempt to get back to origins. Religion is one of the supreme and abiding facts of life, and must be regarded like any other great manifestation of energy. As in the case of a mighty river, if one traced it back to one source, a tiny little stream issuing from a lake far up among the mountains, one could get no conception of the reality of the river as a whole—one must consider the mighty tributaries, and the myriad streams which flowed in to make the river—so it was with religion. Religion is here now, a vital thing of experience, and it was not to be explained by getting back to one historical source, for there were many, and they must consider the history as a whole.

The mystery of love and wonder, of worship and aspiration, which were the constant elements in religion, came down through the ages mingling in the one mighty stream, and there were certain great periods in the history which were of peculiar interest, where streams coming from a distance converged and flowed together to enrich the greater whole.

It was difficult for them to conceive of an unmoral religion, since they had come to worship the good, the just, the pure, and could not think of anything as true worship which had not a certain element of purity and goodness about it. They had come to believe in God as the high and holy One that inhabiteth eternity, and it was hard to conceive of faith without some moral implication. It was hard to understand a character like that of Jacob, the type of a religious man without any tincture of moral insight. The great significance of the Old Testament story was that they saw coming together the two great forces, the tendency to worship, and that of righteousness. For a long time they were not thought to be the same, but through the turmoil of the time of the great prophets they saw at last that they were one.

In the history of Christianity also they saw the points at which great streams flowed together. In considering its beginning, they must not try to shut out the vision of the turmoil of the ancient world, or, like the Christian apologists, ignore the signs of promise it contained, the splendid enthusiasm of the Stoics, the wide new thought of the Neo-Platonists, the mysticism of the East. There were multitudes of men seeking for new light and truth, and the great life of the early Christian Church preserved not simply the thought of the little band of first disciples; those other streams flowed in, from the common thought and aspiration of one of the greatest ages this world has ever seen. They would not understand it by belittling the spiritual energy of the world, nor would they understand Jesus by belittling the race to which he belonged.

Another great period in the history was that of the Protestant Reformation. Matthew Arnold had constantly bewailed the narrowness of the Nonconformist conscience, and uttered a warning against getting out of the main current of national life. But the main current was something very different from some established ancient channel, which the current once may have made, but afterwards may have left. The real significance of the Reformation and of English Puritanism was not in any forms of "Hebraising," to which the men of that time were prone, it was in the new consciousness of the religiousness of what the Englishmen of the time were doing, thinking, and feeling. Their secular thoughts and feelings, half expressed because of the fear of ecclesiastical censure, then came to a splendid awakening, the things which made the real religion of home and heart. The spirit of the time was expressed in Latimer's Sermon of the Plough, his integrity, civic sense, scorn of fraud and sham, all expressed in manful fashion by one who said, "This is religion."

Thus it appeared that fuller religious life was always born out of struggle, and if it was asked where they should find the faith of the present, the promise of the new religion, it would be not where life was quiet, and beautiful, and finished, but where it was most intense, where there was most contradiction of sinners, and contradiction of saints; where the living questions were being debated. The future of religion was not in those questions which were asked, and might be answered, in the Catechism, but in the questions which men are compelled to ask to-day, and for which they had not yet found a sufficient answer.

There were two most significant facts in the life of the present time, the entering in of the scientific spirit to thoroughly religious minds, and the power of the great democratic awakening.

There was a generation of young men growing up educated in the spirit and temper of scientific thought and method, and, while there was a tendency on the part of religious men to escape from the contact of serious thinking, science in the sense of pure, disinterested love of truth had become more than a vocation or a mere exercise of intellectual curiosity, it had become an austere piety. Those men, when they looked upon conventional religion were shocked by what they could only call its profanity; and there was now set up a new standard of veracity. It was something different from the fierce holding to one's own opinion and calling that truth. It meant purity of mind, seeking truth as a worshipper, with no conditions of one's own, seeking to be free from all prejudice, local influence, or personal pride, to stand before a subject of thought, and let the truth impress itself upon the mind, and then to give an absolutely simple report of what was seen and found. That new stern worship of truth was one of the elements of the higher religiousness of the age. It was a great stream drawing near, and it was vain for the Church to heap up barriers and build dykes to keep it out.

The second was the power of the great democratic awakening and idealism of the time, with its passion for human equality. Augustine long ago had pointed to that truth, when he said that the only kindness which could continue was brotherly kindness, which could exist between equals; and this they arrived at, not through levelling down, but levelling up.

In America a significant sign of the times was found in the schools of philanthropy established in their cities for the patient study of human conditions, not with the idea of always giving, giving, but to get a knowledge of the truth, and then as brother men to engage in the great divine work of uplifting humanity.

The actual religiousness of that age was not waiting for someone to organise it according to the old lines, it was already organising itself, and what they must aim at was economic efficiency, to use all the spiritual energy there was for the great end of religion, and that was not merely salvation of the individual soul, but of human society—the cleansing of society from sin, building it up in strength, hope, and love, with the possibility of worship for every man. That was the ideal which was coming. For this all lovers of light and truth in every community must help.

Looking back to the past, they saw the great cloud of witnesses, with the light in their faces, all worshippers, with something of the transcendent vision. What was it they saw that made them so full of light? To understand that they must not look back into their faces, but turn to see what they were looking at. They were men whose faces shone because they were looking forward, because standing at the beginning of a great task they saw and knew the light, dawning from afar. They were happy because they were looking in the direction wherein hope always dawns. They were knowing, because they were doing God's will. They were believing, because out of their experience hope was made, and faith came again. They were children of the dawn and they rejoiced in the light. And so, for themselves, they had simply to turn, not away from the saints and heroes of the past, but in the direction in which they turned, and the glory of God would be to them also revealed.

At the conclusion of the lecture, the Revs. J. ESTLIN CARPENTER and CHARLES HARGROVE spoke in warm acknowledgment and gratitude to Dr. Crothers. The deep impression made by the lecture, Mr. Carpenter expressed by saying that most of them would only desire to go straight home and pray more earnestly than ever, "Thy kingdom come, Thy will be done on earth as it is in heaven." Yet it seemed fitting that some words of thanks should be spoken, for a lecture which had lifted them to such heights, and given such stimulus to their faith and courage.

The thanks of the meeting were expressed in very warm and long-continued acclamation.

THE SERVICE OF WOMAN IN THE EARLY CHRISTIAN CHURCH.*

By the Rev. GERTRUD VON PETZOLD, M.A.

IN speaking to you of the Service of Woman in the Early Christian Church, and of her place in the Church of to-day, let me take for my motto, for my starting-point, those beautiful verses of an Old Testament prophecy, running thus:—"And it shall come to pass afterward, that I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh; and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy, your old men shall dream dreams, your young men shall see visions: and also upon the servants and upon the handmaids in those days will I pour out my spirit."

It seems a glorious passage, this, in which the prophet Joel, in a high moment of spiritual exaltation, gives expression to his ideal of a religious community, a people of God; when there shall cease to be any difference of economic or social position, any gulf between rich and poor, between slave and freedman, between man and woman; when the spirit of God shall be poured out upon them all without distinction of sex or regard of person, shall so fill their minds and possess their hearts that both man and woman, both son and daughter, man-servant and maid-servant, shall begin to speak of that which is in their hearts, of that which moves them so deeply as to make all outward appearances, all earthly distinctions, seem of little moment in the light of that great new overpowering spiritual force which has come into their life and given it an altogether new significance.

But it was only a vision, this which the Prophet saw, and which was never fulfilled in his time and generation, for the Jewish people in his days and those that came after had become well nigh incapable of experiencing those deep, genuine religious feelings and aspirations which had characterised them in the past; their religious worship had begun to harden into ritual and mere outward ceremonial, and the outpourings of the spirit came to be supplanted by too strict a regard for the letter of the law.

And so the fulfilment of Joel's prophecy, the realisation of his great spiritual vision, was reserved for a later time and generation—for the time of early Christianity. On the Day of Pentecost, Peter—a poor, toil-worn fisherman, yet one of the most ardent followers of that new Messiah who had been crucified at Golgotha, one, too, who had come to know his own heart's bitterness in the dark hour of temptation—Peter began to pour out the new-gained convictions of his soul, the new-gained message of the spirit before a large concourse of people, wondering, yet eager to hear of the new religion which was moving these followers of the Crucified to their heart's foundation; of this great inspiration which had come over men and women alike, and was removing—all in a moment, as it were—all barriers of sex, society, country.

All great religions, my friends, have had their Pentecost, their priceless moments of high spiritual exaltation, of divine inspiration—the Christian Religion perhaps more so than any other, wherefore the Christian Religion also has accomplished greater, nobler results than any other.

Let us dwell this morning on one of these results—to my mind the deepest, the most far-reaching, the most promising of all—namely, the enfranchisement of woman. Do you say, Surely that is overstating the case, for non-Christian civilisations, like those of Rome and Greece, have at various times given their women high places both in the social and intellectual world? May be that is so up to a certain point—for who would not gladly pay his tribute of veneration to those grave, proud Roman matrons, who were both distinguished by their domestic virtues and their unflinching patriotism; or who would not treasure the memory of the beautiful and heroic Hypatia who lectured on philosophy to the men and women of the proud city of Alexandria and counted even a Christian Bishop among her pupils? These were exceptional cases, and, on the whole, it remains true that neither Romans nor Greeks gave their women an adequate social status in private or public life; for, as, on the one hand, they had no conception of the sacredness of the marriage relation, they, on the other, paid little heed to an adequate education of their women (the Greek sage, Plato, we know, did so theoretically), and gave them little, if any, opportunity of sharing in the duties and responsibilities of public life. Nor were the Jews much better in this respect. The chief object of marriage in their eyes was to have children to carry on their family traditions; and up to a late date in their history they were, as we know, certainly not monogamists. Woman, at the worst, was looked upon as a necessary evil, at the best as an inferior edition of man.

Yet, you might say, did things become so much better through Christianity? Take the Apostle Paul, for instance: surely his ideas of marriage were not of the highest, looking upon it as he did merely as a preventative of immorality, and to be adopted only as the lesser of two evils? That is so; but then, we have to remember that Paul was a born Jew, and in this particular matter was unable to rid himself altogether of his Jewish prejudices; also his idea of marriage was largely dominated by his eschatological beliefs, expecting as he did that the Lord would return in his own time, and thinking it, therefore, neither wise nor profitable to increase one's responsibilities for so short a space of time, when the all-important thing was to get ready for the Lord's coming.

And, in this connection, let us now consider the apostle's famous injunctions in regard to women praying and prophesying in church. There are two passages we have to consider—one in the eleventh, the other in the fourteenth chapter of 1 Corinthians. In the former he expressly allows women to pray and prophesy in church, provided that they, in accordance with Oriental customs, wore veils on their heads—and this in order partly to signify their submission to male authority, as he quaintly puts it, partly "because of the angels"—i.e., after the ancient Hebrew myth, which we find in Genesis vi., that the angels, the sons of God, may not fall in love with the daughters of men! But now turn to the fourteenth chapter of this same epistle. There we read expressly: "Let the women keep silence in the churches, for it is not permitted unto them to speak" (verses 34-36). How can we reconcile this direct and uncompromising prohibition of a thing which had been expressly permitted—though with the qualification of the veil—in a former chapter? Surely the apostle cannot have changed his mind in the course of writing one and the same letter! Well, there are two solutions of the difficulty. The one is to suppose, with the majority of German theologians, that the three verses in the fourteenth chapter are a later interpolation, which is shown by their different position in several ancient MSS.; or, if we retain the passage, we interpret it so that the apostle can here only refer to indiscriminate talking and asking questions on the part of the women. It is true, the same prohibition is repeated by the author of 1 Timothy, who boldly declares: "But I permit not a woman to teach, nor to have dominion over a man," substantiating his contention by the story of the Creation, according to which Adam was made before Eve, and Adam was not beguiled in the first instance, but only succumbed to the influence of Eve!

Now, there is no need for us to enter into this quaint argumentation. However tempting it seems, all we have to point out is this: 1 and 2 Timothy, as well as Titus—the so-called Pastoral Epistles—though written under the name of Paul, show, both by their warnings against Gnostic errors and by their definite ecclesiastical organisation, that they date, not from the time of the great apostle, but rather from the end of the first century, when Gnosticism had already made itself felt, and when the Church, forming its early prophetic traditions, would no longer tolerate a ministry of women. In the Apostle Paul's time, however, this change had not yet set in, and, whatever Jewish prejudices he may have had against the public activity of women, his firm belief in the prophetic ministry, in the free distribution of the charisma, the gift of the spirit, necessarily led him to allow also to women what he claimed for himself and all believers.

*A paper read at Essex Hall on Thursday morning, June 7, at the Conference of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association.

If, however, he, at the same time, is inclined to uphold woman's inferiority whenever he gets a chance, and does so in a somewhat aggressive manner in 1 Corinthians, we should, on the one hand, make some allowance for his ineradicable Jewish prejudices; while, on the other, we should take into consideration the special circumstances of the case. For it must not be forgotten that he was writing to a community living in one of the most degraded and morally corrupt cities of ancient Greece, where a thousand women alone devoted themselves, on the Acrocorinthus, to the immoral service of the Goddess Aphrodite. No wonder, then, that at the mere thought of such a horror he felt at times inclined to deal sharply with his women-converts at Corinth!

Still, on the whole, I cannot but think that we shall not go far wrong if we accept as his truer and more real position in regard to woman those glorious words in Galatians—"There can be neither Jew nor Greek, there can be neither bond nor free, there can be no male and female: for ye are all one in Christ Jesus." Nationality, social status, sex, sank into nothingness before the power of the Gospel, before the inspiring influence of our Lord. And yet the ordinary Jewish Rabbi spoke to women as little as to children. Both were unfit for theological or ceremonial instruction. He might occasionally condescend to marry a woman, but otherwise she remained a poor, flighty, weak, and contemptible thing in his eyes! One Jewish Rabbi, indeed, had gone so far in his contempt for the opposite sex as to instruct his male pupils to give special thanks every day for three things from which the Almighty had preserved them: One was that he had not been born as a heathen, another that he had not come into the world as a woman, and the third that he had not been created a fool. And another Rabbi, assenting to the above, felt constrained to add the explanation that, while it was true that a heathen or a woman were not capable of accepting the true teaching, a fool might yet become capable of doing so at some future time.

But, to leave such Rabbinical trifling aside, let us now for a moment survey the attitude of our Lord to the women of his people, and let us notice how it is marked by a tender reverence, a gentle sympathy, and perfect naturalness and simplicity on both sides. It is true, the Gospels lead us to believe that his most intimate intercourse was with men—twelve of whom became closely attached to his person and followed him wherever he went. Nevertheless, women played a great part in his life, being naturally drawn to him by their quick intuition of his pure goodness and human sympathy for the weak things of this world. And some of them, like Mary Magdalene and Joanna, the wife of Chuza Herod's steward, and Susanna, are specially mentioned in Luke as accompanying him on his journeys and "ministering to him of their substance." And he often seems to have visited the house of the two sisters, Mary and Martha, who each served him gladly in her own way. On another occasion we read how a certain woman out of the multitude lifted up her voice, calling a blessing on her to whom he owed his life. And when he was in the house of Simon the leper, a woman came to pour an alabaster cruse of exceeding precious ointment over his head as a proof of her love and reverence for him; and, according to Luke, while he was sitting at meat with a Pharisee, a woman stood behind at his feet, weeping, "and she began to wet his feet with her tears, and wiped them with the hair of her head, and kissed his feet and anointed them with the ointment." What precious inimitable traits these are in our Gospel stories! But let us look further. When his hour of sorrow came, when he suffered that last agony on the cross, when even the twelve had forsaken him, both Mark and Matthew tell us how certain Galilean women, having followed him to Jerusalem, now stood at some distance from the cross, witnessing his death struggle. Surely the strongest proof of their courage and devotion and loyalty, this, to be near him in his agony! And then, after his death, we read how these women become the first witnesses of his resurrection, and how it is through their encouragement that the disciples came to believe in the risen Christ. And, going beyond our Gospel records, when we study the further history and development of Christianity, we shall see how it is through the women of high and low degree that the Christian religion obtains entrance into the very heart of Roman society, and the Imperial Court itself was, in the end, Christianised through the noble women of Rome. But, before this last result was achieved, they had to go through many a struggle, and had to bear witness to their religion by suffering persecution and death. Already, towards the end of the first century, during the persecution of Nero, we read in "Clement of Rome" of many women who, through God's grace, had been made strong to accomplish many heroic deeds. The Neronian persecution, indeed, became a baptism of fire for women-martyrs, and after that their number increased by leaps and bounds.

But I must not stop to tell you more about these noble women-martyrs now, for I must hasten on to say a word or two about the public functions that women were allowed to perform in the early Christian Church.

At the very earliest time the Christians used to assemble simply in friends' houses—when the women provided them with all necessities, and often became the centre of these small religious circles. So we hear of Lydia in Philippi, and Damaris at Athens, the mother of John Mark, Nympha, at Laodicea, Euodia, Syntyche, Chloe, and many others. But special mention must be made of Phoebe of Cenchreae, who is the first to be mentioned by the title of deaconess, and of Priscilla, the wife of Aquila, whom Paul calls their fellow-workers in Christ. Priscilla, no doubt, however, was the chief worker of the two, for her name is always put before that of her husband; and when we read in Acts that Apollos, a brilliant and learned Alexandrine Jew, was converted by Priscilla and Aquila, Professor Harnack suggests astutely that Priscilla very likely had the greater share in the task, "otherwise she would have been scarcely mentioned at all." Harnack also, as you know, is the author of that startling hypothesis that Priscilla most likely wrote the Epistle to the Hebrews, and that it is for this reason that that epistle has come down to us nameless (for its ascription to the Apostle Paul dates only from the middle of the second century). For we have now come to a time when we must reckon with the sad but certain fact that the more definitely the early Christian Church developed and organised itself, the stricter limits it put upon the free activity of women within its fold. While, during the first generation, all women who felt so called were allowed to pray and prophesy in church (or, rather, at the religious assemblies), to visit the sick, and to move about freely without distinction of sex, it came later to be considered expedient to restrain women as much as possible from such public activities, and to limit the few that were left to them to "widows" and "deaconesses," both of whom had inferior functions to perform—the widows to visit the poor and the sick, to make intercessions for the brethren, and to look after the orphans; the deaconesses (especially in later times) to serve as doorkeepers and to render assistance at the baptism of women. Both of them had lost the right of public speech, and their activities were strictly limited to their own sex.*

The reasons for such a change are not far to seek. It was partly deemed necessary to avoid scandal and misrepresentation on the part of the numerous enemies of Christianity, and partly it was due to the growing ascetic tendencies and the monkish character of the Christian leaders, who, not satisfied with the fact that the young deaconesses had to be unmarried, ended by sending them into the convent "to keep them unspotted from the world," as they thought.

The stronger the Christian Priesthood developed, the more jealous they became of the influence and work of woman in the Church, till they ended in their overbearing bigotry and poor morality by looking upon woman as a mere instrument of temptation.

Poor, blinded souls! to what depth they must have sunk thus to eschew as unclean those whom God has made as a safeguard of purity, a support of weakness, an inspiration of the noble and good! Surely, by this time, they had travelled a long way from the traditions of the Early Church, which put women on the same spiritual level with men; they had ceased to understand their oneness in Christ; they had become incapable of such deep religious experiences, such high spiritual exaltation as the Prophet Joel pictures in his grand prophecy of Messianic inspiration! "I will pour out my spirit upon all flesh, and your sons and your daughters shall prophesy."

My friends, I have taken you a long way in our study of the service of woman in the early Christian Church, and I have only left myself time for a very few words on what I consider her place in the Church of the twentieth century. This subject, indeed, after all we have learned of the past, of those grand spiritual principles which formed the foundations of the earliest Christian Churches, requires no words of mine to bring it into prominence, no advocacy of mine to commend it to your acceptance. Let the Church of the twentieth century, then, bestir itself and return to its inalienable legacy of the past, to a true prophetic ministry which knows not Jew or Greek, bond or free, male or female, but which is ready to sink all differences of nationality, social status, and sex into the one great principle of unity in Christ, unity in God.

Ah! friends, for what, after all, is the beginning and end, the essence of all religion? Is it not a pouring out of the Divine Spirit, an influx from on high, a spiritual power and certainty which is as high as the heavens and as deep as the bosom of the sea? My brother, my sister, have you yet felt something of the power of the Divine, the inspiration of the Divine? Go forth, then, and turn neither to the right or to the left, regard neither human praise nor human blame, but live in God, and work for God whenever, wherever the Spirit calls you.

EDUCATION IN RELATION TO THE STATE, THE CHURCH, AND THE HOME.*

BY THE REV. J. J. WRIGHT.

AT a Northern Sunday-school, in connection with its Christmas entertainments, a certain good old farce had been so often played that when, on an emergency, it had to be put on the programme once again, the players deemed it wise to let the announcement run thus: "'Box and Cox'—what, again? Yes, just this time, please!" And one feels half inclined to make some such apology in beginning a paper on the interminable "Education Question," for there is much in it that might indeed be called an oft-repeated farce, were it not altogether almost a tragedy. Happily, there are some millions of folks in our midst who see in this question nothing whatever to trouble about. If we were all as free and natural, as unsectarian and unpartisan as they, the throbbing drum ecclesiastic would cease to beat, and dissenting alarums over a four-fifths Clause would, like dying music, fall away! Whoever are these sensible, large-minded millions? Why, they are the very persons most concerned! Let me give you a picturesque description of them from the virile pen of Canon Scott Holland. He says:—

"While Bishops are punching Mr. Birrell's head, and Dr. Clifford is hitting out wildly at any Anglican crown that catches his eye; and all England rings with the tumult of war, and the thunder of the Captains; and we are all of us shouting at once; the only people who are totally unaware that anything is going on are (thank God!) the children. They know of no crisis. They scent no trouble in the air. They sit, in happy rows, within their busy schools, twiddling their thumbs, and twinkling like flowers in the wind; and when they want to arrive at the common fundamental base of life, below all the barriers of Creeds, they feel in their pockets, with warm hands, for the comfortable brown toffee which is one and the same for all alike; and Church and Chapel come together, as one child, in the delight of the undenominational bulls-eye."

Thank Heaven for a churchman who has discovered the child! Some bishops and clergy, and even priests, have recently discovered the parent—a parent with "inalienable rights" of an amazing character, rights that are to be found neither in the volume of Nature nor in the Statute Book of any nation. Having, however, discovered the parent, it may now dawn upon these same clergy that there are such human beings as children—with children's needs, children's limitations, children's humanness and divineness. Strange to think of (is it not?) that ecclesiastics who would never dream of trying to wind up their watches with the front door key, yet seem to imagine that they can put men's big theologies into children's little minds—apparently oblivious of the fact that a child's religion is more often caught than taught, and that in an elementary school elementary religion only is in place, like elementary anything else. Really, one wonders sometimes whether certain ecclesiastics have ever seen a real child. It is almost past believing that any one of them can ever have been a real child. Peter Pan never grows up; he remains a boy for ever, and that is simply delightful. But some of these fighting ecclesiastics, lay and cleric, appear to have begun life at the other end—to have been born or made grown-up, and to have remained so. And that is too terrible, because it leaves them with such a lack of child-sense. The only child they seem to know is an abstract something called a church! Under the influence of "the insane root" of ecclesiastical supremacy I suppose it is possible to mistake a church for a child; as, in the exuberance of resistance and dissent, it is sometimes possible for a Nonconformist to mistake his Nonconformity for the Nation, and actually to imagine that his Free Church Council is as broad as the Kingdom of Heaven!

Now, it may be very simple, but it is none the less essential, amid all the hurly-burly going on, to, as it were, stand still a little, shut our ears and shade our eyes, until we bethink ourselves, once again, that the central fact in this great question is not a Church, nor a Chapel, but a Child. The whole question arises out of the Child set in our midst. What to do with and to and for that child, for the child's own sake, and for the sake of the gloriously growing world which he is going to help or hinder—that is the beginning and end of all real education. Is it not so? If some modern Pied Piper of Hamelin were (for our sins) to come to-morrow and, with his witching music, should charm away all the children from among us; and if Nature, like a recent story-teller, then blessed or cursed us with "A World without a Child," why, of course, there would be an end of the Education Question. Bishops might still get up processions, priests might still get up an atmosphere, and clergymen might still write enthusiastic descriptions, as did Canon Scannell of one of his scholars (now gone with the Piper, of course), aged ten, who, "though so dull that he could not tell me his age, told me that there were three Persons in One God!"—I say, this poor little Trinitarian mortal having gone delightedly off with the other children, there would then be no Education Question at all; M.P.'s might cease from troubling, and the Birrells be at rest!

But here the children are! There are some six or seven millions of them, at this moment, enjoying Whit-week holidays as only children can. "There are our young barbarians all at play." And my plea is that the governing factor in all this serious controversy should be the actual good of these actual children.

Well now, of course, if the world were only just made, or if we could begin anything de novo, we should approach this subject very differently. But, as we know, and as many modern stories and plays have tried to show us, a human being with what is called a "past" is apt to be afflicted with consequent "problems." That is certainly so with this Education Question. It has "a past," and we do well to bear in mind that these present problems arise mainly out of that past. The dragons' teeth, now meeting us as armed men with strange new battle-cries, were sown by our forerunners in the earlier two-thirds of the nineteenth century. Let us then wisely recognise that, in any present settlement, "something (on both sides) must be paid for past error, and something sacrificed for peace." And while, with good authority, they condemn any "game of grab," let Nonconformists take care that they are never guilty, if ever they were, of a "policy of dog in the manger."

Now, roughly speaking, the chief difficulties which confront us centre in the three words, Cost, Control, and Religion.

Sad to say, the greatest of these three difficulties is (I wish I could use some other word) Religion. I suppose we all feel that truly it is not Religion we mean when we use the word in this connection, and yet no other single word seems to serve the purpose, though we are really thinking of all that is implied in such things as denominationalism, ecclesiasticism, and sacerdotalism.

On the questions of Cost and Control, I cannot now dwell. Strange to say, yet, I think, it is absolutely true, that if this one old difficulty with regard to Religion were out of the way, then almost every other difficulty—and most certainly the difficulty as to control—would soon vanish, or, at any rate, be easily manageable.

The crux, then, of the whole question at present is what to do with Religion. Ah, the pity of it, that, in the twentieth century of Christianity, this should be a problem, to a nation of Christian people, in regard to the elementary education of its children! Three solutions of this religious difficulty are offered. One is to put all Religion out of the schools; another is to let all Religions into the schools. Either of these solutions would be logical, but one is unacceptable and the other seems impracticable. Then there is what we may call Mr. Birrell's method—namely, Bible-lessons in all day-schools alike, and by the regular teachers; Denominational teaching in Denominational schools two mornings a week by the Denominations themselves, but not by the regular teachers; and, under certain special circumstances, Denominational teaching in Denominational schools permitted five mornings a week, and by the regular teachers.

Of course, as everybody says, if all creed-tests in regard to teachers are to be abolished (and I suppose that tests of knowledge and ability nobody proposes to abolish), then Clause IV. is, to some extent, illogical. I shrewdly suspect that no one knows this better than Mr. Birrell himself, and one might venture to commend to many "orthodox" Nonconformists, just now, the re-reading of his slashing essay on "The Via Media" (in "Obiter Dicta," First Series). And, indeed, a re-reading of that life-wise essay on "Truth-Hunting," in the same series, might do us all good. Still, this does not make Clause IV. logical. What then? Logic is a very important thing (I studied it under Jevons), and I hope we are all, at all times, quite as logical as ever we can be; but there are some things even more important than logic, and among these are: to make life just now more liveable, to make some good things here at hand more workable, and, by all right means, as Lincoln used to say, to be "inching along." Logic may be used amply and freely, and carried to its ultimate conclusions in all cases where you can take the line of no resistance—as, for example, on a committee of one, or in writing a book (not to be published), or in such an uninterrupted argument as a man may have all to himself during a solitary walk; but in our actual dealings with actual people every day, and in all our combined attempts to carry, it may be, some most excellent project a step further (or two, if we can) on committees, councils, and the like (and it must be so in Parliament), we, surely, all learn that there are such things as the logic of circumstances, the logic of consequences, and, above all, the logic of slow, sure evolution. Remembering these things, and seeing that this Bill of 1906 is the very logical outcome indeed of the Act of 1902, and not forgetting the growing independence and anti-ecclesiastical attitude of the teachers themselves, I cannot myself feel much fear as to the ultimate working out of Clause IV. if it be passed, as seems quite likely. Of course, it was specially meant to meet the needs of certain minorities, and we who so respect absolute sincerity in any religion, even when we totally differ from the form of it, and who for our own faith's sake are ourselves one of the smallest of minorities, desire to see the fairest, fullest consideration shown towards all such, whether they be Jews, Roman Catholics, or any others.

Speaking of minorities brings to one's mind the fact that in the Church itself there are (though themselves a minority) hundreds, and possibly thousands, of liberal or liberal-minded laity, and scores—possibly hundreds—of liberal or liberal-minded clergy of nearly all ranks, who, in this matter of education, are as broad and unsectarian, as truly national and human, as it is possible for men to be. They are keenly conscious that the raging, tearing opposition to the Bill in toto, led by some of their bishops, is fraught with serious injury, not only to the Church, but to Education and to Religion. You know the kind of men I mean, for we all deeply admire and highly esteem them—such men as Canons Hicks, Cremer, Henson, Barnett, Cheyne, and Jephson; the Bishops of Hereford, Ripon, and Carlisle, the Deans of Ely, Durham, and Ripon, and many another goodly son of the Church and worthy citizen of our great and varied nation. Let us not forget to pay fair heed to the suggestions of such men, for they have an outlook and experience, at least, as valuable as the outlook and experience of the broadest Nonconformity, and they have a desire, at least, as great for the real good of the rising generation:

May I mention one amendment to the Bill that I should very much like to see? As you remember, the Bible is to be used in all schools. Instead of the direction and control of these Bible-lessons being left (as in the Bill) to a local authority, elected to look after other not very congruous matters, such as paving, road-sweeping, sewerage, gas, water, electricity, and the like, an amendment has been suggested in the Manchester Guardian that the Biblical instruction to be given in any district ought to be decided by a committee elected ad hoc, and composed of a representative of all the religious bodies in the district. Such committees would have no right to interfere in the management of the school. But they would be able to safeguard religious interests, both in the drawing up of the syllabus of instruction and, to some extent, in securing that fit persons give the instruction: Let something like that be done, and I believe that untold good would result, not only to the children, but also to the churches, and to the spirit of Religion itself. Some of us have worked, for many years, with representatives of most churches, on various boards, councils, and committees, including elementary and higher education, and we know from experience how unsectarian and truly catholic men of all creeds can be. The fact is that most of us—curate, vicar, or canon, Baptist or Congregational pastor, Wesleyan or Unitarian minister—are often larger-minded men, capable of a wider outlook and conscious of more universal aims, when we are co-operating together in some such way, than we are apt to be when on our own separate pedestals, in our own special atmospheres; living and giving within our own fold, talking to and for our own ecclesiastical section, big or small; writing in our own little parish magazines, or even working at the right good task of extending and strengthening our own denomination. We have all larger minds than those things are apt to call forth. Certain I am, at any rate, that immeasurable good might come of the Biblical instruction being placed in the hands of the United Religious Bodies of any district.

But these proposals of the Government, which some of us regard as generous to a fault—in fact, generous with a generosity which may imperil the future—how are they being received by those whom they are most meant to benefit? Let us see. A great deal of hubbub is being artificially raised, a great deal of budge-fudge is being excitedly talked, to which we need pay little attention. But on the other hand, by Churchmen whom we honour and esteem, an intellectual and conscientious attitude has been taken up which we ought, at any rate, to try to understand. These men, it is evident, keenly feel that a real injustice is being done, not only to their own denomination, but to every other religious body, by the Parliamentary establishment and endowment, in all the day schools, of one form of Religion called "Fundamental," "Common," and "Undenominational."

Now, I suppose that if the people of this nation were as much agreed about religion as they are about arithmetic, there would be no more reason, in the nature of things, why the nation should not teach one as well as the other. And most of us, I fancy, had imagined that there was, as in regard to arithmetic, almost, if not altogether, as much unanimity among English Protestants, in regard to the value of such primary religion as the child-mind can receive, when brought into contact with suitable portions of the Bible. To our surprise, which may betray our ignorance, we now learn that this is not so. That, in fact, such Bible teaching is inimical not only to churchmanship but to religion itself! The theory is that Fellowship with some denomination is of the very nature of religion, and absolutely essential for child and man. This is their argument against undenominationalism. As a mere matter of argument, what strikes me is that, if denominationalism only can be a religion, then undenominationalism cannot be a religion; and hence, by their own definition, there is no such new or old religion either being established or being given a preference. But such a reply cannot remove their deep sense of injustice. Definitions apart, of course, the undenominational teaching proposed to be given in all schools, and at the State's expense, is understood to be, as far as it goes, Religion. Well, there is one incontrovertible axiom which British Dissent first learnt in suffering, and has since taught in season and out. It is this: "No man shall be compelled to pay for the upkeep of a religion to which he has conscientious objections." Some broad-minded Churchmen, who, of course, must believe in Disestablishment, frankly admit this principle; and so their argument in that admirable Church monthly, The Commonwealth, runs thus:—

Referring to the axiom quoted, one of its ablest writers says: "Nonconformity has here brought to light a magnificent principle. If ever there was a fundamental truth there is one here. The one thing with which it is not consistent is the old reactionary method which would enforce one form of faith upon the whole nation and make all the people pay for it whether they liked it or not. This principle delivers us for ever from the necessity of having to pay for a religion which is distasteful to us. It relieves the Nonconformist conscience of its heaviest burden. Church teaching for Church children at the cost of the Church. Undenominational teaching for the children of the Undenominationalists at the cost of the Undenomination. And the only function of the State, as State, is to leave the solution of religious questions to the persons who are concerned in them. Perfect liberty for every man to have his own religion taught to his own children at his own expense and not to be dictated to by other people as to what is good for him."

Very well, is my reply to this new cry of the Church for religious equality all round, would not the justice of the case be met by abolishing Clause IV. and making Clause III. apply to all Schools alike? What more can justice want?

It would not only give every denomination equal facilities, but it would put upon every denomination entire responsibility for the teaching of its own religion. That is a course about which, personally, I should have no fear, knowing something of the providentially limited capacities of children to receive, as well as the limited capabilities and dispositions of the clergy themselves to give their own denominational teaching.

This brings me to a point upon which I humbly feel that I have a special word to say. There are wise, good men, not a few, who prophesy that, soon or late, all education in the nation's schools must be put upon a secular basis. It may be so; and it may be even better so. But what then? Will not Religion—that wondrous, divinely-human spirit—still remain, and the need for it in the unfolding and discipline of every life still abide? How lovely a child's Religion is, pure and undefiled! Perhaps a very simple illustration is better than the best definition. The following conversation was once overheard between a dear little lassie and her cousin—sweet, unspoiled natural children both. What led up to it nobody knows, and, in children's talk, that seldom matters. They were by themselves. Her little cousin, some four years of age, asked, "How will we det into Dod's heaven? Will we open a door in the clouds?" "Why, I know," was the response. "We will doe up to heaven and knock bam—bam—bam, and Dod will turn the handle and open the door: and we will walk in, and Dod will say, 'Why, how! 'ou tum to heaven, too?'" And I will say, 'Es, Dod. Don't 'ou know every night in my payers I say, Take me to heaven?' And Dod will say, 'Tourse I does, my baby, tourse I does.'" And the little voice took a tender tone that showed how truly she felt our Father's fatherhood. Such is the loveliness of Religion as "revealed unto babes."

And what of the boys and girls? Do you remember that beautiful Eastern Apologue, wherein someone is speaking words of praise concerning a beautiful garden in which he stands, and the garden itself replies, and says, "I was only common clay until roses were planted in me." Yes, and so has it been to thousands of young lives, where Religion has not failed to plant the rose of reverence in even the commonest clay; to set the seed of wonder; to raise and cultivate the sturdy stem of truth and the scented leaves of gentleness; for then the common clay—as we have seen it in our schools and churches so oft—has become a very garden of the better life.

Well, in these inevitable educational and social changes which are going on around us, what have we to say at this time when the very words "Religious Education" have nearly lost all sense of charm or of spiritual suggestion, and have gathered into themselves almost every sense of bitterness and suggestion of strife?

We are here, this morning, as a Religious association, connected with churches and Sunday-schools, whose one abiding concern is pure Religion for old and young. It was my privilege, nearly a year ago, at our Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, to put forth a plea, the response to which greatly emboldens me to repeat it here, in brief, to-day.

One is tempted sometimes to ask, Have we really made up our minds as to whether Religion is a necessity or only a luxury for the rising generation? By a luxury I mean, at this moment, a something which can be done without; and by a necessity I mean a something which cannot, cannot be done without! Surely it is the deep conviction of us all that Religion is something more than a negligible luxury—that it is a supreme necessity—the supreme necessity of the rising generation! And yet, I wonder sometimes if we realise this. Think! What care do we take in our churches, even in our Sunday-schools, in our homes, or in our colleges, that anything like adequate attention should be given to the rising generation in regard to this supreme necessity of its life?

See what we do in other subjects! We so believe in reading, writing, and arithmetic that we put trained teachers, five days a week, to instruct and exercise our children in these things. We so believe in technologies, languages, and the like, that we get trained teachers, so many evenings a week, to educate our young people in these things. And in all this we do right well. But—but—what of that supreme necessity? What of Religion? What of Ethics? What of Conduct? No, they are not utterly neglected. That is not my point at all. My point is this—this: Are the moral and religious life of the rising generation anything like so well attended to as, say, its technical life, or its arithmetical life? And if not, why not? If you cannot leave arithmetic to come mostly by chance, can you leave Religion to come mostly by chance? If gross ignorance of the principles of Nature, involved in the technologies of building and of machine construction, is going to result in future disastrous accidents and terrible losses of life, what is gross ignorance of the principles of human conduct and the Laws of daily duty—what is this ignorance going to result in? Will there not be moral accidents, sad and serious—moral destructions unspeakable? And yet, you see, we carefully train in the one case, while in the other case—well, what is it that we do?

Let me put it in another way. We take much pains—and none too much—to teach our young people the arts of reading, writing, and arithmetic; of music, painting, engineering, and other things; but how casual, in comparison, are our endeavours to teach them what I like to call the art of life; the art—the noblest and most needed of all arts—the art of right living—by which I mean the art of right living within one's self; of right living in relation to others; of right living in relation to our country and the world; of right living in relation to Nature and to God.

Look, now, at the actual boys and girls growing up in the England around us. Of such, said the Master, is the Kingdom of Heaven to be made. Of such, too, are the Kingdoms of a fairer Earth to be made. Of such, alas! may the Kingdoms of a fouler Hell be made—the hells of evil in slum, and workshop, and drinkshop, and prison.

Friends, I sometimes dream that, at no distant day, the people of England, realising these things, will begin to think that surely the MORAL EDUCATION of its coming citizens is at least as important as their MENTAL training.

Well, there are some good things which we do not need to wait on Parliament for—which Parliament can, indeed, neither do for us nor prevent us doing. For example: Is it too late to plead with parents, with young and intelligent parents especially, to remember (to use Gannett's words) that while the parent owes the child-body bread, while he owes the child-mind reading and writing, while he owes the child-heart love, he owes the child-soul his best thought of God—his best to the date of the asking or telling. For, mark you, "a father's sincerity often determines for life the ethics of his boy's theology; and a mother's love the depth and horizons of his faith in the Infinite goodness."

But, finally and mainly, I ask you, is it too fond a dream that we, of our group of churches—we that are so free to make new departures, so unbound that we can always, if we will, adapt ourselves and our methods to the changing conditions of the times—is it too fond a dream that we, taking Religion as the supreme necessity of life, and taking the rising generation as of the first and foremost importance, that we should, perchance, so reduce or rearrange the incessant demands which, as adults, we make on our ministers; perhaps so alter the emphasis of our religious work as to deal more largely with the young; and, it may even be, so train men in our colleges that possibly those who need him most—our children and young people—will ever be the minister's main charge, and have the first and largest call upon his time and talents?

Might it not be worth while for all our congregations, even if they had to put aside some other things, so to concentrate attention and effort on their own Sunday-schools that these thousands of children and young people who come so freely and trustfully—and come in such larger numbers than adults come to the churches—would it not be worth while, I say, for our congregations to make it their determined business that those who come to their schools should get—as they can get nowhere else—a sound and practical religious education?

Yes, whatever else we cannot do, we can, at least, to use the Frenchman's phrase—only with deeper meaning—turn again and cultivate our own garden—the little garden of our church-life, the garden of our school-life, the garden of our home-life—never forgetting that the children and young people are always the products out of which is to grow much of all that will be good or otherwise in the England just ahead of us.

RELIGION is not a subject to be formally defined: it is a great experience into which we may enter.—S. M. Crothers.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

GREETINGS FROM ABROAD.

Bishop Joseph Ferencz writes from Kolozsvár on behalf of the Unitarian Churches in Hungary :—

In acknowledgment of the kind invitation to your annual meeting on the 5th and following days of June, let me relate a few things which will, perhaps, interest you.

Before all, I am very sorry that we are unable to send a deputy. However, I am glad that our religious and ecclesiastical life here is quite satisfactory and promising. As you are aware, we take great pains to keep up good schools. This year we succeeded in reopening our High School at Thorda with four classes to serve as a grammar school. It is very important for us to have such institutions, since through them we are able to give a better and cheaper education to Unitarian children. We are quite enthusiastic about Thorda on account of its historical importance, therefore we wish to make it a flourishing place even if it costs us much care and sacrifice.

I think it is something to be proud of, and encouraging that our small Unitarian community is able to keep up a theological school, three high schools, one of which gives certificates of matriculation, and about forty-five elementary schools.

I am glad to say that lately the number of theological students has increased, so that I hope there will be no vacant pulpits by the end of this year. The salaries of our ministers are now better and the pension fund affords an income to the retiring ones. These circumstances make us feel sure that henceforth we shall have good class men in sufficient number.

I wish to mention also that the Francis David Association, our social and religious missionary institution, is doing splendid work in Kolozsvár and Budapest, and in several country places. The meetings are very largely attended, not only by Unitarians, but by others. It is gratifying to see men of position and reputation, who belong to other churches, willing to give their assistance as lecturers.

Pray express my most hearty greetings to the members of your Association at their annual meeting.

Baron F. de Schickler, President of the Delegation Libérale, Paris, writes :—

It would have given us great pleasure if a member of the Delegation Libérale could have expressed to you in person our cordial salutations on the occasion of your annual meetings. But you know what difficulties our Reformed Churches are going through, and you will understand how impossible it is for us to be absent at this time. We are forming ourselves into groups and providing for the sustenance of our pastors, but after the long union with the State the separate organisations cause us a great deal of anxiety. During Whit-week I have to go to the Cevennes to attend a meeting of delegates from our mountain parishes, which are very interesting, but very poor. Please express for us our good wishes for the progress of your work, and accept our most hearty greetings. Our Secretary, Pasteur Jalabert, whose age prevents him from undertaking a long Journey, asks me to thank you for your very kind invitation.

Professor G. Bonet-Maury, D.D., writes from the Faculty of Protestant Theology, University of Paris, May 17, 1906 :—

I thank you for having invited me to be present at the Anniversary Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, and I regret very much that I shall not be able to be present owing to a previous engagement I have made for the same time to preach in the Reformed Church of Beauvais, where I was pastor from 1871 to 1885.

Our Reformed Churches in France, because of the separation of the churches from the State, are passing through a painful crisis in the effort to reorganise themselves. The leaders of the Liberal party, who are almost all Unitarians, at the Assembly of Montpellier in October, 1905, showed their willingness to co-operate with the Orthodox party, in order to keep the Presbyterian Churches of France in one body; but at the Synod of Orleans the offer of the Liberals was rejected; and at the next General Synod the Orthodox party are going to make a strong effort to prevent the Moderate group, or Independent Right, from uniting themselves with the Liberals.

Probably, therefore, there will be a division of our Protestant Churches into two or three organisations.

(1). The Reformed Synodal Churches with a confession of Faith.

(2). The United Reformed Churches, that is to say, the old Liberal party, without other Confession of Faith than the Declaration of Montpellier. They wish to establish "Religious Associations" open to all Christians who desire the teaching of the Gospel, and adhere to liberty.

(3). The Independent Right, or Moderate party, who may attach themselves to either of the above groups, but will probably join the orthodox section.

Our United Reformed Liberal Churches are not waiting for the decision of this Orthodox Synod before proceeding to organise themselves. Under the threat of expulsion, they have formed themselves into Religious Associations in conformity with the Law of December 5, 1905. These Associations will be grouped into five District Unions. In the districts of Paris, Lyons and Nîmes, we have raised sufficient money to provide for the maintenance of pastors; but in the mountainous districts of Ardèche and the Cevennes, which are very poor, means are lacking locally. The churches in the towns named will be able to render some aid, but with great difficulty; and if our friends and brothers in Great Britain could give them some pecuniary help during the present year, they would render a great service to our Liberal Churches in the South of France.

Please accept, with our wishes for the success of your work, the expression of our deep attachment.

The Rev. Georges Fayot, Reformed Church of Nîmes, writes :—

I thank you very heartily for the invitation you have sent to our Liberal group of Churches of Nîmes.

We should have been very happy to have sent a delegate to renew and draw closer the ties formed between the Liberal Protestants of France and the American and English Unitarians at the various Congresses, and, in particular, at the recent one at Geneva. But we are passing through a period of reorganisation which absorbs all our efforts and our means, and I am afraid we shall not be able to be represented for a long time at any meetings abroad.

We must, then, content ourselves with expressing our fraternal sentiments, our wishes for the success of your meetings, and the hope that a day will come when we shall be able to meet more frequently, and establish a closer union between the Liberal Protestants of France and all those who, in other countries, are fighting the same good fight.

Professor E. Montet, D.D., writes from Geneva, May 17, 1906 :—

I very much regret that I shall be unable to be present at the Anniversary Meetings of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. My duties at the University preclude the possibility of my being absent on the dates fixed for the meetings. I desire, however, to assure you of the deep interest I take in the Association and its proceedings, and I beg you to express the same most fully to our friends.

The Unitarian Congress held in Geneva last year, and in which you and your friends took so important and active a part—that Congress of which English and American Unitarians were the very soul—has already borne fruit. As a proof of this I have but to mention two of its happiest results in Geneva itself :—

(1) It has strengthened the position of Liberal Protestantism here. As the result of the Congress, the success of which was so remarkable, the number of our adherents has increased, and we have found amongst the upper classes, till then uninfluenced by our way of thinking, some staunch supporters. Our position in the National Church, and in regard to the public at large, is better and more secure, and the respect and esteem of Christians of all shades of religious opinion and of all sections of the Church has been unanimously accorded to us. Taking advantage of this amelioration of our position, we are extending our activity by means of sermons, lectures, and periodicals, and scattering over a wider field the good seed of Unitarian Christianity.

(2) The second fruit of the Congress has been the organisation of the "Société des intérêts généraux du Protestantisme," which has its headquarters in Geneva, and with which English and American Unitarians and Liberal Protestants in France and in Holland are associated. The Association, from which we hope great things in the future, especially for the Liberal Churches in France, was called into existence in response to a proposal made at the Geneva Congress for the creation of a central Fund in connection with Unitarian and Liberal Churches of all lands.

The conclusions to be drawn from these facts is that we have not worked in vain. The success of the work is our reward in the present and a guarantee of the progress of the good cause in the future.

Miss Westenholz, of Folehave, near Copenhagen, sends the following letter :—

Dear faithful Friends,—I have not been able to follow your kind invitation to be with you at your Pentecostal meeting, though I am longing to sit amongst you, listening to inspiring, encouraging words, and to stand before you soliciting your interest and sympathy for the little Danish branch of our great working army.

In vain have I endeavoured to explain in a letter to you our position here at this present moment. After several attempts, I have given it up, feeling that I cannot make it clear, and might make it incomprehensible to you. I shall confine myself to telling you that my personal impression is that we are making progress. Many amongst our countrymen are beginning to understand that what we stand for are not certain doctrines, a given theology, but veracity and sincerity in religious life; and good men, amongst them strong adherents to the orthodox faith, are more and more strongly urging that the National Church—the People's Church, as it is here called—be so reformed that Unitarians may in perfect honesty remain in it, forming within its fold their free congregations.

I feel deeply grateful that, by God's grace, I can in perfect truth tell you this; and, as in years gone by, I come to you, our strong, wise brethren, thanking you from my inmost heart for your help and sympathy. I pray you that your trust and goodwill may henceforth, as it has hitherto, follow us as one of our greatest blessings.

May God accord to us all wisdom to see, and strength to do what is right.—Your friend and sister, MARY B. WESTENHOLZ.

Folhave, May 30, 1906.

Rev. P. H. Hugenholtz, of Amsterdam, writes:—

Though I cannot personally attend the Anniversary Meetings of your Association in Whit-week, I am with you in spirit, and I wish to offer you my heartfelt greetings and my best wishes for the success of your meetings. I know by happy experience the stream of animated life and brotherly friendship that goes through your conferences, and I have often enjoyed the earnest humour of your speeches, the elevating spirit of your religious services, and the edifying power of your hymns and prayers.

Regarding the condition of our liberal religious thought and life in Holland, I can tell you with great joy that in the last year a new and warm interest in religious subjects has penetrated into many of our churches and congregations. On the one hand the reign of the clerical government of Dr. Kuyper and his adherents, which lasted four years and expired in 1905, greatly damaged the cause of liberal religion. The sharp line of demarcation drawn by their official Christianity between "Christians" and "Pagans" demoralised the character of many half-hearted and timid Liberals, and the laws which have been passed in favour of the so-called Christian and to the detriment of the public schools give us a great deal of anxiety and fear. But, on the other hand, what our adversaries thought evil against us, God meant it unto good. A new interest in religious matters has awakened in our circles. Several new departments of the "Protestantenbond" have been founded during the last year. The number of liberal preachers attending the "Moderne Vergadering" was greater than ever before. A new interest in philosophy and theology is awakening among those who do not attend our religious services. Indeed, the fields are white already for harvest, and we only want a greater number of young and fervent liberal religious preachers.

Brethren, let us join together in the same spirit of religion and liberty, which may give strength, light, and joy to your meetings and your Association.

Rev. Tony André, Florence, writes:—

"This year, again, I must confine myself to sending you my greetings for your Whit-week meetings. Distance and the difficulty of finding anyone to take my place while away, prevent me from coming, but I shall be with you in spirit, and I ask you to accept my good wishes for the success of the meetings, and to give my greetings to all the friends whose acquaintance I made with so much pleasure at the Conference of 1901.

May the beneficent influence that you exercise in the religious and social world go on ever increasing, as it has already grown in the past, and borne fruit. If the present generation does not always understand the beauty of your mission, a day will come when mankind, better informed, will do you justice. May God, who protects those who serve Him, as He asks, in spirit and in truth, be with you in all your work, for you are working for Him, that He may become better known, better loved, and better obeyed.

Herr Lic. F. M. Schiele, of Marburg, writes:—

I send my heartiest greeting to your meetings, and, united with you in spirit, wish that God's richest blessings may be with you. In Germany at the present time we are in a state of passionate fermentation. The religious reactionaries are making a mighty effort to suppress every liberal religious movement; but the cause of liberty will, as I hope, prove victorious, if its friends remain faithful and do not lose courage.

Rev. George Boros, D.D., of Kolozsvár, writes:—

I hope these lines will reach you in time for the annual meetings. Within my recollection we have not passed through a year like this before. We suffered the death of martyrdom and enjoyed the glorious new life of resurrection. You know that I refer to the events of our national life of deep interest to us, and I hope, watched with some sympathy by many members of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. There can be no doubt that when our heart is sick our soul can hardly be sane. With Hungarians religion and patriotism were always twin sisters. It is pretty well known that our simple Unitarian faith did not harmonise with either eastern or western orthodoxy, both of which we had always in a great abundance. Just three hundred years ago the first cruel attempt directed against Transylvania as an independent principality by the Austrian Emperor and his allies the Walachians and other Slavonian nations, resulted in the confiscation of Unitarian and Protestant churches and schools after several most cruel atrocities. This year every possible preparation was made in order to force the country into the same situation, but the wisdom of the national leaders, the great changes which took place in the political world, and the unanimous resistance of the people, brought us new life again. We have reaped some very pleasing fruits of it already. Just a week ago the Reformed Protestants invited the Unitarian and the Evangelical Church to join them, and celebrate the 300th anniversary of the Treaty of peace made between Hungary and Austria. We never enjoyed anything like this before. The members of the several congregations in Kolozsvár sent their deputies to the other churches, and after service the members of the three denominations shook hands before the pulpits, which was indeed a blissful treaty of religious peace and co-operation. This year was not without some other good results. I must refer to the Geneva Council meetings, from which our deputies came home with great enthusiasm and inspired a new spirit into the souls of our people, in private and public. The volume of the proceedings of the International Council is already under translation, and it will come out early in the autumn. In the autumn of last year our ministers started a new Unitarian paper with the intention of serving the interests of the country. We are glad to see our ministers, young and old, in work.

On the plains of Hungary one of my former pupils writes that our simple gospel is demanded far and wide. At Easter he received invitations to five different places where they wished to hear what we preached. I may say, that this means that hundreds of men and women come to know Unitarianism in their own way and wish to join us.

The British and Foreign Unitarian Association was always very happy in bringing to the surface some new ideas and healthy methods. May God grant you good success for the coming meetings.

Rev. F. L. Hosmer (Berkeley, Cal., U.S.A.), in a letter of cordial greeting, writes:—

Never before, it seems to me, have those principles for which, as we think, our Unitarian Churches have more distinctively stood, been so widely recognised and accepted among the thoughtful minds of all folds; and it is for us, while cherishing those principles and striving for their further advance, to hold ourselves as a part of the larger church, co-heirs in all the noble and saintly lives gone before, and more and more to cultivate fellowship with all earnest and truth-loving souls of whatever name or fold.

Mr. Hem Chandra Sarkar writes from Calcutta:—

How I wish I could be present in your midst and once more look at the old faces, and feel the throb of the life that is beating stronger and faster in our liberal churches of the United Kingdom. To me "Liberal Religion" is not a mere convenient and conventional name. It is a reality, and the various religious organisations in different lands under very different circumstances differing widely in many respects have a real organic unity, namely, the unity of spirit. The close relationship which is rapidly growing between the liberal religions of the civilised world is neither artificial nor frail, it is based on the very sure—perhaps the surest and most abiding of all—the foundation of spirit. And in the work of the quick recognition and efficient cementing of this bond of fellowship the share of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association is unquestionably the largest. In the household of our liberal faith, which happily stretches over almost every part of the civilised world, the place of British Unitarianism is large and prominent. I have no doubt that your work and word have an influence extending far beyond the shores of your native isles. I am convinced that the relationship between the Brahmo Somaj and the Unitarian Church have been to the advantage and well-being of both, and I trust that as years roll on we shall come closer and find larger inspiration and strength in the communion of spirit, to do our common work. Believe me, when I say that I look upon the Unitarian brotherhood as my second spiritual home, and watch with great interest and devout good wishes the work of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. Perhaps it may be given to me in some future day to revisit your great and glorious land of freedom, and kneel at the altar of God with those who are one in spirit and united in love with us once again.

DR. HERBERT SMITH at the annual meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association, had an opportunity of making a statement in regard to the Boston Fund (for the sending of Unitarian Ministers to the International Conference at Boston in September, 1907), a fund of which he is the energetic treasurer and apostle. He pointed out that London had responded well to his appeal, but that hitherto the country had done very little, and that, unless friends took prompt measures, there was danger of the effort leading to serious disappointment. Of the 135 subscribers up to date, only 15 were from the country, to the amount of £48 11s., one promise in this amount being for £25. Altogether 135 promises amounting in all to £291 9s. 6d., had been received, and of this £200 was on deposit and bearing interest at the bank, which would help towards the working expenses. These, Dr. Smith said, would all be provided for by other means, and every penny given to the fund will be devoted directly to the object in view. It was essential for the success of the scheme that the Fund should be raised during the present year, to give ample time for proper arrangements to be made.

FROM one congregation in London promises amounting to £128 14s. had already been secured for the Fund, and from another of the London congregations one lady had secured £112. Dr. Herbert Smith appealed to the representatives from Lancashire and Yorkshire and especially to the ladies to emulate that example, and so secure the success of the Boston Fund.

THE continuation of Dr. Mellone's series of articles, "Is There only 'One Thing Needful'?" owing to the pressure of Whitsuntide meetings, we are obliged to postpone.

THERE is a mean curiosity, as of a child opening a forbidden door, or a servant prying into her master's business; and a noble curiosity, questioning, in the front of danger, the source of the great river beyond the sand, the place of the great continents beyond the sea; a nobler curiosity still, which questions of the source of the River of Life, and of the space of the Continent of Heaven—things which "the angels desire to look into."—John Ruskin.

MEMORABLE UNITARIANS.

Brief Biographies of Well-Known Unitarians.

There are in this volume nearly 150 brief Biographical sketches of eminent Unitarians. "Many an inquirer," writes the Editor, "wishes to test the tree by its fruits, and to learn what has been the moral and intellectual calibre of the men whom Unitarianism has produced or has attracted."

"In some of these, who were educated in Unitarianism, the reader will see how noble and devout a spirit that education produced. In others, who were educated in Trinitarianism—like Milton, Locke, Newton, Watts, Porson, Paley—he will see by what acute thinkers, even when originally prepossessed against Unitarianism, the arguments in support of it have been pronounced irresistible."

"MEMORABLE UNITARIANS" is an invaluable handbook for Ministers, Sunday-School Teachers, and for all who desire to become acquainted with the lives of the men and women who were the founders or products of Unitarianism.

THE TWO ASSOCIATIONS.

THIS week's INQUIRER completes our reports of the Whitsuntide meetings, which furnish abundant food for thought. If the reports of the business meetings are not found so systematic and complete as usual, friends will perhaps be content for this year. Certainly the reports bear sufficient witness to the earnestness of spirit that pervades the operations of our various societies, and to the large amount of most helpful work accomplished both by the Sunday School Association and the British and Foreign Unitarian Association. As to the former, we would ask that in every household, as well as in school and church, the value of its publications may be seriously considered, and with practical endeavour towards their wider circulation; while for the Unitarian Association, both as regards its home work for the churches and in the publication of liberal religious literature, and its efforts for the strengthening of the cause of liberal religion in other lands, we may surely ask a new and more strenuous measure of support. It is a matter that must not be neglected, the appeal for another £300 in annual subscriptions, for on this depends the continuance of the one most generous subscription of £1,000, to which we have owed the opportunity of extended work in so many directions. And whatever we do, let us not worry about names, but attend to the real things of religion. That is our supreme need.

THE SAN FRANCISCO DISASTER.

WHEN news of the appalling disaster which befell San Francisco on Wednesday, April 18, reached this country, the National Conference of our Churches, it will be remembered, was in session at Oxford, and at the opening of the proceedings on the following morning it was at once agreed, on the motion of the Rev. J. Edwin Odgers, to telegraph a message of sympathy to our brethren in the stricken city. The message was addressed to the Rev. Bradford Leavitt:—"To Leavitt, First Unitarian Church, San Francisco. The Conference of Liberal Churches, Oxford, mourns with you."

Dr. Odgers has now received the following letter in reply, dated San Francisco, May 25:—

"MY DEAR SIR.—On behalf of my congregation, I wish to thank you and the National Conference of Liberal Churches for the kind message of sympathy which came so promptly to our stricken people. I read your cablegram to the congregation assembled in a hall, on the following Sunday:

"Our church of stone was badly wrecked by the earthquake, but the church of men and women—the real church—remains, though many of our 480 families are homeless, and many have lost the savings of years.

"We are, however, full of hope, and shall continue our work. The uninjured portion of the church building is now converted into a relief bureau, with four paid workers, and dozens of volunteers. Our aid is given regardless of creed or church connection. —Sincerely yours,

"BRADFORD LEAVITT."

With his letter Mr. Leavitt enclosed a cutting of an advertisement which was appearing in all the daily papers:—

"UNITARIAN HEADQUARTERS. First Church, Geary and Franklin streets, Bradford Leavitt, minister. —Unitarians and others, connected with the church or not, who desire assistance, relief, information, or employment will be cheerfully assisted in a sympathetic and confidential way, so far as our resources will permit. Headquarters open every day from 10 to 4 o'clock. Sunday services, Century Club Hall, Sutter and Franklin-streets, 11 a.m."

The Christian Register of May 24 has a picture of the First Church in its sadly shattered condition. The upper part of the tower will have to be entirely rebuilt, and two of the gables were thrown down. The tower crashed through the roof on both sides, and there are other injuries which one picture cannot show. Another picture shows the First Unitarian Church of Oakland, with its tower also badly shattered.

The American Unitarian Association San Francisco Relief Fund on Thursday, May 31, stood at $43,085.70; the First Church Restoration Fund at $7,371.24:

A FLOWER SONG:

FOR A FLOWER SERVICE:

WEAVE we now a garland gay
Fitting for a summer day,
Meet for Him whose love divine
Makes the summer sun to shine,
And, with never-failing care,
Decks the earth in colours.

Roses red and lilies white
First with violet unite
Let the rose with beauty
Lily pure her purity
That they be not too
Modesty must come

Then, for courtesy and grace
Bending fern may have a place;
But, for love, a clinging vine,
Honeysuckle, intertwine;
Lest remembrance be forgot,
Bear in mind forget-me-not.

Pity's sign let iris be,
Dimmed with tears of sympathy,
Balm, for solace, next shall lie,
Heartsease, too, her touch shall try,
Then at last bid traveller's joy
Gladness add without alloy.

Faith in climbing leaf is seen,
Briony and ivy green;
Hope repeats her image clear
In the stars of jasmine near;
But, for hope beyond the grave,
Everlastings we must save:

God is good, and good to all,
Turn, not, then, from daisy small,
Drooping harebell pass not by,
Speedwell waits to catch your eye;
God is great, and He can see
Honour in humility.

Names there are well loved of old—
Shepherd's Purse and Marigold,
Lady's Tresses, Lady's Smock,
Lady's Mantle, Shepherd's Clock;
Leave none out; we like them well
Of a fairer land they tell.

Now the pleasant task is done,
Yet is hardly now begun;
These are but a handful small
Of His nurslings, one and all;
All have favour in His sight,
All are children of the light.

SUNDAY SCHOOL ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE seventy-second annual meeting of the Association was held at Essex Hall on Tuesday afternoon, June 5. The President, the Rev. Charles Hargrove, in the chair.

The report, which had been previously printed and circulated, opened with a reference to the great and growing importance of Sunday-school work, especially in view of the possible elimination of all religious teaching from the elementary schools. The main purpose of the Association, it was declared, was to help to make the affiliated schools more efficient and more able to perform their share in the work of religious education. Particulars were given as to the admirable publications of the Association, and other help provided for teachers, including the Summer School at Manchester College, Oxford, to be held again this year (June 29 to July 7), the object of which was stated to be:—"1st, to endeavour to raise the ideal of Sunday-school teaching, by infusing that enthusiasm, which naturally results from the union of those who have interests in common, and by the devotion of a certain amount of time to the study of subjects bearing on the work; and, 2nd, to give the teachers an opportunity of visiting the various places of interest in the neighbourhood, and of meeting together in friendly conversation."

MR. SMITH, who has succeeded Mr. Fox as treasurer, made a statement of the accounts, which on a total of £1,512 19s. 3d. showed a balance of £35 5s. 7d. But this, he explained, was only due to the fact that £151 had been borrowed from the Read Fund. The year's sales of publications amounted only to £838 10s. 7d., against £956 12s. 5d. in the previous year. Subscriptions and donations amounted to £14 more than last year, being £295 ls.

MR. ION PRITCHARD, the hon. secretary, in presenting the report, read a message he had received from their oldest friend, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, who in 1851 had come up to their annual meeting to represent the Manchester District Association, and again, fifty years later, in 1901. Reviewing the year's work, he said they had been met by discouragement, but also encouragement. As an instance of the former, he mentioned that to a letter he sent to 300 church secretaries offering to send down copies of the cheap edition of four or five of their best books, on sale or return, he had received not a single answer. On the other hand, encouragement came, when the offer of a copy of the cheap issue of Dr. Drummond's "Galatians," made to theological students of every denomination in colleges throughout the country was accepted by some 860 of them.

The adoption of the report and accounts, moved from the chair and seconded by the Rev. H. Williamson, was unanimously agreed to, and the officers and committee were then elected, with Dr. W. Blake Odgers as the new president, on the motion of the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, seconded by the Rev.

H. M. LIVENs. Mr. Dowson spoke with much feeling of [his devotion to Sunday-schools, and his early memories of work at Geldeston and Norwich. Mr. Liveness called special attention to the admirable pictures which could now be obtained at very little cost for the decoration of schools. They, many of them, knew the publications of the Art for Schools Association and George Bell's Fitzroy pictures, and now there were beautiful coloured lithographs by German artists, published by Teubner Voigtländer & others, for which Messrs. Asher & Co. (13, Bedford-street, Covent-garden, W.C.) were the agents in this country. Specimens of these could be seen in the Education Department of the L.C.C.

To the resolution of welcome to representatives of other societies, Dr. G. C. Cressey replied for America, the Rev. T. P. Spedding for England, and the Rev. T. Dunkerley for Ireland.

After tea the combined choirs of Highgate, Brixton, and Essex Church Schools gave a rendering of the two parables, "Asking and Receiving" and "The Mustard Seed," as set to music by Mr. Hugh Atkins.

At the conference which followed, the Rev. A. W. Fox, of Todmorden, read the paper on "A Hill-Side Sunday School," which follows this report.

After the paper, Mrs. CEREDIG JONES, of Bradford, was the first speaker. Referring to the question of teachers, she said that the plan of fortnightly teachers which she found at Bradford carried out throughout the school worked very well. It did not mean less work, for the teacher, though, coming only once a fortnight, came as a rule twice on that Sunday, but then had the alternate Sundays free: It was a plan specially worth considering in London, where so many people were glad to get out of town on Sundays. She had also found the examinations, as held by the Yorkshire Union, helpful. They helped the teacher, and gave the children also more interest in the work. She had been greatly astonished by the ignorance of the Bible displayed by the children in their school, and if the day schools were to abandon such teaching, they must give all the more earnest attention to that matter.

The Rev. W. J. CLARKE mentioned a practice in his school of combining the register for each scholar with the hymn book, and expecting the children to bring their own book. It worked very well, and secured that the children valued their books and kept them in good condition. The registers were marked as the children came in: They had to be in time, for late counted as absent. The opening of school was taken by each teacher in turn, which was capital training; and, when the children were gone, the teachers had an "after school," to rehearse next Sunday's opening, and thus advise and help the young teachers. By taking the junior children into the chapel only once a quarter, they found it was regarded by them as a privilege, to which they looked forward with real pleasure. As to the drifting of the young people as they grew up, that was to be prevented by giving every one of them something to do. They had now adult classes which far outnumbered the juniors. Beginning some years ago with an average of 20, they had now nearly 300. It was a great religious work they were doing in the lives of those people, the influence of which spread far and wide.

The Rev. J. L. HAIGH followed, and dealt especially with the article on Sunday-schools in the current number of the Nineteenth Century. On this subject he will contribute an article to THE INQUIRER immediately.

A vote of thanks to the President, to Mr. Fox, and all the helpers, moved by the Rev. W. Harrison, and seconded by the Rev. J. Morley Mills, brought the meeting to a close.

THE WORK OF A HILL SIDE SUNDAY-SCHOOL.*

By THE Rev. ARTHUR W. FOX, M.A.

WHEN the Secretary of this Association was good enough to ask me to describe, as briefly as might be, the methods and the work of a Sunday-school with which I am intimately acquainted, I felt that he had honoured that school and my numerous fellow-workers in it. Hence I could not refuse to do what he asked, though I shrank from even the appearance of glorying over work in which I have taken some small share. I shall try to tell as simply as possible the story of the faithful work of that zealous band of self-denying workers with whom it is my privilege to be associated in Todmorden. Where I use the first person I must crave your indulgence, as I only use it to avoid redundancy in statement.

The school building stands on the hill-side; part of it nearly ninety years ago formed the Unitarian chapel, which was converted into a Sunday-school when our noble church was built by the brothers Fielden, in memory of their father, "honest John Fielden," who did so much to secure the passing of the Ten Hours Act, and who was one of the superintendents of the school. The premises have been twice extended, and the more recent extension which is consecrated to the memory of the three brothers, has given admirable accommodation for the work of the school: Downstairs are a small committee-room, a lecture room capable of holding over a hundred persons, five class-rooms, one of which is also the library, and a large kitchen, out of which two class-rooms can be made. Most of these class-rooms have been handsomely furnished by the classes which use them. Upstairs is the large room, which has seated as many as seven hundred persons. At the end opposite to the platform is an alcove, which can be divided into three class-rooms by easily movable shutters, while there is yet another class-room furnished by its class. Most of the rooms are adorned by excellent pictures, while in the large room are the portraits of the Fielden family and of other workers for the church and school. The premises are admirably adapted for the work which is done in them.

The chief governing body is the School Committee, which meets monthly to transact the business of the school. This consists of the minister, two superintendents, two secretaries, the treasurer, the bank actuary, and nine ordinary members, inclusive of a representative from each of the adult classes. But the work of the school is so varied that a considerable number of sub-committees is needed. There is the Recreation Committee, whose business is to attend to the winter programme of lectures, social evenings, and the summer rambles. There is the Science Classes Committee, which looks after certain technical classes held during the winter. There are the Committees of the Band of Hope, of the Reading and Debating Society, of the Library, for the Lantern, for the stage (when entertainments are to be held), and one to arrange for essays to be read at a five-weekly united meeting of the adult classes on a Sunday afternoon in the lecture-room. On these occasions, a scholars' service is held in the large room. Amongst these sub-committees a considerable amount of work is distributed and done with gratifying unity of purpose and fidelity. The school has a library of more than fifteen hundred volumes, also in charge of a sub-committee, which is known as the "John Fielden Memorial Library." There is a useful savings bank, which at the end of last year had £2,904 4s. 9d. to the credit of the depositors. There is also a holiday club, which last year distributed £681 12s. 8d., an amount which will be largely increased during the present year. I shall return to other institutions presently, as my object is to describe an ordinary year's working of the school.

The officers include the two superintendents, two assistant superintendents (who see to the registers), four book monitors, who distribute and collect the hymn-books and class books, librarians, and, in addition to those already mentioned, a bank treasurer and his deputy. There are three hundred and sixty-seven scholars on the books, with an average attendance in the morning of one hundred and eighty, and in the afternoon of two hundred and seventy. Of these almost one-half are over the age of sixteen years, a circumstance characteristic of this school. To look after the scholars are forty-four teachers and officers, whose work is arranged on the fortnightly principle. At this point it may be of interest to quote from the report of a visit paid by Mr. A. Slater to the school on October 22, 1905, on behalf of the Manchester District Sunday-school Association. He says:—"In these days of waning morning attendance, a visit to this school is a distinct pleasure. It is refreshing to find nearly two hundred scholars present. It is tenth on our list of schools for number of scholars, but third for average, and as the other two schools are only slightly over in average, but have a far larger roll, this school stands thus at the head for the percentage of the number present. As might be expected from these figures, the teachers are regular and attentive to their classes. Though seventh on the list for total number of teachers, they are fourth for attendance, and on the day of my visit, of which no notice had been given, every class was supplied with its teacher. The infants' department was a bright feature of the school. The calendar shows that the school is in use almost every week evening, and the school well deserves to be placed amongst those described as live schools."

I have made this quotation in this place to indicate the zeal and capacity of my fellow-teachers. I may add that I do what I esteem my plain duty as minister in teaching twice every Sunday when I am at home. Amongst the various classes connected with the school is a teachers' class, which last winter enlarged its scope, and became a Bible Class for the Todmorden Sunday-school Union. This class was held in the Free Methodist school-room, and was attended by teachers from five different denominations, including our own, and that in spite of our pronounced Unitarianism in Todmorden. By means of my typewriter and duplicator I was able to supply each member and some outsiders with notes. There were two classes—the first dealt with simple passages of the practical teaching of Jesus from the Gospel according to St. Matthew, with a brief commentary and a page of illustrations. The second took as its text-book a useful little book by Rev. T. Rhondda Williams, "Shall we Understand the Bible?" which I cordially commend to the Publication Committee of this Association as of a kind likely to be more generally useful to the average teacher than its more learned productions. To this also I made careful type-written notes; indeed, it took us eighteen weeks to complete the study of two chapters of it. Of the first kind of notes I have continued to give the teachers copies for each Sunday, and they have been found useful. This is one method of solving the question of Bible teaching in the Sunday-school—a method which entails much work upon the minister, but work which is of exceptional value.

To assist our attendance in the school, prizes are offered to teachers and scholars. Fourteen teachers during last year never missed attendance on their proper Sundays or found substitutes, while seven-two scholars never missed throughout the whole year. Eleven scholars won silver medals for a complete attendance of five years. One scholar has never missed for seventeen years. A gold medal is given at the end of an unbroken ten consecutive years. It may be old-fashioned to offer prizes, but their usefulness cannot be doubted. These are not, of course, competitive, since all can win them. They stimulate regularity and earnestness thus helping teachers and scholars to form and fulfil a fixed purpose. Let those who prefer the more Spartan system wrap themselves in "that virtue which is its own reward," and console themselves therewith for the less regular attendance in the school. I have always maintained and still maintain, that prizes of this non-competitive kind are both useful and praiseworthy as an encouragement not simply to regularity but to fixity of purpose.

Every fifth Sunday, as has been said, in the afternoon a scholars' service is addressed in the upper room by a friend from another denomination, or by one of our own friends. At the same time the adult classes meet in the lecture-room to hear a paper on a religious subject usually from a friend of another church. This forms an agreeable break in the regular teaching, and affords convenient opportunities to receive a speaker from the Todmorden Band of Hope Union twice for the adults and twice for the children. As we have seen, once in the year we receive a visitor from the Manchester District Sunday-school Association, once from the North-east Lancashire Unitarian Sunday-school Union, and once from the Todmorden Sunday-school Union, of which I am president for the present year. Each of these two latter Unions holds a conference every quarter, and an annual meeting, at which some representatives from our school are present. The method of opening school in the morning is as follows:—First we sing a hymn, then prayer is offered by one of the superintendents, followed by the chanting of the Lord's Prayer. The superintendent for the day next either reads a Scripture lesson, or gives a short address, or does both. The final closing in the afternoon consists of a hymn, the Lord's Prayer chanted, and a dismissal hymn, during which the children file out class by class. Every Sunday morning the children are marched across to the church, where a short address to them takes the place of the second lesson. Before the sermon the younger children leave the church. Each Sunday morning a certain number of the teachers sit with the children during the service in the church.

In the winter months the school is open almost every night of the week. Technical classes occupy about ninety girls of our own and other schools on Monday, Wednesday, Thursday, and Friday, in which cookery, domestic economy, needlework and dressmaking are taught, the Yorkshire Ladies' Council finding the teachers. The young men prefer to go to the excellent borough Technical School. Every Friday evening the reading and debating society holds a meeting, and subjects of various kinds are discussed by the young men. One Tuesday in each month a lecture, with or without lantern, is given in the large room, which has often been crowded on such occasions. Of course we have a good lantern of our own. Instead of a lecture, a recital is sometimes given by a distinguished reciter. Another Tuesday in the month is well occupied by a successful Band of Hope meeting, which has an average attendance of about one hundred and fifty. The Saturdays, as a rule, are filled with tea parties, social evenings, or entertainments. The school needs at least £100 a year to keep up its varied work. For this purpose entertainments are given. In 1905 we had a Japanese Fête, which lasted three nights and was most successful. During the same year we held a Handicrafts' Exhibition to stimulate our scholars to do various kinds of work at home. These matters do not nearly exhaust our winter work, which includes the holding of two inspiring lantern services in another part of the town.

The summer is marked by several Saturday afternoon rambles and by week-evenings natural history rambles twice a month, these latter conducted by myself. On all-day holidays, parties varying in size from ten to seventy take all-day rambles, often walking fifteen miles. The school treat is held in June, and is one of the chief events of the year, as many as four hundred and fifty often joining in the procession. The school anniversary is held in the church on the first Sunday in July, when there are crowded congregations and collections amounting to £53 or £54 are taken. The Christmas party for the children is another great event of the year, when the large room is filled first with children, then with children and parents.

It should be said that the teachers and elder scholars meet quartely to transact business and to take counsel for the welfare of the school, while the annual meeting is held about Christmas, which is one of the most important meetings for the year. Thereat officers are elected, the preacher of the anniversary chosen, rules altered if necessary, and other matters considered with reference to the working of the school. At the annual congregational party held on New Year's Day, the junior superintendent gives a yearly statement of the work during the foregoing year, which is always of much interest. We have a benevolent fund to help quickly needy cases, which has been of great use.

I have given the above sketch of "the work of a Hillside Sunday-school" not in detail and with many unavoidable omissions, but in outline, to offer an example of how many large schools in the North work for the good of their scholars. It is our object to make our school a larger home. Throughout our work we strive to leave a religious impress on the hearts of the children. In closing, I pay my grateful tribute to the large body of earnest and faithful workers, who in a deeply religious spirit give time and toil to secure the good of the children and elder scholars. To be a fellow-worker with those who after their hard labour during the week are ready to deny themselves part of the precious leisure of the Sunday and the week-evening to help others, is my privilege and pleasure. In unity and mutual kindness our work goes on year after year; and they and I can say in the words of the Psalmist, "Not unto us, O Lord, not unto us, but unto Thee be the glory and praise."

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL SOCIETY.

SIR,—I much regret to have to place before your readers, yet again, the claims of our Country Holiday Fund. I am glad to say that we have now got to within £35 of the sum required, and I most gratefully acknowledge the subscriptions which I have received in answer to my last appeal to your readers. Their generosity leads me to ask with confidence for the remaining £35 before the end of this month, so that none of the children who have been saving up for their holidays may suffer through the society's fund being insufficient to render the help upon which they are relying. The object is so worthy that I feel sure of a generous response to this appeal.

BRITISH AND FOREIGN UNITARIAN ASSOCIATION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE eighty-first annual business meeting of the Association was held at Essex Hall on Wednesday afternoon, June 6, the President, Mr. C. F. PEARSON, in the chair.

The report of the Committee, which had been previously printed and circulated, was presented by the secretary, the Rev W. COPELAND BOWIE.

It contains a good deal of the information which our readers have already had from the two reports to the Council, printed in full in THE INQUIRER at the time of the meetings, but those who are not yet subscribers to the Association should send to Essex Hall for a copy of the annual report, and study it as a whole. It gives a most interesting survey of the large amount of work accomplished during the year, both at home and abroad, arranged under the headings of Home Mission Work, Publications, McQuaker Trust, Foreign Mission Work, Finance, &c. The notice of deceased members contained the following passage:—

"It is with sincere regret that the Committee report the death of generous and valued members of the Association. Mr. David Ainsworth, of Wray Castle, Windermere, was a former President of the Association, a man beloved for his courtesy, uprightness, and devotion to public duty; inheriting from his father a strong attachment to Unitarianism, he upheld the family tradition by a lifelong interest in many of the institutions and societies connected with the denomination. Mr. George Carslake Thompson, of Cardiff, took a keen personal interest not only in the congregation to which he was attached, but in the work of the Association generally, and particularly in South Wales, where his presence and counsel will be greatly missed. Mr. H. J. Morton, of Scarborough, was one of the Unitarian veterans in Yorkshire, a generous supporter of our churches and societies, and a most hospitable friend. Mr. Donald Wilson, of Hull, local treasurer of the Association, a man of beautiful and refined nature, was prevented by ill-health from taking the prominent part in denominational affairs for which his abilities and desires eminently fitted him. The Unitarian body has always numbered among its adherents many women of intelligence and character, devoted to beneficent work; Mrs. Sydney Courtauld, of Bocking, Miss Manning and Miss Teschemacher, of London, were of these faithful and honoured women whose death we mourn, but in whose life we rejoice."

The report concluded as follows:—

"In concluding this report of the work they have been privileged to do during the past year in promoting the principles of Unitarian Christianity, the Committee desire to express their appreciation of the quiet and faithful services rendered by Unitarian ministers, congregations, and district societies all over the country. Encouraging words are spoken, tender pieties are cultivated, noble tasks are undertaken week by week, month by month, by many earnest men and women of whom little is seen or heard in public; it is chiefly by their faith and labour that Unitarian Christianity becomes a healing and sanctifying influence in the world."

Mr. OSWALD NETTLEFOLD, in presenting the accounts as treasurer, announced that the collection at the service that morning had been £24 17s. 3d., a falling off from the £27 11s. 9d. of last year. The year's income was £8,259 6s., which included £4,535 11s. in subscriptions, nearly £160 less than last year; but collections produced £622 14s., Association Sunday raising £35 more than last year. 226 churches had made collections. He reckoned that their investments had increased in value by £1,215. The expenditure on Foreign Mission work was £500 less than last year, which represented the greater part of the expense of the Rev. C. Hargrove's mission to Australasia. £500 had been added to investments, and there was a balance of £46 in hand. It must not be supposed on that account that they did not want more subscriptions. The generous friend who subscribed £1,000 a year to their funds did so on condition that others furnished at least another £2,000, and to make this up, since they had lost many subscribers through death during the year, they required another £300 in subscriptions. While all the regular work was going on, fresh claims arose, and their brethren of the French Protestant Churches were appealing for help in the need caused to their poorer churches by the separation of Church and State. Another fresh expense was the sending out of Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones to Wellington, where the prospect of the new church was of the brightest.

On the motion of the PRESIDENT, seconded by the Rev. A. N. BLATCHFORD, the report and accounts were adopted, and then, on the motion of Mr. DAVID MARTINEAU, seconded by the Rev. D. AGATE, the President was heartily thanked for his services during the year, and Mr. Grosvenor Talbot, of Leeds, was elected President. The officers, committee, and council were elected, the new members of committee being Mr. John Harrison, Mr. Jonathan Nield, and the Rev. Charles Roper, and a number of new names being added to the council. The Secretary having reported a large number of letters from foreign correspondents, passages from a good many of which were published in last week's INQUIRER, the following resolution, moved from the chair, and seconded by Dr. BLAKE ODGERS, K.C., was unanimously passed:—

"That the Association extends its sympathy and goodwill to the men and women who in all lands are striving to unite pure religion and perfect liberty. It sends a special word of cheer to the Liberal Protestants of France in their hour of difficulty and trial; it welcomes with peculiar pleasure the representatives of the American Unitarian Association, remembering that the two Associations were founded within a few hours of each other, and for eighty-one years have remained steadfast friends and fellow-workers; and it would to-day express not only deep sympathy, but the warmest admiration, for the courage and faith with which the American people have faced the losses entailed by the great disaster at San Francisco.

"That a letter of greeting be forwarded to the Foreign Correspondents of the Association in America, Australia, Belgium, Canada, Cape Colony, Denmark, France, Germany, Holland, Hungary, Iceland, India, Italy, Japan, New Zealand, Norway, Switzerland, and Tasmania."

Mr. CHARLES E. WARE, one of the representatives of the American Unitarian Association, was the first to respond, and warmly acknowledged the cordiality of their welcome. Their work was going on on even lines on both sides of the ocean. He had been struck in Little Portland-street Chapel that morning by what appeared to him to be a representative New England congregation. In America, their work had been extending, not only in starting new posts in the Middle West and on the Pacific, but in building up country parishes in New England. Many of these had been depleted by the movements of population and death, so that they were almost dead. But about two years ago an effort was made to reinvigorate them, and it had been very successful, largely through the services of the Rev. W. Channing Brown, a young man full of fire and spiritual life. They also were troubled by the financial question, and they were trying to do away with the subsidising of parishes. He extended a most cordial invitation to them all to be present at the International meetings in Boston, in September, 1907, and, in conclusion, expressed his special thanks for their sympathy with their unfortunate brethren in San Francisco. Professor Chatterji, of Calcutta, on behalf of the Brahmo Samaj, and Pasteur Giran, of the Walloon Church of Amsterdam, as we noted last week, also responded.

The resolution of gratitude to the district societies for their helpful work, moved from the chair, and seconded by the Rev. W. G. TARRANT, was acknowledged by the Rev. WALTER LLOYD, on behalf of England, Rev. T. DUNKERLEY for Ireland, Dr. A. J. BALLANTYNE for Scotland, and the Rev. DAVID EVANS for Wales. Mr. Lloyd said that a great part of the fear of the Education Bill was due to fear of Unitarianism. "Our principles," he said, in conclusion, "are spreading. These are the days our fathers desired to see. Let us rejoice and give thanks."

The next resolution, moved from the chair, gave Dr. HERBERT SMITH, who seconded, the opportunity of making a statement as to the Boston Conference Fund, on which we published some notes last week. The resolution was:—"That the Association rejoices in the great services rendered by the International Council of Unitarian and other Liberal Religious Thinkers and Workers at its meetings in London, Amsterdam, and Geneva, and assures the Committee in America of its earnest co-operation in the effort to make the meetings at Boston in September, 1907, a notable occasion in the annals of religious progress."

The resolution on the Education Bill, moved by the Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, we published last week. We shall not attempt to disentangle the discussion and the various amendments brought forward; but, if the protagonists desire it, our columns are open to them for further discussion of vital points in the controversy.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE had given notice of a motion on "a new Lectionary," and the Rev. Wilfred Harris of an amendment; but as there was no time at the meeting, these were together simply referred to the committee for consideration.

Resolution.—"That the committee be directed to take into consideration the desirability of providing a selection of Lessons from the Old and New Testament for the use of ministers and congregations; and, if approved, that steps be taken for the preparation of such a selection to be printed and published as soon as may be convenient."

Amendment, or Addition.—"That the committee be directed to take into consideration the desirability of publishing an additional Lectionary containing Lessons from those portions of the world's religious experience, both old and new, which are not already recorded in the Bible."

A resolution of thanks to Dr. Drummond, as preacher of the anniversary sermon, to the committee of Little Portland-street Chapel, and to London friends for their hospitality, moved from the chair and seconded by the Rev. Albert Thornhill, of Carlisle, brought the business meeting to a close.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

ESSEX HALL was thoroughly well filled at the public meeting on Wednesday evening, June 6, Mr. C. F. Pearson, the President being again in the chair.

The PRESIDENT, in his opening address, said that being in that hall, carried him back some years to the time when, as a boy, together with his parents and relations, he attended the old Essex-street chapel, the minister of which was then the Rev. Thomas Madge. The approach to the chapel was not a cheerful one, and the old high pews, together with the absence of any musical accompaniment to the hymns, tended to make the services both serious and impressive. The singing for many years was lead by the Clerk and two or three other voices from a pew directly below, and in front of the pulpit. Later on, an organ was introduced, but he believed, not without some divergence of opinion among the members of the congregation: He was in the habit of occasionally attending the English opera on Saturdays, and it was amusingly interesting to recognise the clerk in the chorus sometimes as one of a bold warrior band, and at another time one of a group of rural swains, clad in raiment to suit the characters, but on Sundays he was at his post in respectable black, engaged in leading music of a totally different character. His (the speaker's) grand-parents and parents, if not his great-grand-parents, were Unitarians, so that he was to the manner born, and did not recall any acute stage of argument between Trinitarianism and Unitarianism until he began to take up denominational and Sunday School work. Soon after that he was thrown a great deal amongst several Church of England friends, and found their views at so great a variance with his own that he went somewhat carefully into such matters, but emerged from his inquiry more decided in his tendency towards liberal thought than before. Was it not possible, however, that children naturally attended Unitarian places of worship because their parents did so, but did not realise the why and wherefore of their dissent, and thus they surely could not justly prize and appreciate the position they occupied—he meant that of liberal religion—in the way they would if they grasped fully how patient lives, steadfast hopes, noble thoughts, and even persecution had gone to the making of to-day's freedom of religious thought and worship, even though that worship was after the manner which men called heresy. The larger our possessions, the greater our responsibility. If they thought they held a more pure and simple faith than many others, so much the more were they called upon to lead useful lives and develop characters of sterling quality. A short time ago, in perusing Newman's "Phases of Faith" he came upon the following quotation from Coleridge: "If anyone begins by loving Christianity more than the truth, he will proceed to love his Church more than Christianity and will end by loving his own opinions better than either." Were not some of them a little inclined to love their Unitarianism for its Unitarianism alone and not for the broader aspect and tendencies which it opened out to them? Professor Jones last Whitsuntide was good enough to say that he found them not a denomination, but associated for religious progress. Having emerged from creeds, sacraments and ecclesiasticism, did they not stand on an open plateau from whence they could scan the religious horizon, eagerly but reverently searching for any further light that might arise?

During part of his year of office he regretted that somewhat indifferent health had prevented him attending to his duties as he should have wished, but he was able to attend in September last the stone-laying of the new Aberdeen church, an occasion which was one of much enthusiasm amongst the friends there. If any of those present were likely to be in Scotland on September 16* next, when the Church would be formally opened, he was sure they would be warmly welcomed by Mr. Webster and his friends.

When they looked further afield they found Rev. W. Jellie was prospering at Auckland, and as a sequence to Rev. Chas. Hargroves' visit Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones had now commenced their labours for a new church in Wellington. They would doubtless have seen in their papers what a warm welcome they received and what good grounds of success there seemed to be for their earnestness and energy. The meetings of the International Council of Unitarians and other Liberal Religious thinkers, held at Geneva, were much enjoyed by those who attended. The open-hearted manner in which they were received and the throwing open of the Cathedral for their use were greatly and gratefully appreciated. Such gatherings were of inestimable value, drawing together as they did many phases of liberal thought and representing by no means an unimportant minority in Christendom:

* The opening, we believe, is now fixed for September 23.

It would be difficult to overestimate the value of the Lectures on "The Christ of the Creeds and of Experience," and "The Gospels, and how to Read them," given during the year by Professor Carpenter. Wherever they were delivered, great interest was shown, and they could only hope that his new office of Principal of Manchester College would still leave him at least some opportunities of continuing the lectures.

In conclusion, he would like to add his thanks, not only to his fellow Committee-men on all the Committees he had to attend, but to the staff at Essex Hall, and especially to their friend, Mr. Bowie, who was the right-hand of Unitarianism generally and of the presidents in particular.

REV. J. WORSLEY AUSTIN, of Birmingham, in an address on the Scientific Temper in Religion, said he did not propose to speak of the actual achievements of science and their effect on religion, but of the scientific temper itself, the scientific habit of mind which had proved so fruitful in investigation, during the last century, what was the extension into the domain of religion of that temper and habit of mind, and what it would accomplish. That was not simply an interesting question, but it was a practical one. The scientific temper was not the possession of a limited number of minds; the great discoverers and thinkers represented a much wider mental movement, a movement which characterised society in all its grades and which was the cause of the unrest and the debates on the traditional statement of questions concerning our life which were to be found more or less going on all around us. The scientific temper had come to stay, and be a force in building up and destroying forms of religion. Anyone to whom religion in any form was of vital and supreme interest had one of two courses open to him: he might go on his way indifferent to this growing and transforming spirit, or he might try to discover these fundamental and essential principles and emphasise their right value, and do his best to bring them in as an aid to religious life and thought. It was for that reason he asked what were the characteristics of the scientific temper? The first characteristic that struck him was Faith. That might sound a strange thing to put in the first place, and yet a moment's meditation would show that it was true. Faith in what? Faith in the intelligibility of our world lay at the back of all expenditure of energy, all the reasoning, all the investigating. Apart from that nothing could be done, hands would fall listless to the side, and thought would be idle. Science had gone forward on its triumphant march because the scientific man was permeated by this faith that our world is intelligent. Agnosticism was the antithesis of the true scientific temper. Agnosticism that said, "we do not know yet" was in accord with it, but not the agnosticism that said, "We cannot know." Rather the characteristic of the scientific temper was to say that our world is intelligible. They all needed that for the confirmation and strengthening of their religion. By that he did not mean that the world was merely intellectually intelligible, for as we rose we got a grip of something greater, namely, that our world to be intellectually intelligible was morally so, and in the last analysis would be found satisfactory to our moral nature. The second characteristic was the spirit of adventure; the will to explore and experiment. Rising to the idea that the world was reasonable, and because reasonable, good, that will to explore showed itself in the search for knowledge and truth. Science had taken to itself the great saying, "All things are ours." There was a spirit of enterprise there, and more of that spirit was needed in religion. He was not thinking of the speculative side of religion, but they needed to be more enterprising and more daring as regarded moral and spiritual experience, for they learnt through experience as well as through thought. The invisible kingdoms of love and beauty and truth and trust were ever around us, but we penetrated them only a little way, and we sought trust and light no longer, and therefore life appeared a small circumscribed thing because we experienced so little of what it held. We loved the home feeling, the certainties we had tested, the well-trodden paths, the familiar scenes, and we shrank from the untrodden way; and yet it was true that "nothing venture, nothing win." That had its application to religion, and through religion to the faith which was the outcome of experience. To illustrate that he would point out that there was an element of venturing enterprise in that love, because the impulse of love was ever towards upward paths as yet untrodden. There had been those who had descanted on the possibility of unhappiness which it inevitably opened up. Jesus loved his race and his God, and we find him at last weeping with aching heart and saying: "O, Jerusalem, Jerusalem, thou that killest the prophets, and stonest them which are sent unto thee, how often would I have gathered thy children together, even as a hen gathered her chicken under her wings, and ye would not!" Go and reverence your race and try to serve it, and if you do so you simply multiply the channels along which disappointment may be borne to you. Few had said as much in plain terms, but many had thought it. The chief facts were not to be learnt from the outside, but to learn the facts one must follow love, and to follow one must trust and one must have enough of the divine impulse to venture to dare greatly, to accept all its conditions and hold to its promises, even in the teeth of uncertainty and fear. To act and live in the spirit of love in the daily concerns of our existence, meant a continued series of ventures, and to apply it in any given case, to guide our actions by it, involved a real trust in love and in its meaning as regarded human life. It involved our seeking that something from which, not because we were hard-hearted, but because we would not dare enough to test and to prove love, we drew back. "How often shall my brother sin against me, until seven times?" was a question asked of Jesus. To forgive seven times implied a good deal of trust, it meant something of adventure. But Christ said, Yet further venture to the uttermost, "Forgive until seventy times seven." In all our relations to individuals and to society there came a point where we trusted the principle no further, we were at the end of our practical venture. The man who had trusted greatly in connection with any spiritual experience or principle, the man who had penetrated an exceptional distance along some path leading into that invisible country, always drew the world's interest on himself. We wanted to know his experience, what he saw, what he learnt, what discoveries he made about his own life and the lives of others. He stood to us like a great explorer, only his territory was more real to us. St. Francis of Assisi was an explorer in the realm of self-sacrifice, his venture cost him all the world holds dear, but he gladly gave it up. The spell of an invisible kingdom was upon him, and everything else was nothing to him. Sometimes it was not the invisible kingdom of love; it might be the invisible kingdom of truth, then a man followed truth, venturing more and more in his search, and might even yield up his life. What a glory to humanity it was that there had been some who had yielded up even life itself! In being true, a man was building on one of the foundation rocks of the Universe, on nothing less than God himself. We drew with resistless fascination to the history of such a one, and so he said the kingdoms of the spirit were around the kingdoms of love, truth, righteousness, beauty and faith. We had all entered them some little way, but how much there was still to each one untraversed! We needed that element in the scientific spirit, the spirit that would dare more, would venture more for spiritual and moral things. The last characteristic was loyalty to truth. How much had been said on that subject, how much we were always insisting upon it! In the scientific world we saw that the love of truth was something distinct from adherence to any particular views that we might endorse as truth. We might be champions of our views without this genuine love of truth for its own sake being ours. Now the scientific attitude was that of the man who, though he had his own particular views or theories wanted above all things facts. He was a man with an open mind; a man who came to convince him that he was wrong, was not regarded as his enemy, but as a possible friend, and he wanted him to do his best to put his case in the strongest light. So they would see that the love of truth was a uniting force, and not a disintegrating force. The loyalty to particular truths apart from that was one of the most disintegrating forces at work in society. As we looked around, did we not see that in their search for what was true the best men were continually becoming separated? Was it not so in theoretical and in practical matters? One man worked out one kind of philosophy, another, another; one man had one creed, another, another; one man had one social theory and believed in working for certain ends, and nationalisation it might be, or local option; another man distrusted all such theories, So that one could see that in this search for what was true for some reason or other men became inevitably separated, and the very search tended to social disintegration. History was the record of clashing wills and purposes and beliefs and theories and principles. We turned over its pages and learnt how men had been set into hostile camps and had struggled and persecuted one another through this espousal of divergent beliefs. In the history of religion, we could read of some of the saddest effects of this. From one point of view religion had been one of the greatest disintegrating forces that the world had ever seen. In religion's name, and championing some principle or truth, had not men ostracised and persecuted and tortured and slain one another? Did not religious history show us Inquisitions and martyr fires and crosses? Did we not shudder even now as we thought of the hatred and abuse which such things represented and which made men enemies? It was equally true to-day that religion in the sense of adherence to particular principles and views sundered men, and it was because of that we had to work apart and we had to worship apart; and though Inquisitions and the stake were things of the past, we could not say that animosity and ostracism and anathemas had passed away. Here, then, they saw that in the search for truth forces were born that tended towards disintegration rather than towards full social unity, it separated men and often set them in most bitter hostility one against another. They therefore necessarily asked for something further, and that something further he believed they would find in the scientific spirit. What was it that in the midst of these disintegrating forces kept our world in unity so that in spite of them we could yet see harmony and brotherhood slowly coming to the fore? He put it more than anything else to the development and the increasing control of that spirit that was able to place truth before any particular aspect of truth, that longed for the good more ardently than for any particular goal that promised good. It was the growth of that spirit in religion that was sweeping away the more diabolical outrages and was growing in toleration and liberty and mutual respect; it was the growth of that spirit that was making a Creed like the Athanasian Creed a stumbling block and an offence; it was the spirit that was growing in connection even with politics and which broke down barriers and fostered unity and brotherhood more than anything else. Why was that? It was because wherever that spirit reigned, whether in religion or politics, or anywhere else, it set a man in a certain relation to his opponents from which no sundering evil could separate him. When a man's heart was set first and foremost on truth for its own sake, then the evil in his individualism was banished. That was a high instinct and a high ideal which needed fuller sway.

Rev. H. D. ROBERTS, of Liverpool, speaking of the present mission of the Unitarian, said they had amongst them some of their best men, who believed that there was no present mission for the Unitarian, and he was simply going to try to show that there was a great need for a present mission. A conference, consisting of ministers, clergymen, Catholic priests and laymen, had lately been held in Liverpool, presided over by Sir Edward Russell. The subject they were considering was the basis of agreement in religion. One Wesleyan declared that Free Churchmen had their Free Church Catechism. Well, that would not do for Unitarians as a basis of religion. Another man, a distinguished Churchman, a biblical critic, a man who was an authority on the Pentateuch thought there might be a common basis in the unrestricted dogmatism of the Nicene Creed; but that would not do for Unitarians. The introducers of the papers did have more than a gleam of recognition that there ought to be some basis of agreement. The Wesleyan said if no basis could be found, it would imply that the fundamental truths of religion had not their source in our common human nature, but were artificially produced. The Anglican felt there was an opportunity and a possibility for a wider basis of agreement than existed at present. Unitarians had at least this; whatever their difficulties they had an open basis of worship, they had no subscription to any theological creed, and therefore one could see in that one of the present needs of the mission of the Unitarians. Personally, he would like to be able to give their friends of the big churches an example of how they might come together—he knew that was heresy—but of how they might come together as congregations, and show that they could be a Church for offence and defence all over the Kingdom. He was afraid as congregations they had not arrived at that stage yet; perhaps some day they would. A man who had been brought up in a coal pit, and who by dint of perseverance had worked himself up to a leading commercial position in Liverpool, one day said to him: "Mr. Roberts, I am beginning to feel that I have been living in a barrel, but now the staves are just loosening, and I see the light coming through," and then came the confession that he did not know whether to let the light in all at once or to let it in by degrees. It was one part of the mission of Unitarians to show to all thinking men and women that they could face the light and their eyes were not blinded. That meeting had just publicly admitted the obligation of assimilating the truest and the best. He had thought it necessary to say this publicly in order that some echo of it might go to some of their weak-kneed brethren who did not see that there was any need for a mission of Unitarians. Faith was what they so much needed. They had, first of all, to make up their minds that a mission was needed, and then they had to have a glowing faith in it. They had to-day a better opportunity than Jesus had; they had a better opportunity than had ever before been presented to any religious community in the world. Why should they not be the pioneers of a federated spiritual world, and then they could embrace in one Church of the Spirit all the nations of the world. Some of them were taught in their boyhood to say:—"Gentle Jesus, meek, and mild." Yet this same "gentle" Jesus projected his thinking upon his own people and through them upon the world. It was for the English Unitarian, with his many points of vantage to do the same for his generation and the world:

Dr. JOHN CAMPBELL, of Belfast, who was to have been the next speaker, on "Practical Christianity the Need of the Age," was unable to be present on account of a professional engagement, but we hope to publish next week some notes of the address he had prepared, which he has kindly forwarded for that purpose.

Problems of Life and Religion in America.

Dr. S. M. CROTHERS, of Cambridge, Mass., speaking on "Problems of Life and Religion in America," said that he supposed they wished to hear from him how their work on the other side of the ocean was going on, what were its encouragements, and what its peculiar difficulties. Just because it was one work in which they were engaged in both countries, and their thought of God, of religion, of duty, was one, there came the interest in comparing the different conditions under which the work was done; the difference of their general condition in England and in America appeared to him somewhat as the difference between the conditions a party in power and "His Majesty's Opposition" had to face. He did not say that in America Liberal Christianity was the party in power, but so far as Non-conformity was concerned, as a protest, with grievances of any kind, it was in that position. He had listened to a good deal of religious discussion, especially as to education, in England, all new to him, and therefore interesting, because almost all the questions at issue had been long settled in America, and settled according to the programme of the most liberal thinkers. And if they asked what had come of it, the English religious liberal might point to America as to the kingdom of heaven; but the English conservative said, if that was so, he wanted something a little less heavenly! To believers in ecclesiastical ideas America was a horrible example of the results of secularism, or "individualism run mad." Though he might not tell it in Gath, yet there he was willing frankly to confess that every one of those results which the most ultra-conservative churchman imagined as following in a country where there was perfect freedom in religion, had happened in America. There they had no established church, and now there were places where they wished they had. He could show them in New England country communities that had relapsed into paganism, which were standing examples of the futility of mere little sectarian communities. There was no one great church, with its sacred associations, only a few little meeting houses, scarcely attended by the people. That was one of their serious problems in America at the present time, of the growing paganism of many country communities.

They had no religious teaching, sectarian or otherwise, in their free schools, and the question was asked, Might it not be that they were educating men for the new generation intellectually, without adequately educating them morally; making them keen, quick to achieve, ambitious, but without the true guidance for citizenship. That was, in truth, one of the great, terrible problems confronting them. American civilisation had evolved men from whom they turned back in affright; but they did not have the worst of them, for they got so rich they came with their money to England! They had that type of the highly educated man, intellectual, but without moral balance; they had the danger of the mob and of a growing materialism. Yes, those were actual evils in the Republic. They were old evils. But, said the American, "your old remedies are absolutely impossible for us. They are inadequate." His answer was, "not less liberty," but "more ordered liberty." There came a time, at the crisis of the great Civil War, when Grant's army was facing Lee and mighty odds in the wilderness of Virginia, and there were prophesies of defeat on every hand. Then came the ringing message of Grant to his army and people: "I will fight it out in this line if it takes all summer." And he did, and fought to ultimate victory. That was what he had to say of the present serious moral crisis in America. They were going through one of the greatest moral and religious crises since the great movement for the abolition of slavery. He had been surprised, in reading the papers in this country, concerning the amount of corruption disclosed in many parts of American life, to be told that Americans were indifferent to those things. If people told them of great evils they might believe them. Things were probably far worse than they imagined. But if they said the heart of the American people was indifferent to those things, they must not believe it, for it was not true. Everyone who had to do with the teaching of morals and religion had now a courage and a sense of final victory they had not had for a generation, because they were already seeing new leaders springing up out of the democracy, pointing in the direction in which they had been longing to go, showing how democracy could cure the evils democracy had discovered. There were two great moral tendencies in American life at the present time, taking hold of young America, represented by their two most popular preachers, Andrew Carnegie and Theodore Roosevelt, both of them preachers of the ideal of democracy. What Carnegie preached was a triumphant democracy, full of the idealism of a strong successful nature. Its first word was, "get rich," and the second, "when you do, give generously for the good of the community." That he not only preached, but practised. There had been a great enthusiasm for a purely material progress, often for pure success with little moral ideal in it. But over against that, they should read the sermons of Theodore Roosevelt, with his doctrine of the strenuous life. That appealed to the masterful element in young men. And to that he added, "give yourself to the public service, disinterestedly, honestly. America needs honest, fearless men, who can neither be bribed nor threatened." To that message the heart of America had been springing up eagerly and gladly. And the great thing that was now making the heart of every moral teacher in the States glad, was simply that they had been able at last to bring to the ordinary prosperous American something like a conviction of sin. The one characteristic of all Americans was that they were unmitigated and unreasoning optimists. In that they had the secret of religious faith which made it a delight to preach to them, but there was also that in it which made it very difficult for them to take a certain kind of preaching very seriously. They had kept in America an Old Elizabethan form of speech when they said "I guess." That phrase had in it the very essence of the Yankee thinking. It was taking chances. It did not dogmatise, it let the other man do that. It did not go beyond a certain shrewd guess, and the thing guessed was always in the optimistic line: "I guess things will come out all right." It was a splendid faith, and in America it generally did come out right. But suppose we are trying to preach plain everyday righteousness. You begin at the street corners, to the men in the street, and you say: "Repent, for the kingdom of heaven is at hand." And your good-natured prosperous citizen is pleased to hear that prophetic message. "I guess that's all right," he says. "I guess the kingdom of heaven's coming sure enough, and I guess we're it." Then the preacher tries to get a little closer. "But that is not the point. What I want to say is this, that if you repent, the kingdom of heaven is at hand, and if you don't, the kingdom of heaven is not at hand." Then the good-natured believer looks at you and smiles. "Oh, I wouldn't take it so hard as that. I guess the kingdom of heaven is all right. I'm all right. Repentance is all right. Let the other fellow repent!" Now that, said Dr. Crothers, is our problem, our great problem as preachers, to make the man, the prosperous, successful, genuinely efficient man feel that, after all, there is something that he must repent of, and he must do. And now we have got to that point in regard to some very important questions of civic and moral duty; we have got the man on the street to see there is something wrong, and, God helping us, we are going to right it. And when you do get the American to feel that way, something is going to happen. The United States to-day are repenting of the sin of materialism. Men are seeing the necessity of finer standards, higher ideals of spiritual greatness, and we are glad in the prospect that is before us.

Rev. T. P. Spedding, of Rochdale, was the last speaker, and gave an interesting account of his experience with the Unitarian Van. His first experience, he said, had not yet ended. He had been with the Van since last July, and he intended to go on with it until the end of September, and then he hoped to be able to present a report that he believed would be of interest to the whole Unitarian public; but he should feel it a very disappointing experience if he was not able to report that he had a balance on the right side financially—at any rate, they would have one in all other respects. He felt sure they would be glad to learn that the success of the movement up to the present had exceeded every anticipation, that the hopes of those who were interested in it had not been disappointed, and he believed that the experience of other missionaries was like his own, and that they did not know before, as Unitarian ministers, what their opportunities were, they did not know the need for their gospel, and they did not know what would be the attitude of the people; they did not know until they went out into the highways and byways what would be the reception given to their faith when they took their fortunes in their hands and went to these people. Sometimes, of course, they met with opposition: They frequently had to start their meetings with only a few children, or they had to begin by talking to the houses, but very soon men came along and listened, and even on a wet night they often had as many as 200 standing round. If they kept up their present average they expected to make as many as 400 converts before the end of the twenty weeks, and they were going to do more, by means of their Van, in the way of creating a healthy opinion than the combined efforts of all their churches in that district put together in the twelve months. They stood for the Gospel of good hope, to tell these men and women that they were not to be content with the ditch into which some people said it had pleased Providence to place them, but that they had to make up their minds that, whatever the force of circumstances, they would be able to overcome it. Then they would go on their way believing that it was possible for them to win an exceeding weight of glory, and make this old England of ours happier in the constant and faithful exercise of the highest type of citizenship that was bound to come out of the practice of Unitarianism.

THE CONFERENCE.

Thursday morning, which opened with a brief devotional service, conducted by the Rev. W. W. Chynoweth Pope, of Lewis-ham, was devoted to the conference, at which the two papers were read: which we published last week in full—that by the Rev. Gertrud von Petzold, on "The Service of Women in the Early Church," and that by the Rev. J. J. Wright on "Education in Relation to the State, the Church, and the Home." The President was in the chair.

Miss HELEN BROOKE HERFORD, who spoke after Miss von Petzold, said that, listening to the paper, she had been reminded of a conversation between her father and Robert Collyer. They were talking of women preachers, and someone cited an instance of the uncomfortable rivalries which might arise if women went into Parliament or had votes, or if they were in the ministry. And it was recalled how Dr. Livermore came to preach for them at Chicago. He came once, and then his wife came; and they asked her to preach again, but they did not ask Dr. Livermore. On which Collyer exclaimed:—"If she was my wife I should beat her!" They had heard that morning, said Miss Herford, a great deal about the women of the ancient church. They had always heard a great deal, and had read in church history about the early Fathers. But for the first time they had now heard about the early Mothers. For one thing she was not prepared, that there would be so many early mothers there that morning at half-past ten. It was to those mothers, or rather to the people who were not there, that she wanted to say what she had to say. If they asked her what she knew about mothers she would remind them of the Spanish proverb, that you cannot both walk in a procession and have a look at it from a window. She had had an unrivalled view of the mothers, and what struck her with especial force among them was the lack of definite religious Unitarian training for their children; she did not mean the children in the Sunday School, but the children of their own Unitarian families. Something very straight needed to be said to the mothers. There was too much of the paralysing idea among them that because they had no definite creed therefore it was better to say nothing, so as to leave the child's mind free and unbiassed. There was a story of Coleridge, who was once a Unitarian after that pattern, arguing with Charles Lamb, on the subject, and speaking of his garden which was overrun with weeds, Lamb said, "Yes, I do it on your principle. It would be very narrow-minded to bias the garden in favour of roses or strawberries!" She remembered in Boston a girl so brought up, with her mind left quite unbiassed. She was doing some work in the slums, and helped an Irish family. To an Irish priest whom she met there, she said, "I am not trying to convert them to my opinions," but when the priest replied, "And may I ask what your opinions are?" he had her, and in a short time she became a Roman Catholic. If that had come to a well-informed mind it would have been no harm, but when it came to a mind carefully left empty by wide-minded parents, they saw the result. She instanced also a mother sending her boy to a preparatory school, to whom it had never occurred that there was any question of religion or religious teaching to be considered. In that matter she thought they might take a leaf out of the book of the Friends, who were accustomed to take their children when quite young to meetings, to show them what they had got to do when they were older. She was afraid there were parents among them who did not know Essex Hall, or that anything particular was going on that week, or that they had any church history to be proud of, or any special work of their own to do. The children should be taught early to begin to help, for people were only interested when they were given work and had got to pay. They should let the children give their own pennies to the collection, and should teach them their Church history, how they came into being, and the struggles of their fathers. The responsibility rested so much on the mothers, for the training of the children at that early age of ten or eleven. The Jesuits knew how important it was, and only took the boys at eleven or twelve, not later. On the mothers rested the responsibility if there was to be any Unitarian Church of to-morrow. It rested on the mothers to-day.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON, who also spoke, said that as chairman of the Manchester College Committee he rejoiced that they had been instrumental in introducing Miss von Petzold, as the first woman, into the ministry of their churches, and hoped she would be the pioneer of many who would follow. He was confident that women had only to take up the cause of religion in their churches as she had done to give new life to the religious spirit in their midst. Women, he thought, were better fitted than men for the teaching of religion, and they would have a great function in the future in the teaching of the young.

The PRESIDENT said that, apart from a full ministerial career, there was great work for women to do in their missions and schools.

On the subject of Education, after the reading of the Rev. J. J. Wright's paper, there was one speech, and then the attempted conclusion of the consideration of Mr. Dowson's resolution already reported.

Mr. A. J. MUNDELLA said that he was glad Mr. Wright in his paper had put the interest of the child in the first place. As to religion, he had said that Mr. Birrell's solution was Bible teaching in all the schools, and facilities for special teaching; but the fundamental principle of the solution before Parliament was an absolute local option and self-government. That was a sound principle. The Bill said no local authority was under any obligation to give religious instruction, no child to come, no teacher to teach, nor would Government give any grant for religious instruction or inspect it. That should satisfy the secular party. But the rate-payers, if they desired it, were free to provide some religious instruction. That was the system which for thirty years had worked so well in the Board schools. It was the subject of control that was the real thing, at the back of all the religious wrangling. The clergy wanted to keep control of their schools. There were miserable church schools kept up, though often the clergy personally would be glad to be rid of them, because that was what the bishops wanted. Under the Bill thousands of schools would be left under Clauses 3 and 4. The great bulk of the Catholic schools were poor little schools, too small to be really efficient, with less than 100 scholars, 50, 30, or even less than that. How could they be properly taught? From the point of view of education the one thing required to be done was to wipe out those schools and group the children. It would be lamentable if every one of the schools should be labelled as an ecclesiastical compound. As to cost, as the Bill stood, it was optional to the local authority whether it should touch those schools or not. It would be far better not to touch them, but to build new schools; he was convinced that the cost would not in the end be greater than that involved in the taking over of the voluntary schools. Such building was the price under the Bill of freedom from all ecclesiastical tyranny.

For the four Sunday mornings, June 10 to July 1, Dr. John Hunter, of Glasgow, is conducting special services at the Bechstein Hall, Wigmore-street, W. His many friends in London will be glad of this intimation. On the last Sunday evening in June, Dr. Hunter will also preach at Rosslyn Hill Chapel, Hampstead.

Love therefore, a looking for the highest good of the whole, will guide and limit the search after beauty to which Art is directed.—B. F. Westcott.

CENTRAL POSTAL MISSION:

ANNUAL MEETING.

THE Central Postal Mission and Unitarian Workers' Union held its eighteenth annual meeting on Thursday afternoon, June 7. The chair was taken by Miss Gittins, and the report and treasurer's statement were taken as read. The report recorded increased activity, owing to a greater demand for Unitarian literature, due largely to the stimulated interest in religious questions occasioned by the attacks on rational religious thought by the Torrey-Alexander mission and by the effect of the Welsh revival. At Coalville the Mission had been very successful, and there was prospect of a permanent congregation there. Fourteen Postal Missions are actively engaged, 2,489 new correspondents, and 1,705 of those already known, are on the books, a large increase on the previous year. Of the 61 newspapers used as advertising media, the Daily News brought the greatest number of applications (336). The dissolution of the London and S.E. Counties Postal Mission, consequent upon the regretted retirement of Lady Wilson, was recorded. This work will now be carried on by the Central Mission. The departure of Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones was noted as a serious loss to the Swansea Mission. The Circles in India and Holland continue their good work, and many humble and obscure people are toiling quietly for the cause of pure religion. To strengthen the London correspondents, four Conferences were organised at Essex Hall, and papers read by the Revs. G. Critchley, Page Hopps, and F. Summers and Mr. Stannus. The Suffolk Village Mission is still maintained at Bedfield and Framlingham, and Cottage Services are held at Monk Soham and Worlingworth under the charge of Mr. Newell, but increased financial support is wanted. The total receipts for the General Fund and for the Suffolk Mission, including £45 from the B. & F.U.A. to the latter, amounted to £313 1s., the expenditure being £311 6s. 11d. There was, therefore, a small balance in hand, beside a Reserve Fund of £50. The needs of the Village Mission were great, and the Committee renewed its appeal for an additional income of £30, in order that the work may not be curtailed.

Miss TAGART, in moving the adoption of the Report and Accounts, referred to the death of Miss Teschemacher, who was from the initiation of the movement a most faithful and devoted worker. The spread of their work was remarkable, and the growth of their correspondence was such that it was difficult to keep up communication with all. There were two new results of their work, the establishment of a religious society at Coalville, and the founding of a Postal Mission at Auckland, New Zealand, under Mrs. Macky. They had experienced a serious loss in the withdrawal of Dr. and Mrs. Tudor Jones, whose work was remarkable and exceptional, because it was local. The extension of the propagandist movement—the Village Mission and the Unitarian Van—laid a heavy duty upon all who were prepared to introduce people into our faith. Many made sacrifices in leaving friends and needed a welcoming hand to receive them. Only those who had taken part in Postal Mission work had any idea of the delight and joy it was to render spiritual help to those who were struggling with doubt. The correspondence meant more than letters—it meant communion of souls—which made the weak valiant and strong. The report was worthy of their consideration, commendation, and acceptance.

Rev. GERTRUD VON PETZOLD, seconding the motion, said she valued Postal Mission work highly, and, though taking no active share in theirs, because she was carrying on a sort of postal mission herself with correspondents in all parts of the world, had conducted a service at Coalville, after which questions were invited, and a multitude of questions, possible and impossible, philosophical and unphilosophical, were showered upon her. They parted on good terms, however. The work of the missionary was important and responsible, because it meant taking out what people would not come in to take for themselves. There was no reason why our Church should not be as well frequented as any other in the country. We Unitarians had a tremendous responsibility—we had a saving gospel which upset people's received opinions, and often caused great crises in lives, requiring in us strong and deep faith to help such people to get over the crisis. The only justification of religion was not to enlighten but to help—to make real religion felt more deeply and strongly.

Rev. GEORGE CRITCHLEY said that the Postal Mission work appealed to him on two grounds. To the scattered and dispersed, the member of our faith who was alone and without sympathy, the message from the P.M., or the tract was helpful, strengthening and encouraging. And very few who had travelled but could testify to the usefulness of the distinctly propagandist work of the Mission.

Rev. PAGE HOPPS offered to send free parcels of "The Coming Day," and testified to the enormous value of Postal Mission work, the best work, in his opinion, that Unitarians were doing.

Miss GITTINS, having related her experience at Coalville, where, thanks to help from the B. & F.U.A., a regular service is now held, the officers were elected on the motion of Mrs. RUTT, seconded by Miss BROTHERS.

In opening the Conference on "Fresh Methods of Propagandist Work," Miss GITTINS said that there was a longing for religion in the heart of man. The highest privilege they had was the love of God, and their highest duty was to show their love to man.

Rev. CHARLES TRAVERS, speaking on the subject, "Six Days in the Unitarian Van," said he had only real experience of three days, because of inclement weather. Fanaticism was wanted in this matter. He could not understand how success was to be achieved without it. If we were less sane over religion we should be more sensible; if less respectable, more resolute. The Van Mission was a most promising endeavour to reach the heart of the country. He was with the Van for three nights at Prescott, and assisted in meetings of 200 to 300 workmen in their dinner hour, during which the men appeared interested in what was to them evidently a new religion. The Van work had shown him the great misapprehension under which Unitarians laboured, due to orthodoxy and indifferentism. At one meeting he gave an address on "True Patriotism," and, being fanatic on the questions of Education, brought the subject into that channel. He could not help wishing that every Unitarian minister could get as attentive an audience once a week as he had that Wednesday afternoon. His experience had proved the advisability of allowing one man to be solely responsible for each meeting. He had heard it stated that it was inadvisable to go with the van into districts where we were likely to oppose the religious faith of any; he disagreed, because the affirmation of Unitarianism is the negation of sincere beliefs held by one or other of the orthodox bodies. At Prescott the Van Mission was opposed designedly by the local orthodox body, and his experience taught that no effort should be made to reconcile the irreconcilable. They had been called blasphemers, anti-Christ, for expressing the Unitarian faith they had at heart. The chief points of the questions asked by inquirers centred round the infallibility of the Bible and the Deity of Christ, and he wished that some statement in simple language could be made of the result of modern Biblical criticism, compressed within four pages of a pamphlet. The Unitarian Van Mission—so full of the missionary spirit—had brought the Unitarian body to realise the importance of this work, and every credit was due to Mr. Spedding for the way in which the message had been carried in a reasonable and expressive form to the people who did not come into touch with our Unitarian churches.

Mr. NEWELL, the Suffolk Village Missionary, read a paper on "The Man in the Field." It was an appeal on behalf of missions to the villages in agricultural districts, urging that while so much was done for the town population, the "man in the field" ought not to be neglected. The constant migration from the country to the town or the colony over the sea caused the nation to realise its responsibility to the villages. The people in the village lacked spiritual life—it was a real atheism and infidelity—it lay at the root of the immorality and vice and social disorder prevalent. Apathy and indifference exist due to the dull, monotonous life generally led. Apart from the public-house, the parish church, or the diversion of a penny show, or the occasional excitement of a General Election, little was provided for the people. Under such conditions the men either became listless, indifferent, and ignorant, or, tiring of the monotony, drifted to the town where often they fell victims to the new temptations. Suffolk was one of the poorest counties as regards the agricultural labourer; in only one other county (Oxford) was a less rate of wages paid. Low wages and large families aggravated his lot in life. Religion, as he knew it, did not satisfy him. But Unitarian Christianity, which teaches a man to help work out his own salvation, to believe in the life that now is and in its possibilities for holiness, happiness, and usefulness—a religion more suited to the poor, the oppressed, and ignorant than anything offered by the more orthodox—was a social gospel of uplifting and salvation for him. And to Unitarians he most earnestly appealed for help to carry on the work which began with the labours of the Rev. Alfred Amey at Framlingham. The Mission Room at Bedfield was opened in 1895, and since then the work had grown in influence and activity. His duties as missionary demanded strenuous and arduous labour, and were many and varied, involving frequent journeys, amounting annually almost to 5,000 miles. He spent much time and care in public work, in advocating co-operation, allotment and garden cultivation, poultry keeping, and the like useful agencies for increasing the family income. He had provided aids to thrift and progress, adapted to village conditions—a Reading Room and Men's Club, a magazine, a Penny Bank, and Provident Societies. The Sunday services were well attended, and many proofs were forthcoming to show the good being done. There was abundant need of a Unitarian Christian Mission to the agricultural villages, and the Suffolk Village Mission demanded extension. This must be accomplished by the generous aid of the Unitarian public, to which most earnestly and confidently he appealed.

In the discussion which followed, Miss HARRIET JOHNSON related her experience on a wet evening with the van in Liverpool, and testified to the earnestness and enthusiasm shown by the people in the crowd.

Rev. FREDERICK SUMMERS told of the effort made annually by his Sunday-school on behalf of the work at Bedfield, and supported Mr. Newell's appeal for funds.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON and Mr. H. G. CHANCELLOR both commended the appeal.

Rev. T. P. SPEDDING, speaking of the Van Mission, said its beginnings were associated with the Postal Mission; from his experience he knew the value of the close life-touch shown by Mr. Newell. This was sadly wanted everywhere. There must be no going back. He was sick to death of the Anti-Unitarian movement within our own borders; only that week he had heard the Sunday School Association described as undenominational. He was confident that, were this Anti-Unitarian sentiment dropped, a new day would dawn for all Unitarians.

A resolution of thanks to Miss Gittins, moved by Mr. TRAVERS, and seconded by Mr. SPEDDING, brought the interesting and instructive meeting to a close.

THE present representative of the Unitarian Churches of Transylvania in the Upper House of the Hungarian Parliament having retired, Bishop Ferencz, of Koloszar, has been appointed, and thus, it will be noted, a Unitarian Bishop takes his seat in a House of Lords.

It behoves you to be keenly vigilant; and better had you watch in the marketplace than slumber in the temple.—Maeterlinck.

NATIONAL UNITARIAN TEMPERANCE ASSOCIATION:

ANNUAL MEETING:

THE Thirteenth Annual Meeting was held at Essex Hall on Friday, June 8. In the afternoon, a conference was held in the Council Room, the EARL OF CARLISLE, President of the Association, in the chair.

After an opening hymn and prayer, the chairman introduced Rev. ARTHUR HURN, of Acton, who read a paper on "The Relation of Temperance to the Social Questions of the Day." From the economic aspect, he said, drink led to ruin. Spending 6s. weekly out of 25s., a labourer left very little for necessities—and when it was remembered that these were reckoned by workhouse authorities to cost 16s. 1d. weekly, and that rent had to be paid also, one might easily estimate the resultant economic, physical and moral ruin. The records of criminal proceedings teem with evidence that intemperance produces crime. The resultant effects of drink were most pathetic in regard to child-life. We wanted to do something in this matter. Its first and greatest work was the making of abstainers in the band of hope and adult societies and by the effects of pledge crusades. What was seen in the circle of one poor family blighted by the drink curse was sufficient justification for this abstaining movement. Referring to the resolution on the programme, he said they wanted to place existing licences on the level of new licences, and this must be done, in his opinion, by the method of high licence. Local option, he thought, would leave the public-houses in the worst districts where they did most harm. Prohibition was not successful in America. A substantial minority could not be ruled with a high hand. Rational temperance reform was wanted to curb the great monopoly of the trade, the political influence of which permeated both Houses of Parliament and was felt in the electoral machinery everywhere. Private monopoly and big profits must be destroyed. There was as yet no national conscience demanding prohibition, but lesser and more immediate reforms were being urged—pure beer and alcoholic drinks of proved purity, greater protection for children, abolition of barmaids, the invention of nice drinks—real temperance reform involved many general reforms. He was a temperance reformer because he was a social reformer. Abstinence from alcohol was no panacea for all social ills and the millennium would not come were England sober. Questions of labour and wages, housing problems arose, and were essentially connected with temperance problems. Poverty and ill-housing were partly responsible for the existence of the public-houses, and it was no use to abolish them if there were nothing to supply their place. He urged the study of further principles of rational temperance reform and a wider outlook, and offered his paper in no spirit of contention, but wished to advance the cause they all had at heart.

Miss HARRIET JOHNSON agreed that the evils of insanity and crime were enormous, but local option would remedy the evil considerably, and it was not true that the plan would benefit the better class districts only; In Liverpool they had carefully canvassed the people on this point and 90 per cent. in the lower class suburbs signed in favour of it. Local option and prohibition were successful plans in many ways wherever they were tried. The prohibition laws were as well enforced as any criminal enactment could be expected to be. In Canada large districts lived under local option, and the amount of liquor consumed per head had greatly diminished. She had made five visits to Norway, and testified to the improved condition of the people under local option. The opposition of the liquor trade to the local option scheme was sufficient proof that if tried it would be successful. She strongly deprecated all schemes for making the public-house trade respectable. It was not the arsenic in the beer it was the alcohol which was objectionable and harmful. Every scheme to "make the trade respectable" had failed in its purpose—clubs, grocers' licences, beer Acts—all evolved with the best intent—had failed in diminishing the evil. She did not want to close the public-houses but to take the alcohol out of them, because it was an insidious poison. To reduce the drink bill meant the solution of many social problems. If we reduced it to the level of that in the United States, England would save £113,000,000, and much could be done with that. The signs of the times were favourable; local option was coming soon; it was hoped very soon.

Mr. RICHARD MONTFORD gave instances of the wide popular support given to local option.

Rev. J. C. STREET, one of the founders of the United Kingdom Alliance, claimed that temperance reformers had done or were doing all the things the opener urged them to do.

Rev. Francis Wood, Rev. Ottwell Binns, Messrs. Chancellor and Westall having spoken, Mr. Hurn replied, and a vote of thanks to the Earl of Carlisle for presiding closed the proceedings.

BUSINESS MEETING.

After tea the business meeting was held, the president again taking the chair.

Mr. J. Bredall read the annual report, which showed progress in many ways, and Mr. Edwards presented the accounts, which showed total receipts, £107 0s. 0½d., and expenditure £86 19s. 1½d., leaving a balance of £20 6s. 3d., but this had been apportioned to pamphlet printing.

THE EARL OF CARLISLE, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said that the condition of the Association was satisfactory as far as it went, but they should guard against over-estimating their success. The first clause of the resolution indicated the attitude of the general temperance party. They recognised the strength and value of this point. Clause IV. of the Act of 1904 gave powers to Quarter Sessions by means of which they could impose any conditions they chose upon licences. Everything that could be mentioned as to the carrying on of the trade—barmaids, child-serving, &c.—could be introduced as a condition. That clause involved all the temperance party could ask for. They were told that the altruistic ground was the only one from which one could appeal for temperance legislation; it was the strongest ground:

Some preferred the advocacy of health or economy, good ground in their way, but inferior. They should appeal on every ground for the needed legislation on this subject. It was a mistake to think that only the poor needed it.

The Rev. A. LESLIE SMITH seconded the adoption of the report and gave an address on "Temperance and the Religious Life." Temperance, he said, was an aspect of religious life. The aim of all the most earnest Christians in every age was to subdue the flesh to the spirit—to change the manner of life—to conform their own will to the will of God. And this religious life concerns all other men. A minister's duty was to point out the dangers in life; and he was false to his trust who did not tell of dangers ahead. The work of temperance meant the redemption of the world; it meant teaching people "to live well." Church work should be leavened by temperance work, and each community should be a band of moral and religious reformers. The minister should be trained in the cure of souls; he should be trained in the drink question, which involves so many social questions.

Subject to necessary additions, the report and accounts were approved.

Rev. GEORGE C. CRESSEY then gave an address on "Temperance Work in America." He was not an active worker in America but sympathised with the aims and objects of temperance workers. Ten years ago ten States of America had declared for prohibition; now there were only two, and in one (Maine) the people were asking for recession. Public opinion must be behind the acts of the Executive Government or these acts become futile. American Unitarians were fully tolerant of all methods and accepted the best in each. Though the more radical reformers would take nothing if they could not get all, the line of least resistance was likely to be the most successful. Our plain duty was toward the young, to keep them from exposure, that they might be strong physically and mentally, so that when temptation came, they might be able to resist. Temperance societies should aim at giving ethical teaching in Sunday-school and day-school on this subject to create in the future generation that sentiment which would carry the individual through avenues of temptation and make legislative enactments so far as they seemed reasonable, to be real and effective.

Miss HARRIET JOHNSON proposed, and the Rev. FRANCIS WOOD seconded, the election of the officers. A proposal as to the future constitution of the Committee was agreed upon after some discussion.

The Rev. CHARLES HARGROVE then proposed the resolution:—

"That this meeting records its satisfaction at the promises of the Government to introduce next year a large and efficient measure of Temperance Reform, and urges that such a measure should include:

(a) Provisions to place existing licences on the same footing as new licences under Clause IV. of the Act of 1904, so that licences should be brought under full control of the licensing authority and be freed from the element of monopoly value;

(b) Sunday Closing—shorter hours of sale and control over clubs.

(c) The concession of a direct popular vote over the issue and renewal of licences."

He was not in entire agreement with Dr. Cressy, and though the resolution was not all that he could desire it was as much as the nation would accept.

Mr. BREDALL seconded.

Mr. MONTFORD then moved an amendment to add the words "without the option of disinterested management or the municipalisation of the drink traffic." Unanswerable evidence was shown of the failure of the various management schemes, which, to be successful, must either buy the existing public-houses—an impossible plan—or create a new system of licensed houses side by side with those existing—a dangerous course to recommend.

Rev. C. HARGROVE accepted the words as a rider to the resolution.

After some discussion by the Revs. J. C. Street, and F. Wood, the Rev. W. C. Pope moved, "That the Question be now put," and with the addition of the rider, the resolution was carried by a considerable majority.

A vote of thanks to the President, and the doxology and benediction brought the meeting to a close.

NATIONAL CONFERENCE.—The first meeting of the new committee was held at Essex Hall, London, on Tuesday, the 5th inst. There were twenty-seven members present, and apologies were announced from several others who were unable to attend. In the absence of the President (the Rev. Jos. Wood) in America, the chair was taken by Dr. W. Blake Odgers, K.C. It was agreed to send copies of the special numbers of THE INQUIRER to each congregation on the roll, that they may have a permanent record of the Oxford meetings. The following gentlemen were unanimously co-opted members of the committee:—The Revs. H. E. Dowson, Chas. Hargrove, Messrs. Charles W. Jones, David Martineau, Philip J. Worsley, and Edgar Worthington. A draft circular, giving effect to the resolution passed at Oxford, appealing to the congregations to contribute to the ordinary expenses of the Conference, was adopted. It was agreed to postpone till the next meeting the consideration of the questions referred to the committee by the Conference at Oxford. Some conversation followed with regard to the meeting-place of the Conference in 1909. The officers were authorised to fix the time and place of the next committee meeting in the autumn, so as to fit in with other arrangements.

THE annual summer meeting of the Trustees of Manchester College, Oxford, is to be held at the college on Thursday afternoon next, when resolutions on the retirement of Dr. Drummond and Dr. Odgers will be submitted. In the evening, Dr. Drummond's old students are giving an "At Home" when his portrait, by Sir George Reid, will be presented to the college. Any friends who could be present, and have not received an invitation to this "At Home," are requested to apply at once to the Rev. V. D. Davis, 9, Nightingale-square, Balham, S.W.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

V.—THE IDEA OF GOD.

THE idea of God, it is reasonable to think, is born in the human soul. It is not, in the first instance, inferred from evidence; it is not received through testimony; it is not a product of imagination; it is the result of an innate tendency. The idea of God does not depend upon proofs of His existence; it is anterior to them, and anticipates them. The cosmological argument, or argument from the necessity for a First Cause; the teleological argument, or argument from evidence of design; the moral argument, or argument from the voice of conscience as the voice divine—none of these were known to the untaught worshippers who first bowed themselves down before an unseen Presence, and sought to come into relation to an unspoken Will.

The persistent survival of this religious instinct may be taken to be a proof of correspondence with objective fact, if, as is now generally thought, instincts which do not find such correspondence do not survive.

The idea of divine personality is at first, of necessity, crude and inadequate. The mind cannot all at once think itself out of the association of personality with finite, localised form. It is not easy, therefore, to bring it home to the understanding that the necessary elements of personality need not be more than Thought, Will, and Feeling—the first self-conscious, the second self-determining, the third self-imparting. These are the essential elements of human personality, and through these we interpret to ourselves the personality of Him in whose "image" we are made. Thought will and feeling belong to the spiritual order of things, and he who possesses them is a spiritual being, be it with, or without, bodily form.

The idea of God has purified and enlarged itself from age to age, and is now expressed by three affirmations:—God is; God is Spirit; God is One. These are the affirmations of faith. "With the heart man believeth." God is known through experience more than through thought. By faith we trust our spiritual instincts, our spiritual intuitions, and, with that spirit in us which is most akin to Him, "subject ourselves to the Father of Spirits and live." This is the first step in religion.

B.

THE Young People's Christian Endeavour Societies have held their great Whitsuntide Convention at Leeds. Dr. F. E. Clark, the founder of the movement, who is at present over here on a visit from America, gave an encouraging send-off. The Bishop of Ripon also took part in the proceedings. The Convention is essentially an evangelical Free Church movement, and the very presence of the Bishop was a powerful enforcement of his argument that a religion founded on the words "Our Father," ought to enable the churches to outgrow their differences. The closing gathering was held in Ripon Cathedral. It must have been to many of the members their first experience of a united assembly in one of the noble historical churches of the country. This event, so full of soul-piercing, imaginative value, together with the mass meeting of 4,000 young people in the Towa Hall square at Leeds, will certainly linger in the mind. Indeed, few of the immense crowds of holiday makers will be able to look back on a Whitsuntide so full of high and inspiring reminiscences. The value of such influences is incalculable amid the rush of material interests which limit our life and vision in the present day.

OUR readers whose interest in the subject of underpayment has been aroused or rekindled by the Sweated Industries Exhibition will be glad to have their attention drawn to a report recently issued by the Women's Industrial Council. This report, entitled Home Industries of Women in London, is published by the Council at 7, John-street, Adelphi, W.C., price 6d. It is described as an interim report, and does not deal with remedies. But we have a half promise that this will be done in a later report, and we hope the half promise will become a complete fulfilment. Meanwhile, the present pamphlet will prove very useful to students. We have short chapters dealing with the legislation actual or proposed in Germany, the United States, and Australia. The account of the minimum wage does serve incidentally as a hint at the necessary first step towards remedy. The larger part of the report is taken up with an excellent description by Mrs. J. R. Macdonald of the history and present position of the home workers of this country. It should serve as a most admirable introduction to the study of the subject, drawn as it is from official sources, and touched also with a sense of human sympathy and the passion of social justice towards the oppressed.

THE report concludes with a list of actual cases of home work which the committee has investigated. We quote a paragraph from the note appended to these cases by Miss Clementina Black: "Our duty has been to put forward facts as clearly and as comprehensively as may be. Of the human suffering represented by these pages of tabulation surely the duller reader can conceive something. Nor can we comfort ourselves with a belief that the products thus wrung out of suffering are not in our own houses. To whom are not shoes sent home in boxes? Who does not buy matches, or tin tacks, or tooth brushes? Whose coals and potatoes are not put into sacks, or whose retail purchases not into paper bags? There is no person in this kingdom—or in any of the States that are called civilised—who does not partake of the proceeds of underpaid labour; and the conditions of such labour are not growing better; they are, if anything, growing worse, and under-payment is rather spreading than decreasing." Such a statement, coming from so well-known and so careful an investigator, demands the most serious consideration.

THERE is a true Church wherever one hand meets another helpfully, and that is the only holy or Mother Church which ever was, or ever shall be.—Ruskin.

OBITUARY.

MRS. GEORGE BUCKTON.

ON Tuesday morning, at Oxford, very peacefully, after only half an hour's illness from heart failure, Mrs. Buckton passed away, being in her eighty-third year. The widow of the late George Buckton, of Roundhay, Leeds, her home had been since his death, for many years, with her daughter and son-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Estlin Carpenter, first in London and then at Oxford, and it was at their house, 109, Banbury-road, that the summons came to her. To many students of Manchester College, who had experience of her exceeding kindness, and felt the influence of the gentle and lovely spirit of her life, as to a host of other friends, the news will bring a keen regret, but sorrow tempered by the thought of the divine peace into which she has entered and the richer promise of the immortal hope. Of her deep interest in Manchester College an abiding memorial remains in the beautiful organ in the College chapel, which was her gift. There on Friday morning the memorial service was held, followed by the interment at Roundhay, Leeds, later in the day.

ELIZABETH PARSONS CHANNING.

FOR many years, at every important gathering of Unitarians in Boston, U.S.A., visitors and strangers would have pointed out to them a small quiet figure in black, and beneath the old-fashioned bonnet, a wonderful face, so strong in profile, so lit from within by the radiance of mind and soul, that it was little surprise to hear that the small person was Miss Channing. The eldest surviving representative of the family whose name is indelibly associated with the Unitarian faith, Miss Elizabeth Parsons Channing (daughter of Rev. George G. Channing, brother of Dr. William Ellery Channing) exercised a very profound, though a very modest, influence throughout the Unitarian body by her admirable speeches, papers, letters, all constantly given for the cause she so dearly loved. Her death, which took place May 29, is a great loss to the Unitarian work in America, although for some years her strength had been slowly ebbing, so that her public appearances were not so frequent, but her correspondence was wide to the last, and the energy she stirred up in others, the encouragement she scattered far and wide, the sympathy at the telling moment, the high ideal of attainment she constantly set forth, the power of her living influence, all this can never be told. She was one of earth's noblest women. With a deep powerful nature, keen, original, brilliant intellect, she united a great unselfishness, and long-trained control. A letter from her devoted sister "Ellen" says she died "serene and uncomplaining, with folded hands, which, she said, signified submission and patience." To those who came to know her most intimately, the depth of her thinking and its ceaseless expansion was a constant wonder; she exhibited in this respect a striking likeness to her marvellous uncle, of whom Dr. Dewey said, "Dr. Channing's conversation impressed me even more than any of his writings."

In her earlier years Miss Channing published several stories for children, later she wrote pithy editorials from time to time for the Christian Register, but in 1892, urged by friends and strangers alike, she allowed the publication of a volume of brief essays which remains her most notable literary work, entitled "Kindling Thoughts." This volume has permanent religious value, and probably will be better known by succeeding generations than our own. Dr. Martineau wrote to Miss Channing in 1895 a letter in which he says: "Your 'Kindling Thoughts' not infrequently reminded me of Amiel's Journal Intime, with the characteristic difference that while his reflections end as they begin, with thought pure and simple, yours issue in some rule of practice. His exhibit and keep the spiritual life in suspense, yours impel it to realise character and action."

Miss Channing leaves two sisters, both in delicate health, in the beautiful home in Milton, the most picturesque of Boston's suburbs, but what a vacant place her death will make! She bore the sorrows of so many, while always striving towards the light. In one of her last letters to the present writer Miss Channing quoted the following lines, saying she hoped they might be read at her funeral. They reflect her deathless faith:—

"I know the night is near at hand,
The mists lie low on hill and bay;
The autumn sheaves are dewless, dry—
But I have had—have had—the day!
Yes, I have had, dear Lord, the day;
When at thy call I have the night
Brief be the twilight as I pass
From light to dark—from dark to light."

MR. F. A. HARRISON.

WITH very sincere regret we record the death of Mr. Frederick Angier Harrison, fifth son of the late Rev. Dr. Harrison, of Brixton, brother of Mr. John Harrison, great-grandson of the Rev. Ralph Harrison, of Cross-street Chapel, Manchester, and a descendant of the Rev. Samuel Angier, of Dukinfield. Mr. F. A. Harrison was not so well known in Unitarian circles as his brother, Mr. John Harrison, but he was all his life an ardent Unitarian, and a generous supporter of the faith of his fathers. For some years he lived in Hastings, and identified himself with our church there. During that time he frequently invited the congregation to social gatherings, and in every way showed his interest in them and the principle for which they stood. It was entirely owing to his generosity that the Hastings congregation were able to invite the Provincial Assembly to meet in that town. Mr. Harrison had a very successful career as a business man, and was esteemed, nay, loved, by all who knew him. If the true test of a man be "How does he bear success?" then here was one who stood the test nobly. His success brought with it no pride, no consciousness of superiority, no patronage. He had for all he knew a friendly word, a genial smile, and a desire to help. The men in his employ spoke in the highest terms of his care for them and his interest in their welfare. They have lost an ideal master. His loyalty to his friends was beautiful. And this same loyalty was shown to the faith which he had inherited from a long line of noble ancestors, beginning with the Rev. Cuthbert Harrison, one of the 2,000 who left the Church in 1662 rather than be false to their conscience. It means something to be a Unitarian in a fashionable watering place, and, socially speaking, Mr. Harrison paid the penalty. But that made him all the more devoted to the cause of freedom, and during the whole time of his residence in Hastings he was a most regular worshipper with his co-religionists. During the last four or five years his health had been failing, and after an illness of some two years, heroically and almost uncomplainingly borne, he entered into rest on June 1 at his residence, Southwood, Sydenham. We, with all his friends, would pay our tribute of love to his memory and profound sympathy with his widow and family. The funeral service took place on Wednesday, June 6, at Effra-road, Brixton, and was conducted by the Rev. F. W. Stanley, under whose ministry Mr. Harrison had sat during his residence at Sydenham. The interment was at Norwood Cemetery, and was attended by a great assembly of friends, representing all classes.

THE REV. J. J. BISHOP.

THE Rev. John James Bishop, whose death occurred at Portland on the 29th of last month, was the son of Mr. John Bishop, of Dorchester, by whose efforts the old chapel in that town was kept open till the congregation altogether faded in 1868. While a boy, Mr. J. J. Bishop distinguished himself in the school which the Dorsetshire poet, the well-known Rev. William Barnes, kept at Dorchester; and he entered at Manchester New College, Manchester, at the earliest possible age, in the year 1845. He went through the full theological course, taking his degree of B.A., at London in 1849; and, on leaving college, at once entered on the work of the ministry in his native town of Dorchester. But he did not continue there more than a year, having been appointed to assist his uncle, the well-known Rev. Francis Bishop in the Beaufort-street Domestic Mission at Liverpool, in order to obtain additional training and experience for the ministry. He next spent two years conducting the services maintained at that time by the Dowson family at Geldeston, in Norfolk. He was then minister at Blackley, near Manchester, in the years 1857-8; and at each of these places he added tutorial engagements to his ministerial work.

In 1859, Mr. Bishop settled at Loughborough, in connection with which congregation he was most generally known, as he remained there till the close, at the end of eleven years of his ministerial life. During the time of his ministry, the quaint old brick chapel was replaced, largely in consequence of his enthusiasm and strenuous exertions, by a small but handsome Gothic building, with a schoolhouse added as a double transept across the end of the building, and capable, if need arose, of being added to the chapel. A lady, at that time a member of his congregation, says that "he and his wife were most industrious in the Sunday-school and week-evening classes, where they were instrumental in educating a number of young men and women who became useful members of society, and who always expressed great attachment to them both; and he was much loved and very highly respected by his congregation generally."

During the latter part of his ministry, he devoted himself most assiduously to the establishment of a working men's club in the town, and this added labour helped to undermine his health, and render prolonged rest absolutely necessary. This rest he sought at Portland, but it soon became evident that he would never be able to resume the active work of the ministry, and he remained at Portland as an invalid for the rest of his life, with only occasional short intervals when he sought change and convalescence elsewhere. But, though incapacitated from active work, he was cheerful in his quiet surroundings, and was ever alive to the political and religious events of the day, read much, and occasionally engaged in deeper studies. His correspondence bore evidence of the lively interest he took in public affairs, and the intelligent opinions he formed on the events of the day.

Mr. Bishop's modest, unassuming character, especially during the long period of his invalid retirement, prevented him from being generally known, and to the present generation his name will be unfamiliar; but he was much esteemed among his fellow students, and his blameless life and earnest labours won the respect of all with whom he was brought into contact.

In 1866 Mr. Bishop married Ellen Owen, daughter of the Rev. William Parkinson, who had previously filled the pulpit at Loughborough. She was his sedulous attendant and nurse for many years, till her death, in 1891, since which time her sister had been his nurse and companion. Mr. Bishop was in his 76th year, and has left no children.

THE REV. R. C. MOORE.

THE ranks of our ministry have again suffered a grievous loss in the death of Richard Moore, of Horwich, at the age of 41. Until the previous Tuesday night he was in normal health, but he was attacked by pneumonia, from which he died on Sunday, June 3.

Richard Clarke Moore was born at Hale, Cheshire, and was a younger brother of the Rev. John Moore, of Hindley. He entered the Home Missionary College in 1887, after a preliminary year at Owens College. In 1890 he proceeded to Manchester College, Oxford, where he spent three years as a divinity student. On leaving Oxford, Mr. Moore acted for a time as locum tenens at Gee Cross, during Rev. H. E. Dowson's illness, and then, in 1894, he was appointed to Horwich, a station of the North East Lancashire Unitarian Mission. He was the first minister there, and it proved to be his only charge. By faithful, patient, and concentrated effort he gathered together, and under difficult conditions sustained, a congregation which has been an effective influence on the religious life of the town, and which, under his wise guidance, was steadily working its way towards independence. With the hearty co-operation of his congregation, Mr. Moore, by various efforts, including sales of work, &c., at which he toiled hard and successfully, raised no less than £1,000 towards an "Independence Fund" for his church. He also took a full share in the denominational life of the Bolton district, and was a valued and respected member of the North and East Lancashire Mission Committee, the Horwich Temperance Council, the Horwich District Nurses' Association, and the old Horwich School Board. On its dissolution he became a manager of the Council schools, where he was always a welcome visitor. His relations with brother ministers of other denominations were of the happiest kind. He was glad to join in the interchange of pulpits, and at the United Communion Services readily took a part.

Richard Moore's ideal of ministerial service was a high one, but his personal character made it for him not difficult to realise. With a true instinct, he knew that the most valuable service that a minister can render is in pastoral work, and his temperament made the pastoral work into which he threw himself very sympathetic and precious. His relations with his congregation have never been anything but cordial and happy. One of his truest pleasures in the present year was the receiving into the membership of his church a goodly number of young people from the Sunday School. He was zealous and anxious concerning the religious instruction of the young. His preaching, which in manner was quiet, and free from every kind of display or artifice, concerned itself always with the deep things of the spirit, and their interplay with human life. By his old fellow-students, his brother ministers, and his more intimate friends he was very deeply beloved.

He married, in 1895, Clara, daughter of the late Robert Fielding, who, with four children, survives him. On June 7, the eleventh anniversary of his wedding day he was buried at Harpurhey Cemetery by the Revs. J. H. Weatherall and W. G. Cadman.

A Memorial Service is to be held in the church at Horwich on Sunday evening.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

Accrington (Appointment).—The Rev. J. Islan Jones, B.A., has been appointed minister of the Oxford-street Unitarian Church, and entered on his duties last Sunday (June 10).

Banbridge (Appointment).—The Rev. Edgar Lockett has accepted a unanimous invitation to the First Presbyterian Church, and is to enter next month on his duties there.

Belfast: Stanhope-street Mission (Appointment).—The Rev. Eustace Thompson, of Bermondsey, has accepted a cordial invitation to take charge of the work at this Mission in succession to the Rev. G. J. Slipper, and will enter upon his duties on September 1.

Cardiff (West Groe Church).—On Sunday, June 3, after the evening service a presentation of an easy chair and a mirror was made to Mr. and Mrs. W. A. Moore in recognition of the long and faithful services rendered by Mr. Moore to the church. He has been on the committee for thirteen years and secretary nine years.

Denton (Induction Services).—Services for the induction of Mr. Herbert E. Perry as minister with the Rev. Lawrence Scott at Wilton-street were held on Whit Sunday morning, afternoon, and evening. At the morning service the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson gave a charge to the congregation, and at the afternoon service the Rev. James C. Street gave the charge to the new minister. He had known Mr. Perry for many years, Mr. Street said, and had been, in fact, in his father's class long ago in the High Pavement Sunday School at Nottingham. He also recalled the memory of his brother, the late Charles Perry, minister of Hope-street Church, Liverpool, and proceeded to speak earnestly to their new minister on the duties of his calling. The Rev. E. D. Priestley Evans, of Bury, speaking as another old friend, then welcomed Mr. Perry into the ministry. At the evening service, when there was a very large congregation, Mr. Perry was himself the preacher, taking as his text 1 Cor. ix. 16, "Woe is me, if I preach not the Gospel," and Rev. xxii. 9, "I am a fellow servant with thee, and with thy brethren the prophets." He had been deeply moved, he said, by the services of that day, and was very conscious of his own shortcomings and limitations, but his whole heart was in that work on which he was entering, and he asked their sympathy and friendship. It was a gospel of practical Christianity and of character that he should preach, and that they must all join together in preaching. At each service there was special music, and the collections were for the chapel and school funds.

Horsham.—On Whitsunday the 135th Anniversary services were conducted by the Rev. F. K. Freeston, of Essex Church. The church had been tastefully decorated for the occasion, and the sunny morning, the influence of old associations, and other factors brought together friends from Billingshurst, Ditchling, Brighton, Slaught, Bognor, Woking, Brockham, Hayward's Heath, Crawley, and London. The sermons were of the kind which Oliver Wendell Holmes says "Make you feel you would like to shake hands with everybody," and comprised as subjects the words of the Apostles' Creed, "The Holy Ghost, the Holy Catholic Church, and the Communion of Saints." Under Mrs. Marten's capable direction luncheon and tea were provided in the school-room, which has just been newly decorated, and looked fresh and cool with its green walls and white ceiling. The collections for the Provincial Assembly and B. & F.U.A., amounted to just over £7. The afternoon meeting was occupied by echoes from the Triennial Conference at Oxford, the opener being the Rev. J. J. Marten, and other speakers taking part in the discussion.

London Sunday School Society.—The annual aggregate service of the elder scholars of the London Sunday Schools was held at Essex Hall last Sunday afternoon, and was conducted by the Rev. Henry Gow, of Hampstead. Some 500 to 600 scholars were present from fifteen schools, besides a goodly gathering of teachers and friends, so that the hall was well filled both in the body and the gallery. Mr. Gow, taking for his text the words, "Pilate saith unto him, what is truth?" preached an eloquent sermon on the duty of young men and women making a definite choice between good and evil, and on the necessity, when once such choice has been made, of holding one's principles earnestly and in no lukewarm or half-hearted fashion. The singing of the scholars was very hearty, while a choir from Highgate School, as the winners of the society's banner at the recent singing competition, rendered as an anthem Mendelssohn's "Hear my prayer." Mr. Reeves, in the regretted absence of Mr. John Harrison, officiated at the organ.

Manchester Domestic Mission: Wilbert-street.—On Saturday, June 2, the Rev. S. A. Steintal performed the ceremony of laying the memorial stone of the extension of the Mission premises. A devotional service was conducted by the Rev. W. E. George, hon. secretary of the Domestic Mission Society, assisted by the Rev. J. W. Bishop. Mr. G. H. Leigh presided and gave an address. The Rev. S. A. Steintal briefly reviewed the work from his personal acquaintance with it for nearly fifty years, and said that now there were to be larger premises in which to carry on the work he hoped results would justify the great effort that had been made. The meeting was largely attended by friends from a distance, amongst them being the Revs. P. M. Higginson, J. E. Manning, Ambrose Bennett, W. Holmshaw, A. C. Fox, W. T. Bushrod, and A. W. Timmis. The mission was well represented by members of the congregation and school. After the ceremony, tea was served in the recreation rooms, and the proceedings terminated. The Rev. Dendy Agate very kindly collected flowers from the members of his congregation for decoration.

Manchester Unitarian Sunday-School Union.—The scholars' annual festival was held in the Free Trade Hall on Whit Sunday afternoon. Mr. George Smith (Southport) conducted the service, and gave an appropriate and interesting address from the texts:—"A sower went out to sow his seed," and "As ye sow so shall ye reap." Mr. Oliver H. Heys conducted the choir, and Mr. Arthur G. Baker was at the organ; Miss Bertha Guthrie and Mr. Harry Smith kindly sang solos. The hall was well filled, amongst those present being the Revs. S. A. Steinhil and W. Holmshaw (President of the Union).

Pontypridd.—The committee and minister had the pleasure of welcoming twelve new members on Sunday evening, June 3. The service throughout was a service of dedication, the sermon being based on Luke ix. 23.

Shrewsbury.—A classical scholarship of £100 at Clifton College has just been won by the youngest son of the Rev. James Street, who is not yet thirteen. James Martineau Street is the lad's name, and many friends will congratulate him and his father on his success. He has been for some terms head of Mr. W. C. Drew's Preparatory School, "The Limes," Shrewsbury.

Southampton.—A congregational meeting was held after the evening service on May 27, when the Rev. T. R. Skemp presented Mr. G. E. Jolliffe with a travelling-bag and an album, containing the autographs of the donors and a letter of thanks. Mr. Jolliffe, who is a son-in-law of the late Rev. Iden Payne, and has been treasurer to the Church of the Saviour for the past eleven years, felt obliged to resign, owing to increased private business. Mr. T. Isted, chairman of committee, Miss Spencer, the secretary, and Mr. L. A. Compton, as churchwarden, joined in the expressions of gratitude and goodwill, and Mr. Jolliffe briefly responded.

A VEDIC HYMN.

BY VASISHTHA.

THOUGH here for ever
None hath his stay,
Not yet would I lie
In the house of clay.

O Varuna!
In thee I live:
Be merciful, Lord,
And oh! forgive.

I totter, I creep,
With trembling feet;
Mine eyes are grown dim,
And the world is so sweet

O Varuna!
In thee I live:
Be merciful, Lord,
And oh! forgive.

In weakness, unwitting,
I went astray,
And blackness of night
Brought me dismay.

O Varuna!
In thee I live:
Be merciful, Lord,
And oh! forgive.

I faint with thirst
Though a stream should lave
My feet, my limbs,
In its limpid wave.

O Varuna!
In thee I live:
Be merciful, Lord,
And oh! forgive.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

A LETTER from the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson on the Education Bill, fully stating what, in his opinion, is the only way out of the religious difficulty, will appear in next week's INQUIRER. In that number we hope also to publish the Rev. J. L. Haigh's reply to the article on Sunday-schools in the current Nineteenth Century.

A VERY successful Sunday-School Conference, in connection with the Irish Non-subscribing Presbyterian Association, was held at Temple Patrick on Saturday, June 2, when a paper on "Some Needs of the Sunday-school Teacher, and how to meet them," was read by Miss J. H. Malcolm, of Holywood, and followed by a discussion. There was an attendance of between four and five hundred, and the large number of meetings which crowd in at this time has prevented our reporting this conference more fully. The Rev. W. Napier, president of the Association, was in the chair.

MR. BALFOUR appeared in unusual surroundings on Tuesday afternoon, when he opened a bazaar in the lecture-hall of the City Temple in aid of the Parker Memorial Church of Crowborough, and gave an address refreshingly liberal in tone. No views that he held as a Churchman, he said, made it difficult for him to give such help as he could to every organisation that had for its great object ministering to the spiritual interests of mankind. The ideal of one ecclesiastical organisation for the whole of the Church Universal was clearly an impossibility, and just as the idea of one universal empire for civilised mankind had to be abandoned, and divided into nations, we had to seek to do our best for mankind as a whole; so the various church organisations, living in peace together, in the spirit of charity, of affection, and of mutual sympathy, had to do their best for the Church Universal. And such organisations there must be, if religion is to do its work effectively for the world.

No doubt seems to be entertained as to the complicity of the Russian Government in the latest massacre of Jews at Bielostok. Unfortunately there is nothing improbable in this, and we can only suppose that the design was to withdraw attention from the action of the Duma by again igniting the fire of racial animosity. But, if such was the intention, it has entirely failed; for, while there is nothing but a monotonous sameness in the reports of outrages by a populace aided by troops and police, there is one feature of startling novelty in the situation. The Duma has appointed a committee of three of its members to investigate the question; thus slowly is light thrown on the distresses of Russia. It is not easy to make out the precise number of the victims, and, indeed, one has a desperate feeling that a few more or less is of little consequence when a whole population is thus doomed to live in perpetual insecurity.

AN interesting correspondence between the Rev. F. B. Meyer and Rev. C. Aked has been sent by the former to the Christian World. Mr. Meyer has always been a prominent representative of the most orthodox and rigid theology. Mr. Aked has been regarded as adhering to a more liberal type. Mr. Meyer himself had, as he tells us, imagined Mr. Aked to be very far removed from him and from a true doctrine of the Atonement. Recently, however, the two were staying in the same hotel in Birmingham. They discussed many things, and Mr. Meyer was relieved to find that his friend was more in agreement than he had supposed. His letter was intended to give Mr. Aked an opportunity of putting himself right with the evangelical public. Mr. Meyer stated what he now believes to be Mr. Aked's faith and the latter in reply adopts and repeats his language. The following sentences, therefore, contain the deliberate expression of opinion of both writers:—"At great cost to himself, God in the Person of Christ met certain conditions which we may not be able exactly to define, which required to be met before his love could have its free course towards man consistently with righteousness. Love to man had always been in his heart, but on the cross he met certain conditions or demands of righteousness which enabled him to be just, and the Justifier of them that believe." It would be difficult to have a more guarded statement of the substitutionary doctrine of the Atonement, and one which at the same time should be so empty of dogmatic meaning. We doubt if the verbal agreement goes very deep. If you have such a doctrine at all, you must attempt to define your meaning; and with definition, disagreement might soon follow. But let it stand undefined as Mr. Meyer wishes. We doubt whether it is so much an assurance of Mr. Aked's orthodoxy as an indication of the slow disintegration of the old beliefs. For our own part we cannot be too thankful to be free from the necessity of striving to retain even the vaguest assent to a theory which has nothing but a slight antiquity to recommend it.

IN response to a letter of resignation from Mr. Carvell Williams, the Committee of the Liberation Society has passed the following resolution:—"On receiving from Mr. Carvell Williams an intimation that age and bodily infirmity make it necessary for him to retire from the office he has held in connection with the Society, the executive Committee desire to place on record their deep sense of the signal value of the service he has rendered to the Society's cause, first as secretary from 1847 to 1877, and since then as chief of the Society's staff. The Committee recognise that by his high administrative qualities, his unremitting industry, and his ardent devotion, he has greatly advanced the cause of religious equality both on the platform and in the Press; and they remember also that he has rendered valuable service as a member of the House of Commons. The Committee congratulate Mr. Williams on the fact that during his period of service a series of measures have been passed by which the Society's object has been perceptibly advanced; while the marked change in public opinion is rapidly preparing the way for its complete attainment. The Committee trust that in resting from his arduous labours he may have the satisfaction of witnessing the further triumph of the principles which he has so strenuously striven to promote."

THE SWISS REFORM-DAY.

DEAR MR. EDITOR,—I have been forced to miss an International Council, a meeting of Conference, and two Essex Hall gatherings, but some of this loss has been made up to me this week; for the Chur meetings of the Swiss Free Christian Society (Verein für freies Christentum) were full of stimulus and delight. The hospitality was as warm, and the singing as fine as at the Sheffield Conference, the arrangements as perfect as at Leicester, the speeches as good as at Liverpool, and the town itself, with its Roman name and towers, its cathedral in which every century from the eighth onward has a share, and its thrilling history, as interesting (almost) as Oxford. The programme left me, indeed, no time for sight-seeing; but I had already visited all the lions except one, the house in which Angelica Kaufmann was born, and that I stumbled upon on my way from the Three Kings, where we had supper, to the Steinbock, where we talked. A pleasant surprise awaited my arrival, for my host turned out to be the accomplished blind organist, Herr Karl Köhl, whom I had already heard with wondering admiration in Seewis, and with whom I have friends in common. He was our Festival organist, and the aptness of his choice and power of his playing added a gracious gleam to our meetings in the Martin and Regula Churches.

It was in the Martin Church that we held our Festal Service. I do not know which was more moving, the exquisite singing of the choir or the deep-toned roar of our congregational hymns. The preacher was Pfarrer E. Baudenbacher, a young man, already known by his writing, who has lately been called to a charge in the Federal capital. He preached on the first commandment of Jesus, and his sermon, full of thought and fervour, prepared and delivered with the whole force of a whole man, illustrated its own demands. He is one of those whom stupid people call a "pessimist" because he is not an ostrich. A new time is preparing, he told us, such as is born in agony. Now, more than ever, humanity has need of strong arms, strong natures, whole men and women, firm rooted in moral strength as are the storm-pines in our Alps. Happy are those who know how to pour great thoughts into little daily cares; who, proudly delighting in toil, fill out the measure of their calling. True, we sow unto hope; what will bring our hope to realisation? Nothing but whole human beings, clean-shapen and full of character—he was speaking, remember, under the shadow of the Calenda—like the forms of our mountain-chains. "All, then, that is dear, precious and holy to us, let us clasp it with our whole nature and being, live for it, battle and bleed for it, confident of victory, already blessed in the victory that we shall win. Come, great time, we are ready! Break, Föhn of the world, heart-searching, soul shaking tempest; we are prepared."²

After a high tea at the Three Kings, we assembled in the splendid hall of the Steinbock Hotel, which was hardly large enough for our numbers. The gathering was outwardly very unlike a Whit-week meeting, but the inner feeling was just the same: We sat at long tables, drank what we listed, smoked if we cared to smoke, chatted and laughed, listened from time to time to charming music by a mixed choir, greeted old friends and made new ones, and heard seven speeches, six of which I may describe as eloquent. In the whole series of the meetings there was not one poor, halting, or indifferent speech. Either the Free Christians of the Continent are all orators, or else they do not speak unless they can;

Dr. Valer, the local president, whose enthusiasm for Rhetia, Switzerland, Free Christianity, and the whole history of conflict for liberty, are fused together in a glowing character, declared the meeting open. Then the President of the Verein, our old friend and correspondent, Pfarrer Altherr of Basel, delivered the best of all the sixteen speeches in which, besides a sermon, a lecture and the conversation of a long committee-meeting, I luxuriated at Chur. He spoke as an old reformer, a founder of the society, in order to combat the idea that the work of reform was done, and reformers were no longer needed. Whatever young theologians there may be who think themselves too good for this kind of work, he himself knows of no nobler task than that of being a "committed, weather-proof, confident and happy reformer." Then I was called on. As I had not spoken publicly for more than fourteen months, and never in German, I was nervous, and glad to get it over. I expressed the sympathy and goodwill of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association towards the Swiss Verein, our desire to be closely bound together with all who labour to unite pure religion with perfect liberty, and especially our happy acknowledgments of the inspiration and strength gained at Geneva. [This was, alas, an impersonal tribute.] Since I knew that some, perhaps many, had taken fright at the word "Unitarian," and held aloof from the Geneva congress, I tried to make them understand how intimate the connection is, in Great Britain and America, between this word and Free Christianity, we could not indeed boast of places like Canton Thurgau and Canton Glarus, where ministers of all schools worked together in church matters, or like Canton St. Gallen and the Rhetian land itself, where the free Christians are in a majority. Still we were not cast down; we had faith in the success of our cause, which was not to secure a victory for our own name, or our own opinions, but to deepen and clarify religious thought and feeling, to extend pure and free religion, to encourage brotherhood, righteousness and peace. In the confidence that this was their cause also, our society extended to theirs a fraternal hand.

As soon as I had finished Professor Paul Schmiedel leaned over the table and introduced himself. I already knew him as a writer, but was glad to meet him as a man, and next day to hear him as a lecturer. We first linked our acquaintance a little closer by claiming Mr. Carpenter as a common friend, and then had a jolly little talk about Wrede's Paulus.

Pfarrer Wellauer spoke, in an admirable tone, on the social work of the minister. He is neither doubtful nor apologetic with regard to the social activity of the church: The church especially must be unwearied in the work of demanding and furthering social righteousness, for the social problem can never be settled by the club-law of capitalists or of labour, but only by Christian solidarity and brotherly love: I must not weary you with a résumé of all our orations. Dr. Rochat, of Geneva, in a brilliant speech, such as could have been made in no other language than French, bore witness to the heartening effect in his city of the Unitarian congress: We had a greeting from the Protestantenverein, by Pfarrer Baum of the Palatinate, and our gratitude to the choir was well expressed by Pfarrer Baur of Basel.

I went to my abode feeling that something had been attempted, something done; but the night's repose failed me; for I shared quarters with a venerable Dean, who objected to night-air, and I have lived in the open for fourteen months! However, I have appreciated since then the hitherto unprized luxury of having a bedroom which contains no deans:

Next day we assembled at 8 a.m. for business. It was highly interesting, but will hardly bear transplantation. And then came our main gathering, to spend a few moments in receiving President Altherr's report, and then listen to Professor Schmiedel. His subject was "The person of Jesus, in the present strife of opinions."¹ He dealt with it under three headings, each a question: (1) Did Jesus really live? (2) Did he regard himself as Messiah? (3) Can his moral teaching be followed to-day? The fulness of the lecturer's treatment of his subject, and the exact articulation of his thought, make précis difficult. The first question, he said, was not settled by passing resolutions at general meetings. So much of early Christian history had turned out to be myth that a mythical origin for Jesus himself was not unthinkable. He seemed himself, however, to hold not only that Jesus lived, but that his existence is demonstrable; and he instanced nine several notices in the synoptic record which can hardly be explained on any other hypothesis than that they really happened to a real Jesus. (For instance, his kinsmen's attempt to restrain him as a person of unsound mind.) The second question, and the third, Professor Schmiedel, answers also in the affirmative. The real basis of Jesus' teaching lies in the utterance "What does it benefit a man, if he gain the whole world, and ruin his own life." If we read the teaching of Jesus intelligently, taking figures and emphatic hyperbole for what they are, and seeking always to reach the intention of the teacher, it is not only capable of being followed but admirably helpful and necessary. The Christianity which consists in following Jesus is expressed in the phrase, already known in England, which the lecturer quoted from a conservative teacher, "Christianity is the truth of humanity."²

Dekan Hosang said a word or two, but no real discussion followed. After a little more music we left the Regula Kirche and gathered once more in the Steinbock for a banquet. Except for what was on the table, this was last night's experience repeated and extended. Regierungsrat Stiffler gave us "The Fatherland"²² with such fervour that even the foreigners were carried away. Dr. Websky from Berlin, Stadtpfarrer Brückner (an elder brother) from Karlsruhe spoke for their Fatherland. After Professor Balavoine had given us another witty French address, Dekan Kambli gave utterance to the grateful delight of all in the perfect success of the Reform-day.

Most of the guests went to Passugg, where they held another informal meeting with songs and toasts. I did not venture to face any more; but I carried with me such comfort of comradeship as I have not known since a certain dear friend, warm from Geneva, visited me in Seewis.

E. W. LUMMIS.

BOOKS NEW AND OLD.

"I HAVE lately come to perceive that the one thing which gives value to any piece of art, whether it be book, or picture, or music, is that subtle, elusive thing which is called personality." It is with these words that Mr. A. C. Benson begins his new volume of essays, "From a College Window," and they strike the keynote of what he has to say to us. It is a book full of pleasant talk on a variety of themes, with no attempt to conceal an intensely personal attitude; and it is this which gives it the attractiveness as of good conversation, and in more than one place causes it to fall away into triviality. The truth is that Mr. Benson is inclined to take himself a little too seriously. This kind of writing requires the savour of humour and irony, the light touch, the happiness of egotism, to relieve the monotony of self-criticism and reflection. Instead of these frankly mundane qualities there is throughout these essays a tone of almost plaintive sadness combined with a sensitive feeling for the loveliness of nature and the more sensuous beauty of art, which reminds me continually of Pierre Loti. The point of view is that of a retired schoolmaster, who has been content to renounce the prizes of an active career, and has found a welcome escape from scholastic routine in the life of an unmarried fellow in a small college with congenial literary pursuits. "I have grown to feel that the ambitions which we preach and the successes for which we prepare are very often nothing but a missing of the simple road, a troubled wandering among thorny by-paths and dark mountains." Such is his frank confession. "There is a world," he tells us—and evidently it is the world of his desire—"of tender, wistful, delicate emotions, subdued and soft impressions, in which it is peace to live." We need not deny the reality of this world for a few of the elect, for there are dim instincts in most of us which correspond to the subtle beauty of the picture; only it is a little hard not to be impatient with one who takes his cultivated quietism so easily, who is more than content to be a tranquil spectator of the great game of life. The temptation is strong to fling out some harsh sentences after the Philistine manner in praise of those decied ambitions and successes which, after all, have the rough smack of reality about them, and, for most of us, are the goad to worthy achievement. "To take a soldier without ambition," says Bacon, "is to pull off his spurs."

"He that seeketh to be eminent amongst able men hath a great task; but that is ever good for the Public." What is good for the Public weighs a little too lightly in this meditative scheme of life. I hope that I shall not be accused of levity when I say that other men have contrived to pass the fateful age of forty without being quite so deeply preoccupied with the fact. Mr. Benson is a little too anxious to analyse his sensations and to adjust his compass to strange latitudes. It is not necessary to advertise to the world that we are no longer young, to effect any drastic change in our bodily or mental habits, or to begin to do things in an elderly sort of way. For most people these changes come almost unperceived. It is true that for some of us high spirits and buoyant hopefulness are replaced by a growing sense of the tragedy of life; our judgments become more mellow and restrained; our sympathies are touched with a deeper pity; the infinite mystery of things closes in upon us, and it does not always become more luminous with advancing years. But, for all that, the true philosophy is to keep the heart young and to cherish the conviction that we belong more to the generation that is following in our steps than to the one that precedes us into the Unseen. It is better to play cricket with our boys with what zest and success we can than to reflect that games are not for middle-aged people. After all, the different periods of a man's life are not so sharply defined as they appear from Mr. Benson's college window.

But I allow myself to reflect too long upon this point of view, and I should be sorry to convey the impression that these essays are not rich in wise reflection and pithy sayings. What he writes about his favourite subject of books and authorship is full of interest, especially for bookish people who value the intimacies—I will not call them the trade secrets—of other craftsmen. If he should ever meet the shade of Charles Lamb in some bookman's Elysium, he may wish that he had not told us with such evident satisfaction that "no one in real life reads a folio now"; but his plea for the old restful books may go far to procure him forgiveness. Here is a beautiful passage, which I cannot refrain from quoting, for it shows him at his best. He is speaking of the personal emotions which are quickened by the tranquil reading of the best books. "Such a mood," he says, "need not withdraw us from life, from toil, from kindly relationships, from deep affections; but it will rather send us back to life with a renewed and joyful zest, with a desire to discern the true quality of beautiful things, of fair thoughts, of courageous hopes, of wise designs. It will make us tolerant and forgiving, patient with stubbornness and prejudice, simple in conduct, sincere in word, gentle in deed; with pity for weakness, with affection for the lonely and the desolate, with admiration for all that is noble and serene and strong. Those who read in such a spirit will tend to resort more and more to large and wise and beautiful books, to press the sweetness out of old familiar thoughts, to look more for warmth and loftiness of feeling than for elaborate and artful expression. They will value more and more books that speak to the soul, rather than books that appeal to the ear and to the mind. They will realise that it is through wisdom and force and nobility that books retain their hold upon the hearts of men, and not by briskness and colour and epigram. A mind thus stored may have little grasp of facts, little garniture of paradox and jest, but it will be full of compassion and hope, of gentleness and joy."

Mr. Benson has the author's natural suspicion of the man who reads and does not write. He seems to be a mere literary dilettante. No doubt, absorption is easier than production, and there must be many potential writers of genius of whom the world, to its loss, will never hear anything. They have no regular habits of work; they are weakened by the fear of criticism; or they read so much, and in such various fields, that they have no time to think. And so they never put their hands to the hard task of creation. But there is another side to all this. To add to the number of feeble books which the world contains seems to many people, who might be ambitious otherwise of literary fame, an unpardonable offence against good taste and public morals. Many of them, no doubt, ought to write books for the discipline of their own minds, but then, for the world's sake, they should promptly put them in the fire. To publish at all under present conditions is to incur a heavy weight of responsibility. In the flood of feeble or colourless or mediocre books the great books perish, and few men lay it to heart. I have a deep and growing respect for the man who refuses to publish a book until he is satisfied that he has something to say which nobody else is likely to say so well. The writer who, when he has achieved deserved success, has the strength and restraint to renounce the pleasant flatteries and the glittering rewards of popular authorship, deserves even higher admiration. He will be happy always in belonging to the company of those who prefer to read great books to writing poor ones.

In two essays Mr. Benson deals with religion and the problems of the spiritual life. Here he lays aside altogether the pose which spoils a good deal of his writing, and speaks with force and sincerity. There is a delicate appreciation of the priestly character, for which many readers will be grateful, for it shows genuine sympathy and perception in dealing with a subject which has been disfigured by popular tumult. I confess that I grow a little weary of the abuse which is heaped upon the very idea of the priesthood in some quarters, and the vehemence of thought and speech in which good men indulge to their own evident satisfaction is not a little amazing. Priest is just as noble a word as prophet and king, and equally with them it represents one of the deep realities of human experience. Would it not be better to renounce these controversial habits, and to follow Mr. Benson's example in trying to bring it back from its hard formalism to gentler and more human uses? "The natural priest," he tells us, "is one whom one can instinctively and utterly trust, in whom one can deposit secrets as one deposits them in the custody of a bank, without any fear that they will be used for other purposes. In the true priest one finds a tender compassion, a deep and patient love; it is not worth while to wear disguises before him, because his keen, wary, and amused eye sees through the mask. It is not worth while to keep back, as Ananias did, part of the price of the land, to leave sordid temptations untold, because the true priest loves the sinner even more than he hates the sin; it is best to be utterly sincere with him, because he loves sincerity even more than unstained virtue; and one can confess to him one's desires for good with as little false shame as one can confess one's hankering after evil."

The last essay, on "Religion," is the most intimately personal in the whole book, and for this reason, apart from its beauty of expression, it is the most arresting thing which it contains. It is intensely—perhaps some readers will think it unduly—subjective. It is pervaded by the thought of the infinite value of the interior life and the duty of quiet resignation in face of the mysteries of the world; and closely interwoven with these there is an attitude of Christian discipleship detached from any close allegiance to ecclesiastical forms. For even in his religion Mr. Benson is somewhat lonely and eclectic, and if only he may "understand wisdom secretly" he seems willing to dispense with the kindling influence of human sympathies and the common offices of prayer and praise.

From a literary point of view, Mr. Benson has done better work than this volume. The essay is always a trying form. It is read in a leisurely mood, and careless workmanship is detected more easily than elsewhere. To several of these essays their author has hardly given the patience and skill of the literary artist. There are flaws of expression. The beautiful passages—and they are many—lie too much in patches. But they have this saving merit—they contain a personal note, and they are written from an individual point of view if not from a very wide and tolerant human experience. There is always a certain fascination in understanding how another mind works, how another man, from the vantage ground of his own special experience faces the problems of life which are common to us all. There is no strong stimulus, there is little keen intellectual challenge in this book. It is, as we may suppose its author meant it to be, quiet, meditative, perhaps even a trifle pensive, a pleasant and not too obtrusive companion for our own thoughts.

LET the teacher of religion have his mind centred on a reality, then all his chosen symbols will become transparent.—S. M. Crothers.

THE first gleam of light, "the first cold light of morning," which gave promise of day with its noontide glories, dawned on me one day at Meeting, when I had been meditating on my state in great depression. I seemed to hear the words articulated in my spirit: "Live up to the light thou hast and more will be granted thee." Then I believed that God speaks to man by His Spirit. I strove to live a more Christian life, in unison with what I knew to be right, and looked for brighter days, not forgetting the blessings that are granted to prayer.—Caroline Fox.

IS THERE ONLY "ONE THING NEEDFUL"?

IV.

We have taken the Book of Revelation as representing in an extreme form the conviction that Christ and the world are irreconcilable; that the victory of Christ is the destruction of the world, and the victory of the world the destruction of Christ. We have shown that this conviction is one of pure anarchy, as far as any earthly order is concerned. Starting with this conviction, we found that there was indeed but "one thing needful," namely, self-preparation—to make oneself fit for the supernatural kingdom which, under God, Christ and his angels will bring, and which man can do nothing to bring.

In a less extreme form this conviction appears throughout the New Testament. It results in a definite attitude to what is called "this world." The fellowships and organisations of "this world" are regarded, not as means by which the soul may fit itself for eternity or the coming world, but rather as a fettering of the soul and a hindrance to the supreme task of self-preparation. St. Paul's strongest expression of this feeling is in 1 Corinthians vii. 29 to 32. The whole attitude is explained by the fact that "this world" is the Roman Empire, with its deification of brute force, expressed in emperor-worship, its total disregard of human life, and its boundless self-indulgence. The attitude of the Book of Revelation, however, Paul finds it impossible to maintain.

The Christians are in the world; the end of the world is not yet; the merely negative attitude to the world cannot be completely expressed in practice, and something positive must be found. It is this side of St. Paul's teaching that seems to me so deeply interesting and so generally neglected—much more so than the details, long-over-discussed, of his theological and Christological doctrine.

It is well known that Paul sees the ideal of human nature in the living Christ; and the only ground for all moral precepts, the only reason which makes life worth living, is that man may develop after the image of Christ, who is taken to be the perfection and completeness of humanity. To work out one's own salvation is to realise ever more and more of this completeness. This cannot be done in individual isolation, but only in the Christian community. Only in the "give and take" of social life can all sides of the Christian character be drawn out and enriched. Paul was convinced of what in recent times has been called the "organic unity of society," though he did not attempt to apply it outside the circle of Christian believers. Many well-known passages will occur to the reader, where the Apostle sets himself with a passion of eagerness to portray the ideal of manhood in all its appealing glory. Whatever be the subject about which he writes, he does not proceed far without introducing this appeal. Principles of theology (as in Romans i. to xi.) detailed precepts relating to the social life of the believers (as in 1 Corinthians, v. to xi. and elsewhere), ecclesiastical arrangements, or purely personal matters—all such things may be discussed at great length; but the essential thing is the manhood which springs from love of Christ, the realised ideal (Romans xii.; Corinthians xii. and xiii.; Galatians v. and vi.; Ephesians iv.; Philipians iii. 12 to 16, iv. 4 to 8; Colossians iii. 1 to 15; 1 Thessalonians v.; we may take all these works as illustrating Pauline doctrine, even if parts of some of them do not give Paul's own words).

All this is directly involved in the teaching of Jesus; but St. Paul, speaking in the midst of a decadent Græco-Roman environment, introduces a matter which has no special prominence in the teaching of the Master, who spoke in an environment influenced by Jewish morality. It is the importance of bodily purity, on which St. Paul repeatedly and expressly lays great stress. He realised vividly that heathen society was infected, as if with a deadly disease, by unrestrained indulgence of bodily impulses. I will not describe these as "animal impulses," since it is just among the lower animals that they are productive of no disorder at all to be compared to the physical, social and moral mischief to which they give rise in the human race. Paul never ceases to urge the mastery of these impulses as the first step from the life of "the world" to the Christian life. We may refer, among many passages, to the significant introduction of this duty of control, at the head of all his practical injunctions to the Christians of Thessalonica (1 Thess. iv. 2 to 4).

All this is not specially affected by Paul's conviction of the approaching end of the world; but that conviction he held all his life. Observe that it was not a conviction of something which was to happen an indefinite number of centuries hence, but of something which was to be in a comparatively short time (1 Thess. iv. 13 to v. 10), though it was not "at hand" (2 Thess. ii. 1, 2: enesteke, actually imminent; "now present," R.V.). The great expectation appears under various forms, but it is always a "coming of the Lord." I have already pointed out that it is a conviction which, if fully acted out in life, would lead to entire indifference to the world. This Paul saw to be impossible; and hence he provided, by what we can only call a compromise, for the necessities of an existence which is in the world and must have some dealings with the world. How Paul dealt with such questions might be illustrated at length in connection with his treatment of marriage, of the position of woman, and (what was a very serious thing at that time) of the consumption of food that had been offered to idols—that is, in the view of some contemporary Christians, dedicated to and defiled by diabolic powers.* As these topics would take up too much space, I must confine myself to a few slighter but not less instructive illustrations.

(1) In Thessalonica, certain persons had drawn a natural conclusion from the belief that the end of the age was imminent—i.e., that there was no need to labour for daily bread. Paul severely censures

* There were also Christians who thought it unlawful to eat meat or drink wine. Romans xiv. provides material for an instructive study both of Paul's personal disposition and of the Christian attitude to questions of vegetarianism and abstinence and the like. With Romans xiii. contrast Romans i. 18–32, which refers to the same world; and see the excellent observations of Weinel, St. Paul, p. 278–9.

this, and declares that a Christian ought to maintain his work and calling as a citizen, for the sake of supporting himself, and because otherwise he cannot "walk honestly towards them that are without (non-Christians)." Paul's simple but impressive words (2 Thess. iii. 10 to 12, 1. Thess. iv. 9 to 12) imply more than appears on the surface. They imply nothing less than the general justification of a social order based on the institution of private property, and introduce us to economic problems of which Paul at the time had no thought.

(2) The injunction to "walk honestly towards them that are without" has further important consequences. It may compel the Christian to associate with idolaters or even with immoral persons. On one occasion some words of Paul's were misunderstood at Corinth, and were supposed to forbid absolutely all association with such persons. He corrects this misunderstanding by saying that he did not exactly refer to men of the world who were immoral or idolaters; to forbid all associations with such would be to command the Christian to "go out of the world" (1 Cor. v. 9, 10.)

(3) Notwithstanding all this, he teaches the Corinthians that to go to law "before the unbelievers," for Christians to bring a disputed question of right before the bar of the heathen, is a shameful thing (1 Cor. vi. 5, 6). If they must go to law at all, let one of the brethren be judge. But it is best of all never to go to law. "Why do ye not rather take wrong? Why do ye not rather suffer yourselves to be defrauded?" Here a principle like that laid down in Matthew v. 40 is referred to, as if it were a "counsel of perfection" only.

(4) In Christ, says Paul, all are one; "there is neither bond nor free." And within the Christian communities, in their little gatherings, it was indeed so; all were equal. What effect, then, it might naturally be asked, does the Gospel have on the distinction of occupations and classes in the world, and, in particular, on the most characteristic institution of the ancient world—slavery? "No effect" seems at first sight to be the disappointing answer: "let each man abide in that calling wherein he was called." But to answer "no effect" is to say less than half the truth. It is true that Paul gave a general recognition to slavery as an institution (Epistle to Philemon; 1 Cor. vii. 20-24, where servant means slave; cp. Coloss. iii. 22). It is true that the Eastern and Western churches accepted slavery for several centuries, and that the church owned slaves. Yet it is also true that the doom of slavery is pronounced when a Roman citizen can describe a slave as his "faithful and beloved brother" (Coloss. iv. 9), and when a master is expected to take back a runaway slave as "more than servant—a brother beloved" (Philemon 16). It is not Paul's purpose to dwell on the inconsistency of this compromise; his purpose is practical, and the only difficulties he takes into account are difficulties that have actually arisen. Yet it might easily happen that a Christian slave would find his position practically impossible; he might be bound as a slave to obey his master in doing something which, as a Christian, he ought not to do. It would be useless then to say that he was free "in Christ," when as a slave his life and actions were wholly subject to his master's pleasure.

On the other hand, was it a mistake for Paul to avoid squandering his own and his churches' energies in a life and death struggle with an institution on which ancient society was largely built up—and a struggle in which the institution would certainly have gained the victory? It may fairly be replied—setting aside the bearing of the expected end of the world on the question—that Paul was not mistaken. What he tried to do was to humanise and moralise slavery (see especially Philemon 10 to 20), only not seeing that by doing so he was virtually destroying it. And so, though centuries passed before the church as a whole declared against slavery as a system, she set herself from the first to improve the slaves' condition, as Lecky and other authorities have abundantly shown. The torture, mutilation, and slaughter of slaves, the denial to them of legal marriage, the separation of families, were incidents of Roman slavery which the church resisted and condemned; and the manumission of slaves, though not proclaimed as matter of duty and necessity, was regarded as specially worthy of ecclesiastical benediction.

The attitude of St. Paul to this most important institution of ancient society would repay further discussion, and I hope to refer to it again in a concluding paper, in which the results of these somewhat scattered reflections will be brought together. Meanwhile, the more we try to realise Paul's point of view, the more we see that anything like a "system of social ethics" is far away from his purpose. He did not really accept as permanent anything in the social order or disorder in the midst of which he lived. The things he recognises—such as slavery itself—are part of a world which will come to an end at no distant time, but its ending is in the hands of God alone. Hence, while he shows his instinctive feeling for the value of the moral and economic relations which seem natural to man—family, society, and state, labour and commerce—he is precluded from considering the organisation of these as lasting. His supreme concern is with a group of little communities which would not and could not have any direct political and economic influence on society and the State; and his "compromises with the world," such as we have illustrated, were made in order to save these communities from party strife and from revolutionary or anarchical dreams.

Let us realise, then, what Christendom was during the years immediately following the activity of Paul. We see many small congregations scattered over the Roman Empire, with no bond of organisation more than was absolutely necessary to keep order in a union based on supernatural expectations and brotherly love. They resembled what, from the modern point of view, might be described as "societies of religious devotees, separated from the world by a rigorous discipline and working on it only by a direct propaganda." They were scarcely intelligible to one man in a thousand; and in proportion to their enthusiasm for separation from the world and their eager expectation of its end, was their incapacity for saving and educating nations. Yet they possessed an inner life. The historical conditions under which they existed can be analysed; so can many of their expectations and beliefs; but the life defies analysis. We can only be sure that it sprang from the ideal revealed in Christ, recognised as their ideal; and that this was for them the one thing that gave any meaning to existence, and the one thing that made the coming world itself worth hoping for.

The life was thus in the world, but in no effective connection with it; and to get into touch with the world it must express itself in new forms.

SHORT NOTICE.

The Religion of Israel. By R. L. Ottley. The author calls this a historical sketch, and indicates that it is intended as a sequel to "A Short History of the Hebrews," published in 1901. As a sketch it has great merits, and is defended from the charge of being deficient in detail. It is clear and concise. The writer knows what he would be at, and is not feeling his way from step to step. Indeed, he makes it clear that he looks upon the religion of Israel from the point of view of its "consummation in Jesus Christ," and judges it accordingly. He may be justified in doing so, though no Jew would admit his contention; but it certainly ought to be possible to give an adequate view of the religion of Israel without setting up such a standard of comparison. This is the main criticism we have to make upon the book. We note with pleasure the author's recognition of the fact that deep personal piety could accompany that devotion to the Law for which Scribes and Pharisees have been so generally condemned. Of Rabbinical Judaism, however, Canon Ottley appears to know very little, and to know that little only at second hand. A writer who can say that "the oral tradition of the Scribes was finally fixed in the Mishna, c. 70 A.D." has much to learn before he can teach concerning the Rabbis. To most Christian readers, however, that will be a matter of little importance, and they can follow the writer in his earlier chapters without misgiving. On the whole, the book fulfils its promise, and gives an adequate picture in outline of the growth and development of the Jewish religion, at all events down to the time immediately preceding the appearance of Christianity: (Cambridge University Press. 4s.)

OBITUARY.

MRS. GEORGE BUCKTON.

AMONG the many mourners for Mrs. George Buckton, there are none who have felt a purer sorrow than the past and present students of Manchester College, and none, it may truly be said, whose hearts can offer a deeper sympathy to those most nearly touched by her death. Of the whole group of persons, who for the last quarter of a century have lived in and with the College, there is scarcely one who will not feel himself bereaved. It is no more than a week since the present writer, who is one of these students and knows that his own grief is the grief of all, was seated by the side of this gracious and venerable lady at the table where so many have felt her presence (may it be said ?) as a benediction; and as he thinks of the distant grave where she now lies and recalls the voice that is for ever still, he can truly say that her death "makes a difference to him." Who of us but knows full well how, for all these years, Mrs. Buckton has been an active and unobtrusive force in the inner life of Manchester College? In known, and still more in unknown, ways she has been a liberal benefactress to every phase of its work. A lover of all beautiful things, and especially of music, she gave to the College that noble organ whose mellow tones are like an echo of her own spirit; and there is many a worshipper in the College chapel who will often think of her when he is praising God. But, beyond this, she belonged to the higher genius of the place, fulfilling that part—so difficult to describe and so impossible to overvalue—which is unconsciously fulfilled for others by every pure and noble character, confirming their belief in goodness, and teaching lessons which are not written in any book, but without which all the learning in the world is useless dross. To every student recalling that ever hospitable house, round which so many bright memories of his college days are gathered, Mrs. Buckton has been and will remain an object of unqualified affection; and were it possible for him to disentangle the influences which have roused his better self he might have to confess a large debt to her. It is indeed, and has been, a great privilege to those whose work is the ministry of religion—and one not lightly esteemed by those now old enough to know its value—that among the memories of the years of preparation there should linger this picture of a serene and beautiful old age, of a spirit that grew more Christ-like amid the shadows, of a life whose final victory was in quietude and love—one of those good and gentle souls for whom, when the mighty are forgotten, the deepest thanks of the human heart will ever be offered before the throne of God. To lose such a presence from the College life is to lose one element of its higher education and the loss would be irreparable were it not part of the virtue of such souls to leave their successors behind them;

In the fulness of years, her faculties unimpaired, her affections fresh, her course finished, with no anticipations of parting, with no sadness of farewell, she accomplished the great Transition like a tired servant falling asleep, and what remains for us but to breathe the prayer, Sit mea anima cum illa:

THE REV. J. C. WOODS.

FROM Adelaide comes the news of the passing away, on Thursday, May 10, of the Rev. John Crawford Woods, B.A., who was the first Unitarian minister in South Australia. A native of Woodville, Bangor, Co. Down, where he was born in 1824, the son of the Rev. Hugh Woods, M.A., he graduated at Edinburgh and had a year's theological study at Belfast; he had also some medical training, and for a time was engaged in teaching. From 1848 to 1855 he ministered in this country, at Devonport, Northampton, Edinburgh, and Newport, I.W., and in the latter year went out to Adelaide. On the second Sunday in October, 1855, he conducted the first Unitarian service, as minister at Adelaide, and on July 5, 1857, the present church was opened. The church prospered under his care, and for 34 years, save for a break of two years when in 1874 he came home on a visit, and the Rev. C. L. Witham ministered at Adelaide, he continued his devoted services. In 1889, the condition of his health compelled his retirement, but his interest in the church remained vivid to the end. When the Rev. Charles Hargrove was in Australia two years ago, he and Mrs. Woods gave a large garden party in their grounds at Burnside, at which Mr. Witham and the Rev. John Reid, who has been minister at Adelaide since 1902, were also present. When on October 8, 1905, the jubilee of the church was celebrated, Mr. Woods sent an affectionate message by his successor to the congregation: "Tell them how dear they all are to me; how I think of them, how I love them all. I have long looked forward to this jubilee, though I scarcely hoped to see it. God's blessing rest upon them all, and on you."

MR. WILLIAM SMITH.

By the death of Mr. William Smith, suddenly on the 9th inst., in his 77th year, the congregation of Unitarians at Evesham has lost an attached member, and the town an enlightened servant of the public good. With no advantages of early education, since he was only 11 years of age when he entered a solicitor's office, Mr. Smith became a widely read man, and an exceedingly able writer. Professionally he was the trusted adviser and confidential friend of two generations of principals, and his ability and knowledge as a lawyer were recognised over a wide district. In matters connected with encroachments upon common rights and public footpaths he was especially interested, while up to the time of his death, he was taking active part in the movement for the restoration of the navigation of the upper Avon. "No work came to him amiss," writes one who knew him well, in his own paper, "but he was most completely in his element when engaged upon the task of repelling attacks upon popular interests." As a young man, Mr. Smith was offered his articles by a firm in a neighbouring town. For family reasons he declined. He was over 60 years of age when, with a courage which was the admiration of his friends, he qualified as a solicitor and in conjunction with a son established the local firm of Smith & Smith.

As secretary, and afterwards chai man of the Institute, and as chairman, until his death, of the Free Library Committee, Mr. Smith did eminent work for his native town, but his greatest and most widely reaching influence was exercised through the Evesham Journal, which, with a brother, he established in 1860, and which he edited for nearly half a century with conspicuous ability. Successful from the first, the Journal early took its place among the best of the local papers in the country, and now its influence covers a district of nearly 1,000 square miles. The high tone, independence and public spirit of the paper was established by its editor from the beginning, and continued until the end of his life. Every proposal thought to be for the public good received strong and loyal support from the Journal whether it was popular or not, and the ability of its editor's advocacy did much to bring about the most important improvements in Evesham during the last 50 years. In politics, although brought up in a Tory home, Mr. Smith was an ardent Liberal, but he never allowed his paper to become a mere party organ; it was, in the best sense, independent. Brought up as a churchman, Mr. Smith was for many years sympathetic with the Unitarian position, and during the last quarter of his life he was, as had been said, an attached member of our congregation. The great number of fellow townsmen, and of personal and business friends from far and near who attended the simple funeral, which was conducted by Revs. Rudolf Davis and G. L. Phelps, bore witness to the respect in which Mr. Smith was held and the sympathy felt with his widow and children.

MR. JOHN SMITH, CHOWBENT.

A WELL-KNOWN resident of Atherton, closely identified with the public life of the town for the past thirty years, died at Blackpool on Tuesday, June 12, after a very brief illness, from a paralytic seizure. Mr. John Smith, who was in his seventy-sixth year, was a native of Atherton, and served his apprenticeship as a mechanical engineer with Messrs. Mather & Platt. In 1858 he went out to South America to manage a cotton mill, and remained for twelve years. On his return to England, he retired from business, and for many years afterwards interested himself in the public affairs of his native town. He was elected to a seat on the Local Board, and did useful work on that body, filling successively the positions of chairman of the Finance Committee and Chairman of the Board. He was also an overseer, an office which he retained after his retirement from the Local Board, and indeed up to the time of his death. In politics, Mr. Smith was an ardent Liberal, and was a member of the local Reform Club for many years. He was a naturalist of no mean order, and during his residence in South America he made a most interesting collection of foreign birds, some of his specimens being honoured with a place in the British Museum. The funeral service, at the Atherton Cemetery, on Friday week, was conducted by the Rev. J. J. Wright, when there was a large and representative attendance.

ORESELINA.

A WEEK of soft rain at Locarno
Had heartened the Spring,
And the fountains of April were spouting
In every green thing.
We climbed to Madonna del Sasso,
That church on a rock
Where the Virgin appeared and the pilgrims
Religiously flock;
And thence to a point on the hillside
Whence vision could fly
Over river and plain, lake and upland
To mountain and sky.
At our feet-nestled heartscase and speedwell
With grass green as hope;
Young vineyards and snow-laden fruit trees
Drank sun on the slope.
The copse was as dappled as Autumn
But gloriously glad,
For the trees were contending with laughter
Which first should be clad.
Warm pink, like the limbs of a baby,
Were almonds in bloom;
Palms waved o'er magnolia and orange—
Its glow and its gloom.
How far we can trace the Ticino
Those poplar-tops through!
How gleams the great lake, deep and shallow,
In silver and blue!
From its edge swell the huge burly bastions
That bear the white peaks:
See the green gashed with brown jagged gorges
The waterfall streaks!
And o'er them, what depth in the heaven!
From this flowering sod
To the furthest faint cloudlet, all's beauty.
We stood praising God,
Who had made earth so awful, so splendid,
So lovely to scan—
When there groped his way past, slowly proffering
Foot and foot, a blind man.
So the beauty was marred by its Maker:
Unless there be twain,
One Power that makes gladness and pity,
One, author of pain.
Belief in the devil is easy
Where daily one sees Affronting God's sky and his mountains
Man's want and disease.
Thus wailed the old doubt.
But an answer
Came swift as the light
And if there be twain in contention
For which wilt thou fight?
Which built the keep Idle Repining?
Which shaped the Great Heart
That storms the grim gates of its dungeon
And hurls them apart?
Say rather, One Maker of all things
Saw good to create
The main for thy love and thy wonder,
But some for thy hate.
Hate manfully then, and strike boldly,
Be stout, heart and limb:
What thou canst redeem, up, redeem it—
The rest leave to Him.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT: VI.—THE WILL OF GOD.

If thought, will, and feeling are the necessary elements of personality, will holds the first place, for will controls both thought and feeling. Will is the centre of force; what a man wills, that is the man. Some day, perhaps, the foremost word in religion will be not so much God is love, as God is will. The self-willed man is little affected by the thought that God is love—for love does not always beget love—but will invariably command, respect; he pays his tribute to it; it is the thing that, being self-willed, he best understands. The will of God is the power that lies behind all things—known in the physical world as physical law, in the moral world as moral law, in the spiritual world as spiritual law. Let him embrace this will and self-will will go out of him, and the chief hindrance to love be removed. It is remarkable that in the Lord's Prayer the opening note of love passes at once into that of reverent obedience. The Church of the Future will be the Church of the Divine Will.

This will of God is much more something to be done than something to be borne. We are called upon to throw our wills into His will, to be active rather than passive, resolute rather than resigned, to be fellow-workers co-operative with Him in the fulfilment of His mind. The will of God would act through us, even more than on us, passing on its way to that which is of greater worth beyond.

Right willing with God is of more value, then, than right thinking about Him. And what is true of thought is true also of feeling. Just as, in time past, we have made too much of the intellectual, so we have also made too much of the emotional side of religion. The religious affections are undoubtedly a very necessary part. Worship without emotion would not be worship. With one feeling we praise and thank God, with another we confess our sins, with a feeling of insufficiency we pray for ourselves, with a feeling of sympathy we pray for others, with feelings of hope and joy we rise above experience, and have our part for a while in the exultant happiness of a realm unseen. But feeling, alas, is ever running into sentiment—feeling not really felt, but played and trifled with as a pleasing thought. Love to the neighbour, for instance, is rarely more than religious sentiment. True love depends, not upon what we liberally think or kindly wish, but upon what we positively will. What are we really willing that the neighbour should be, in his own interest, and on his own account? So with the love of God. What are sacrifice and offering, if we keep back the surrender of the will? It is the reproach of all religious bodies that their members are too often ready enough to indulge the play of thought and feeling, but stop short of all serious submission of the will.

God is will. Only by connection with that will can we fully live our own lives, and help forward the destiny of mankind. Vice and misery, and doubt and disquiet, and weariness of life are mostly results of want of will—that is to say, want of God's will. It is of the very essence of religion that we should find that supreme will, and act with it. Then we have a part in the saving, quickening process by which God fulfils His purpose and Himself; we share in the consummation of that divine order to which all things must be reduced before, even in His own world, He can be "all in all." B:

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

I HOPE that we shall get back to regular Children's Columns next week, after the crowd of meetings that had to be reported and took up so much room.

This week we can only have these few lines. On June 2 I reminded you of two poems by Longfellow, the "Village Blacksmith," and the other to the children about the Armchair, which they had given him, made of the wood of the "spreading chestnut tree." And here are some lines by another American poet, James Russell Lowell, from the prelude to his "Vision of Sir Launfal." I always like to remember them when we have beautiful summer days in June.

"What is so rare as a day in June?" the poet asks; for "Then, if ever, come perfect days." And then he tells of what there is in them.

"Every clod feels a stir of might,
An instinct within it that reaches and towers,
And, groping blindly above it for light,
Climbs to a soul in grass and flowers;
The flush of the life may well be seen
Thrilling back over hills and valleys;
The cowslip startles in meadows green
The buttercup catches the sun in its chalice,
And there's never a leaf nor a blade too mean

To be some happy creature's palace;
The little bird sits at his door in the sun,
Atilt like a blossom among the leaves,
And lets his illumined being o'er run
With the deluge of summer it receives;
* * * * *

Now is the high-tide of the year,
And whatever of life hath ebbd away
Comes flooding back with a ripply cheer,
Into every bare inlet and creek and bay;
Now the heart is so full that a drop over-fills it,
We are happy now because God wills it;
No matter how barren the past may have been,
'Tis enough for us now that the leaves are green;
We sit in the warm shade and feel right
well
How the sap creeps up and the blossoms swell;
We may shut our eyes, but we cannot help knowing
That skies are clear, and grass is growing;
* * * * *

Everything is happy now,
Everything is upward striving;
'Tis as easy now for the heart to be true
As for grass to be green or skies to be blue,

'Tis the natural way of living."
If you ever try to write poetry you must not make "palace" rhyme with "chalice," but if you can make a picture half as lovely as that of the little bird, at his door in the sun, "atilt like a blossom among the leaves," you may be quite happy!

THE SPRINGS OF INSPIRATION.

THREE months ago, in THE INQUIRER of March 17, we published an article by Dr. JOHN CAMPBELL, of Belfast, on "Religion and Morality," and the same motive prompted that address on "Practical Christianity the Need of the Age," which Dr. CAMPBELL was to have given at the public meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association in Whit-week, and of which we are glad here to publish the notes he had prepared.

It is significant that several of the points which Dr. CAMPBELL makes are strongly urged in the report of the Public Questions Committee of the Provincial Assembly of Lancashire and Cheshire, to which reference will also be found in our present issue; and its main contention was the burden of the Assembly sermon, preached by the Rev. CHARLES ROPER. If we remember how largely the proceedings of our National Conference at Oxford were devoted to a consideration of these same aspects of religious duty, we do but add to the evidence, which might be still further amplified, that in our churches the conviction is steadily growing in force that there can be no separation between religious and social duty; and we rejoice in this, because, as it seems to us, the hope of real progress in the life of our churches, and the confirming of religious faith as a victorious power in the world, is bound up with this conviction, that in doing the work of God's kingdom here on earth we are nearest to Him, and nearest to the sources of present inspiration through which alone we can have a sure and rejoicing knowledge of the truth. We may argue as we like about doctrine, and demonstrate quite convincingly, as we think, that the Unitarian is far superior to any other form of doctrine; but, unless we are doing the FATHER's will in the real things of our common daily life, neither we nor our churches will be any the better for that. It may minister to the conceit of superior wisdom, but it will not feed hungry souls, nor help in the least to establish the living power of Divine truth in the world. And so we hope that those who are out on the mission of the Unitarian Van are bearing in mind the ideal which Mr. SPEDDING from the first set before his comrades, that there shall be "a brotherhood that speaks for God and man in the strength of JESUS," that it may be a message of life, that kindles life, which is being delivered.

Our chief concern as Unitarians, Mr. LUMMIS told the Swiss Conference of Liberal Christians at Chur the other day, is not to secure a victory for our name or our own opinions, but to deepen and clarify religious thought and feeling, to extend pure and free religion, to encourage brotherhood, righteousness, and peace. And as we are chiefly concerned for brotherhood, righteousness, and peace, sharing in a common work with all men, of whatever church, who care for those essential things and are working for them, the true bearing of our doctrine of life, of God and His kingdom will become most manifest, and best win its way in the world. We shall commend the truth to every man's conscience, much more by what we are and what we do, than by what we say about our beliefs.

Dr. CAMPBELL pleads very earnestly that the churches must work for the moral elevation of the people, and we are entirely at one with him in that. But as to the right method of work there may be different opinions. We cannot think that the right method is for every church to have its own separate organisations for various efforts of social amelioration, but that, as far as possible, all should work together in common effort for the common good. Thus it is far better that all the churches should send working recruits into the ranks of the great temperance army than that each church should have its own separate society. And we do not want denominational day-nurseries, or pension funds, or societies for the prevention of cruelty or the promotion of thrift, if it can be helped. Nor do we share Dr. CAMPBELL's regret that a town council should take up such work. The part of the churches is to be the inspiration of such true citizen endeavours. It is a sign of weakness rather than of strength in our common life if such efforts have to be left to the separate churches. And we must again demur to Dr. CAMPBELL's view that we as a denomination "alone among recognised religious bodies can lead the way." Many members of other churches have, we believe, as strong a hold as we upon the true doctrine of practical godliness.

What we have to aim at is simply a strenuous faithfulness in our own place of duty, that shall keep our men in the front rank of good citizenship, and our churches as centres of inspiration for all beneficent work.

If we would believe in God, and have deeper knowledge of His truth, we must be doing His work in the world. If we would enter into the secret of JESUS, and be Christian in deed and in truth, it must be through an active and most practical spirit of self-sacrifice and a genuine brotherly love.

PRACTICAL CHRISTIANITY THE NEED OF THE AGE.*

BY JOHN CAMPBELL, M.D.

AFTER nineteen hundred years of Christianity there are in this, the most Christian country in the world, many terrible blots on the social page which our existing religious organisations seem incapable of removing.

(1) Infant Mortality is one of them: Religious training has failed to influence many people as regards the very elements of parental duty, and has left many a mother with feelings less lofty than those of the untutored savage. Parents' wilful self-indulgence and culpable want of thought are far more destructive of child-life than the hardships of honest poverty. The religious organisations have failed to teach those who have been reared within their bounds the merest rudiments of practical Christianity; and, as a consequence, City Corporations have to step in and provide the instruction which should have been given through the churches. It is a sad sight to see the church leaving its sacred work to be done by secular bodies like the Corporation of Huddersfield. What a fine opportunity there is for us to do Christian service in this matter alone.

(2) Cruelty to Children is another terrible scandal in a Christian land. Were this a country Christian in anything but in name would we need a Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children? Were our people inspired in ever so slight a degree with the spirit of Christ would we have the villainies for which Child Insurance is to some extent responsible, so prevalent as they are?

(3) The Divorce Court is becoming year by year more popular in this country, and the reports of its proceedings pollute the pages of our newspapers. Should these cases occur as frequently as they do if Christian morality existed in even a minor degree? Numerous as are the cases which get publicity through the courts they represent but a tithe of the evil which exists even among those who pass as members of the Christian Church.

(4) The Decline of the Birth-Rate is another evidence of the low level of social morality. The philosopher may try to explain it in other ways but the fact remains that the declining birth-rate at the present time is but the outward manifestation of a whole host of social evils, which are rife among the better classes of society and are practised by people of education and intelligence who are quite up to the average in matters of conventional religion: The declining birth-rate is, to a large extent, the result of vice, and of disease born of vice, and it is a remarkable fact that it is most pronounced amongst those classes of the community who have had the best opportunities of getting religious training.

* Notes of an Address, which Dr. Campbell, of Belfast, intended to deliver (but was prevented by a professional engagement) at the public meeting of the British and Foreign Unitarian Association at Essex Hall, on Wednesday evening, June 6.

(5) Commercial Morality is capable of great improvement.

(6) The great evil of Intemperance holds sway over thousands brought up in all the traditions of popular religion. For its abatement it has been necessary to form societies outside all religious bodies and, in some communities, such as Glasgow, the intervention of civil authority has been required.

(7) Our Workhouses are a standing disgrace to us. Did every religious body look after its own poor and aged, few well-conducted people would find themselves in the degrading atmosphere of the workhouse.

All these evils, and others, flourish in spite of dogmatic religious teaching. Are they to be allowed to go on without some attempt being made to check them by more effectual means? Now, in view of the fact that the popular system of religious teaching has been in use for fifteen hundred years, and that in spite of it so much remains to be done to make the country really Christian, what is our duty?

We may take it for granted that the larger denominations have done their best and are doing their best. Whatever their results may be there is no doubt that they have conscientiously and earnestly endeavoured to improve the lives and characters of their people. Failure to do so has not been due to lack of energy or ability or self-sacrifice on the part of the workers. They have done the best that their system permitted them to do. Working on what is fundamentally the system of Roman Catholicism it is impossible that the Reformed Churches should produce anything but imperfect results. They are handicapped by a system which makes belief in religious theories all-important, and thus unintentionally belittles the Christian value of conduct and character. Recognising this, our duty is to attack the problem of evil in the direct way shown forth in the Gospels: to inculcate on mankind the great truth that it is conduct and not profession which is the true evidence of Christian belief and Christian faith.

How can we best do this? A little attention to the position of the great churches of Christendom at once convinces me that while they are somewhat impotent as moral forces they are very powerful as social and political influences. Their power they owe to their organisation, while their weakness is due to the principles upon which they are organised. Our business is, then, to adopt what is good in their constitution and reject what is useless or harmful. Hitherto we have been working without any definite plan of action, and our influence, though considerable, had not been so great or so widespread as it ought to be. Having recognised that character and conduct are the only true evidences of Christian faith, we have been unable to get this truth generally accepted, because our want of union and co-ordination have stood in the way. Under existing arrangements we are unable to do more than finger the fringe of religious problems. Our isolated congregations have but small circles of influence.

Our associations and assemblies are religious debating societies rather than the co-ordinating centres of a great church. We want some form of good organisation to make our work more effectual. We require to unite our congregations under some democratic form of Church government.

We can do this without in any way infringing our liberty of conscience. Men differ as to articles of intellectual religious belief, but they do not materially differ in their ideas of right and wrong; in other words, of Christian and un-Christian conduct.

Let us maintain our freedom of intellect; but let us, at the same time, proclaim ourselves bound by the definite moral standard laid down by Christ. Let us unite for the purpose of teaching men that salvation is to be sought in doing the will of God as set forth in the New Testament. Let us for this purpose seek all the advantages which organisation gives to other churches and avoid the disadvantages of their creeds and confessions.

If we do this we shall be in a position to lead the way in reforms. We shall be able to show that Christianity and social reformation are identical; that the moral elevation of the people is the best way to fit them for eternal salvation and is the great end for which Christ lived and died; and that it is the duty of the churches to work for this end, rather than to allow their work to drift into the hands of town councils and other civil authorities. Practical Christianity will appeal to the masses in a way in which mediæval religion can never do, and will teach the classes that mere conventional religion is not Christianity unless it results in good conduct and good character.

Some of you may object that this movement for a social reformation is not particularly our duty. I confidently assert that it is. We alone among recognised religious bodies can lead the way. The great churches are bound to work on the old lines in the future as they have done in the past. Their failure with the masses of the people as well as with the more educated classes has been due to their exaltation of the value of abstract faith over that of practical godliness. They have obscured the end at which they aimed by the cumbrous means on which they depend to attain that end. They must continue to do so unless a complete revolution in religious matters takes place. If we will not take up the work there is no existing body able to do so. We have led the way to intellectual freedom in religion. Let us now go on as pioneers in the work of establishing the Universal Church of Christ. This can only be done on the lines that he himself has laid down, namely, the adoption of a common standard of righteousness of life. The Roman Catholic system of aiming at a universal standard of belief has failed not only to give us a bond of union but also to promote personal holiness. It has been imitated more or less closely by the great majority of the Protestant churches, and in their hands it has failed to an even greater extent. Hope for the future lies in a church founded on a truly Protestant principle—in a church based upon what I may call a "moral creed."

Practical Christianity is the need of the age, and practical Christianity now means the provision, by the leaders of the religious denominations, of day nurseries which shall be managed by congregations in those districts in which they are required. In these nurseries the children of poor women who are connected with the congregation, and who have to earn their livelihood, would be cared for and fed and taught during the working part of the day for a nominal payment by the father or mother. These nurseries would also be centres for diffusing knowledge as to the rearing of children, and would go far to decrease infant mortality.

Practical Christianity now means the provision by each denomination of an old age pension fund for those of its adherents who have been unable to provide for ill health or old age, and who at present have to sink to the workhouse. Practical Christianity now means the prevention of cruelty to children, the condemnation of all that makes the divorce court necessary, the encouragement of early marriage, the discouragement of belief in the "gospel of comfort," the promotion of commercial integrity, and the elimination of intemperance.

In this age these things can be best done by the denominations, and it is our duty to set the example by doing them for our own people.

I ask you to associate yourselves together for the purpose of proclaiming your belief that man's place in eternity depends above all things on his character and conduct in this world. I ask you definitely to state that belief in Scriptural phrases, in order that you may influence your fellow-men to follow Christ. I ask you to remember that every well-regulated society requires certain specified rules for its government. I ask you to observe that ecclesiastical organisation undoubtedly leads to great success in certain directions, and that that success would be complete if the fundamental principles were right.

The fault lies not in the organisation but in the foundation on which it is built up: I implore you as true disciples of Christ to organise your forces that you may more effectually work in the vineyard of the Lord.

If we cannot find God in your house or mine, upon the road-side or the margin of the sea; in the bursting seed or opening flower; in the day-duty and the night-musing; in the genial laugh, and the secret grief; in the procession of life, ever entering afresh, and solemnly passing by and dropping off; I do not think we should discern Him any more on the grass of Eden, or beneath the moonlight of Gethsemane. Depend upon it, it is not the want of greater miracles, but of the soul to perceive such as are allowed us still, that makes us push all the sanctities into the far spaces we cannot reach. The devout feel that wherever God's hand is, there is miracle; and it is simply an indeavour which imagines that only where miracle is, can there be the real hand of God.—James Martineau.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE.

ANNUAL MEETINGS.

PADIHAM is about to celebrate its centenary. The little "Cookite" movement of a hundred years ago has grown into a large flourishing church, and the interest in its centenary is widespread. Although somewhat inaccessible, the Provincial Assembly gladly accepted an invitation to meet at Padiham this year in order to show its sympathy with the friends there. The meetings, held last week, were in every way as successful and enjoyable as ever. The large and beautiful church was crowded at each of the three gatherings, and the tone of the meetings was optimistic, while all the local arrangements for the comfort of visitors were everything one could wish for.

The main function of the Provincial is to bring together representatives of the churches in annual conference. To this end it issues an annual review of the missionary enterprise of the province and a report on public questions, and these form the basis of the subsequent discussions in the assembly. The former is issued this year in a new and much improved form, showing at a glance the position of missionary work in the province. Apparently it is just now struggling in the trough of financial difficulty. Of enterprise, initiative and zeal, there is ample evidence, but everywhere there is the same need of more money. Two new preaching stations have been opened, while two others have attained their financial majority and independence of outside help. The Home Missionary College Jubilee Fund and the "Unitarian Van" are also claimed as witnessing to the enterprise of the province.

SOCIAL QUESTIONS.

The report on social questions is an important document, dealing in minute detail with some of the most urgent of contemporary questions. The first subject dealt with is that of the Poor Law. While acknowledging recent improvements in some directions, and especially commending the work of lady guardians, the report deplores "the machine-like officialism, as generally worked, of the Poor Law system," and regards the "hatred and terror with which it is, for the most part, viewed by the people for whose benefit it exists," as its "severest condemnation." The great present need, the report holds, is "the necessity of classifying carefully the various cases of destitution and distress which at present are all dealt with by the same law, and practically in the same way." It calls for the extension of the powers of the Distress Committees, the development of the Labour Bureaus, the establishment of penal colonies for those who will not work, and the provision of Old Age Pensions and the Hospital System for the aged and sick.

The next subject dealt with is that of Infant Mortality, which the report regards as a matter for anxious consideration. While the general death rate is steadily falling, the infant death rate tends to rise. Among the adverse influences affecting the health of the mother and the life of the child are the employment of women in factories, improper feeding and management, overcrowding and insanitary conditions generally. The report affirms "that, by the judicious and systematic teaching of hygiene in elementary schools, by the employment of women health visitors, by the judicious weeding out of ignorant and ill-educated midwives, by better housing and less overcrowding, a very large reduction could be effected."

After "Infant Mortality" comes the question of "Hooliganism," hardly an example of the "survival of the fittest." The question is discussed with sympathy and knowledge, but the conclusion that "Canada is the Canaan for these boys" is hardly an inspiring one.

The Education Question naturally comes in for very full treatment. The report declaring that "for the introduction of the Education Bill no one is responsible save the denominationalists themselves. It is the inevitable sequel to the Act of 1902. Mr. Balfour and his allies sowed the wind, and they have reaped the whirlwind. Of their marvellous débâcle at the late general election one of the governing causes was the just Nonconformist indignation, combined with a more widespread disgust, at the Education Act of 1902. Whatever else the new majority, wielding in its might a moral power that will take no denial, it stands for the control by the ratepayers of schools supported by the rates, and for the abolition of religious tests for teachers whose entire salaries are paid out of public money. Practically every British member of the new majority went to Parliament with a mandate for 'a policy of thorough' in this matter, and even its bitterest opponents could expect nothing less. Instead, however, of having reason to complain, the ecclesiastical assailants of the Bill have been treated by the Government with a consideration that strains to the utmost the conscience of many of their supporters. Complete popular control, indeed, is established under the measure, and the dual systems in that respect, is to receive the coup de grace. So far so good. But whether religious tests for teachers, although abolished in the Bill, will not survive de facto is to be gravely questioned. As regards public management, the measure is complete, and fulfils the national mandate; but, as regards the education to be given, it is difficult to acquit it of endangering the position. In 1870 Mr. Forster, while establishing with one hand the splendid Board School system, with the other gave new life to the old Voluntary and Denominational system by adding 50 per cent. to the Government grants, and by continuing to give building grants for a term of years for the erection of new voluntary schools. That fatal policy has landed us where we are to-day; it should not be repeated. But this Bill repeats it, and if carried in its present form, with the four-fifths clause, it will re-establish denominationalism, and long render vain the hope of the national system which might now be within the nation's reach."

THE RELIGIOUS SERVICE.

As is usual the day commenced with a religious service. In the regrettable absence of the elected supporter, the Rev. John Moore, the service was conducted by the Rev. W. G. CADMAN, of Macclesfield; and the preacher was the Rev. CHARLES

ROPER, of London. Taking his text from Isaiah xl. 3-5, Mr. Roper pleaded for an "accentuation of the practical side of our religion." A genuine revival would prove our salvation. But it must reach the head as well as the heart. Emotion alone does not save a man. Not that orthodox revivals have done no good; any appeal that makes a man a more sober citizen, a kinder husband, a better parent, if only for a month, has some virtue in it. But the revival most needed is not a revival of antiquated beliefs, nor a regalanising of the dead bones of obsolete theologies; not a reaffirmation of old dogmas and creeds or a making of new ones; not even "back to Jesus" in the ordinary sense of that phrase; but a fuller faith in God, in justice, in righteousness, and in human possibilities. Unfortunately revivals often tend to make men morbid, selfish, and self-satisfied. We do not want men and women to segregate themselves from this wicked world with the idea that by private prayer and penance they can make themselves acceptable to God and ensure for themselves salvation in a future world. We want a revival which shall send men and women not merely to the penitent form, and not merely make them pray and sing, but which shall drive them by an irresistible impelling inward force of love and sympathy and holy ambition into the humanising work of the world; to infuse righteous principles into all business transactions; to direct civic energies towards the sweeping away of our slums, the brightening of the environment of the poor, the better and truer education of their children, the payment of nothing less than a living wage to any man willing to work, the control of the drink traffic, the denunciation of laws and customs which in the least degree wink at any form of vice whatsoever. These things, unfortunately, are secondary in most revivals; but how changed the world would be if for once they came first! In earnest terms Mr. Roper proceeded to trace the consequences of such a revival as he had pictured in both national and municipal affairs, maintaining that the best inspiration towards it was to be found in the Unitarian position. He could not, therefore, understand any hesitancy in missionary enterprise where such glorious possibilities were involved. He pleaded for more loyalty and enthusiasm. Over and over again the life of the world had been renewed by enthusiasts who at the outset were derided as madmen. Would that we might be in such deadly earnest that people would point the finger at us and call us "madmen," instead of which they call us "cold," "self-satisfied." Of course it is not true, but alas that it should be possible even to allege it. Could they not set themselves to make it for ever impossible to charge coldness against them again? In their history, ancestry, and ideals they had all the necessary inspiration. Would they not resolve to supply the zeal, devotion, and enthusiasm?

At the close of the service luncheon was served to a company of about three hundred persons.

BUSINESS MEETING.

The PRESIDENT, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, took the chair at the afternoon business meeting, and in his address alluded to the fact that the congregation at Padi-ham had this year completed one hundred years of its history. He referred to the early devoted labours of the "Unitarian Methodists," Joseph Cooke, John Robinson, and James Pollard, who, through the simple study of the Scriptures, found their way to a broader and more spiritual faith. On this he founded an argument in favour of simple moral and religious lessons, based on the noblest passages of Scripture, to be taught in every elementary school in the land by the regular school staff within school hours. If that should eventually prove unacceptable to the nation there would be nothing for it but secular education at the cost of the State, with right of entry for the various denominations after or before school hours with optional attendance. But the former alternative, already accepted by the nation, he greatly preferred. In concluding his address the President referred to changes in the Province, expressing his deep sympathy with the relations and congregation of the late Rev. R. C. Moore, who had recently passed away. He paid a high tribute to the character and work of Mr. Moore at Horwich, and further expressed his sympathy with the Rev. John Moore in his enforced absence. The Treasurer's report having been read and approved, the result of the election to the several offices was announced as follows:—President, Mr. Richard Robinson; treasurer, Mr. John Dendy; secretaries, Revs. H. E. Dowson and Travers Herford. The members of the Advisory Committee were all re-elected, and the Rev. T. Lloyd Jones was elected supporter.

Mr. RICHARD ROBINSON moved the adoption of the Report on Public Questions, calling special attention to the sections dealing with the Poor Law and infant mortality, which he described as matters vital to the national welfare. The Rev. A. W. Fox seconded, and the report was adopted after a few words from Mr. David Healey and Major Coppock, both of whom somewhat resented the severity of the terms in which the administration of the Poor Law was referred to.

The Education Question formed the subject of a separate resolution. This was proposed by the Rev. H. E. Dowson, and it hailed with pleasure the introduction of the Government Bill, but regretted the inclusion of Clause 4, which was inconsistent with its main principles. The resolution further affirmed that the teaching given by the teachers on the staff should be limited to secular subjects, but that a right of entry should be given, out of school hours, for religious instruction.

Mr. Dowson said the Bill was intended to deal with the religious difficulty, of which they were all sick to death. If the Bill would rid them of that difficulty he should be strongly tempted to accept the whole of it. But he thought Mr. Birrell had gone to the utmost verge of concession. While, personally, he would like to see a truly national system set up, he was willing for the sake of peace to make concessions to the denominationalists. "We want schools that shall be civil institutions: we don't want nurseries of the Church supported by rates and taxes."

The Rev. CHARLES PEACH, who seconded the resolution, suggested the alteration of the words "so as to confer a right of entry," to "so as to give the use of buildings." He expressed his amazement at the failure of the Government and Liberal members of Parliament to act up to their professions. They were, in his opinion, too timid, too anxious to placate people who would not be placated. He never expected such a surrender as the Bill indicated. The Bill seemed to get worse in Committee, and he was alarmed at the ominous "agreement" between Mr. Birrell and the Irish Home Rule Party. He looked upon the Bill as more reactionary than Mr. Balfour's Bill itself.

A discussion followed in which the Revs. W. Harris, H. B. Smith, and S. Thompson, Major Coppock, and Mr. T. F. Robinson took part. The discussion turned, in the main, on the proposed facilities in the shape of a right of entry out of school hours. The whole of the Assembly apparently was agreed in condemning the fourth clause. Eventually, the resolution was unanimously adopted without any reference to facilities for religious teaching.

The Missionary Report was adopted on the motion of the Revs. J. A. Pearson and Charles Roper, the latter suggesting that the accumulated funds of the Assembly might be spent in equipping more "Unitarian Vans," since it had been proved that there was a fine work to be done that way. Mr. Pearson, however, wished to devote the money to the Jubilee Fund of the Home Missionary College. The Rev. W. L. Schroeder moved a resolution to bring the Domestic Missions into subsequent reports, and the Assembly adopted it, as also the proposal to have an Assembly Stall at the Manchester District Association's Bazaar next year. Hearty greetings were ordered to be sent to the Peace Congress sitting in Birmingham, and the meeting came to a close.

THE PUBLIC MEETING.

After tea a public meeting was held in the chapel, Mr. T. WADDINGTON being in the chair. A vote of thanks passed to the Padiham friends was acknowledged by Mr. David Harrison.

The Rev. J. E. MANNING delivered an address on "Unitarianism as seen from Without and Within." Mr. Manning had written to representatives of various phases of religious thought to ask for their views on Unitarianism. He had received replies from all except the representatives of Roman Catholicism, and quoted largely from his correspondents. There was singularly little that was fresh in the opinions expressed. There were the same old complaints about coldness and want of missionary enterprise, and other familiar criticisms with which Mr. Manning dealt in an effective manner.

Mr. C. SYDNEY JONES, of Liverpool, spoke on the training of children and young people. He said the tendency of the discussion of elementary education must be to take religion out of the day school and to make the Sunday-school of far greater importance. The social and recreative activities of the Sunday-school should also receive sympathetic and careful treatment in these days, when so many young people had to live away from home and had to look to the Church and Sunday-school for guidance and friendship in their otherwise empty lives.

A third address, by the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson, on "The Churches and Social Questions," owing to lack of time was not delivered.

YORKSHIRE UNITARIAN UNION.

ANNUAL MEETING.

The Twenty-third Annual Meeting of the Union was held at Halifax on Wednesday, June 13.

At the business meeting in the school-room of the Northgate End Chapel, in the afternoon, the President, Mr. HENRY LUPTON, of Leeds, took the chair. The report of the Committee was read by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin, hon. secretary, and the Rev. John Ellis read his report as District Minister.

The report welcomed the opening of the new school-church at Attercliffe and the accession of the West Bowling Mission, Bradford, and its minister, the Rev. W. Rosling, to the Union. It spoke of the helpfulness of the visits paid by officers of the Union to congregations and of the magazine Unity, which was regularly circulated. The ministerial changes were noted, and were the subject of a special resolution later in the meeting. Mr. Ellis noted a growing sense of fellowship in the district, and after telling of the continuance of the services at Barnsley announced a series of summer services to be held at Harrogate from July 22 to September 9.

Mr. G. E. VERITY, the treasurer, presented the balance sheet. This showed the receipts to include £142 4s. 9d. from collections, as compared with £105 7s. 11d. last year, and £84 3s. 8d. twenty years ago; the subscriptions were £122 14s., as compared with £131 7s. 2d. last year, and £308 11s. 4d. twenty years ago. The amount received from the British and Foreign Unitarian Association was £175, as compared with £138 6s. 8d. last year, and £48 15s. twenty years ago. The total receipts for the year amounted to £892, and the expenditure was £847 17s., as against £671 19s. last year, and £493 twenty years ago. The increased expenditure was largely due to the carrying on of the work of the district minister. The amount in the hands of the trustees was £2,111 5s. 9d., but the committee had placed grants amounting to £250 which had not been applied for, so there was £1,861 5s. 9d. available for allocation.

The PRESIDENT, in moving the adoption of the report and accounts, said the year had been the most eventful they had had for the past 20 or 30 years, being marked by the building of a new place of worship in a new district. The resolution was seconded by Miss BROWN, and unanimously adopted.

On the motion of the Rev. W. H. EASTLAKE, seconded by Mr. F. CLAYTON, the officers were thanked for their services and re-elected, Mr. Grosvenor Talbot's name being added to the list of Vice-presidents.

A cordial vote of thanks to the lay-preachers for their devoted services, moved by the Rev. J. ELLIS and seconded by the Rev. J. S. MATHERS, was acknowledged by Mr. T. G. TURTON of Sheffield.

At 3.30 a religious service was held in the Northgate End Chapel, conducted by the Rev. P. E. Richards, the sermon being preached by the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas, of Nottingham, from the text John iv. 24.

PUBLIC MEETING.

In the evening a public meeting was held. Mr. R. E. NICHOLSON, of Halifax was in the chair, and in welcoming the Union to Halifax, said it was 14 years since their previous visit. To an outsider the Unitarian Union did not seem to have made very extensive or rapid progress, but it would be difficult to analyse and measure the amount of progress it had made. The spread of Unitarian doctrines had been wide, and they seemed to have advanced into something more rational than the doctrines which were formerly believed in. The spread of truth, he was inclined to think, was from the force of truth which commended itself to all open minds. Men's minds were really more open now than they used to be. The objects of the Union were very plain and simple; the promotion of intercourse between the various churches in Yorkshire and the assisting of poorer congregations. They appreciated the kindly expressed wish of the Union to visit Halifax once more during the respected pastorate of Mr. Millson. In that mark of esteem the congregation was in entire agreement, for no congregation held its minister in higher esteem than they did at Northgate End, and no congregation had a more tender affection for its minister. Mr. Millson had been with them 34 years, and had given them so much of his time and thought and work that he had been like a father to his congregation. Concluding, the Chairman proposed a vote of thanks to the Rev. J. M. Lloyd Thomas for his sermon in the afternoon.

Mr. E. B. STOTT seconded, and the resolution was agreed to, Mr. THOMAS suitably replying.

MR. MILLSON'S LONG SERVICE.

The Rev. C. HARGROVE, proposed "that this Union expresses its high appreciation of the long and faithful ministries of the Rev. F. E. Millson, who has had charge of the Northgate End congregation, Halifax, since 1872, and will shortly retire from the pastorate; and the Rev. John Fox, who ministered to the congregation of Hunslet since 1886 and resigned his charge at the end of March last. The Union wishes for these gentlemen many years of real happiness and well-earned rest. The good wishes of the union also go with the Rev. W. Mellor, who will shortly resign his pastorate at Fitzwilliam-street Church, Huddersfield, which he has held since 1898, and to the Revs. H. Dawtrey and F. H. Vaughan who after brief ministries in the county have accepted appointments at Higher Broughton and Mansfield respectively. This union also gives a cordial welcome to the Revs. A. Amey, W. Rosling, J. Ruddle, and R. H. Greaves, who have recently taken charge of the congregations at Pudsey, West Bowling, Stannington, and York respectively." Mr. Hargrove remarked that outside of Halifax there was no one in the county who had known Mr. Millson so long or so well as he had. His ministry had been a faithful one, he had truly been what every minister should be—their servant. He had set them all an example by also being a citizen of this town, and showing them what a citizen should be and do for the place in which he lived. Their good wishes went with Mr. Millson, and they trusted that in his old age he might find much happiness and peace and rest.

The Rev. W. R. SHANKS seconded the resolution, which was cordially adopted.

The Rev. F. E. MILLSON, in acknowledgment, said it was impossible for him to speak in adequate terms of the kindness which the resolution showed. If he had been in any sense what he really had tried to be (useful, and a fairly good minister) the explanation might be found in this; he had been the minister of a very good group of workers. He found a very good tradition there when he came; he found some young people who were beginning to work, and who had stuck to the work and done it admirably ever since. A minister could really do very little if the congregation did not back him up, not merely by their kindness, but by taking their own share in the work. He had had his work wonderfully lightened by the habit the congregation had grown into of taking its share of the work. If there was anything he had grieved over it was what every minister grieved over—that a congregation was not all workers, but in the congregation at Northgate End he believed they had the larger proportion who were workers. He believed they had sent some five or six students to the colleges since he was minister, which showed they had had thoughtful and studious young people. A great deal of the success of a congregation depended upon that. Concluding, he said he would have had to resign his work nearly four years ago if it had not been that he had the good fortune to secure so capable and in every way so satisfactory an assistant as he had in Mr. Richards. He did not know where Mr. Richards' lot might be cast, but there was the making in him of a very rich ministry to any congregation.

The Rev. W. MELLOR and the Rev. W. ROSLING also replied.

The CHAIRMAN offered a hearty welcome to the Representatives of Kindred Societies, and brief speeches in reply were delivered by Rev. J. A. Pearson (Manchester District Association), and Rev. H. B. Smith (East Cheshire Christian Union).

The Rev. T. P. SPEDDING (Rochdale) proposed "That this meeting, while welcoming the provisions of the Education Bill introduced by Mr. Birrell which are designed to place all rate-aided schools under public control and to secure teachers against the imposition of ecclesiastical and theological tests, regrets that the Bill perpetuates the State endowment of religious instruction; and declares its conviction that only secular education should be paid for by public money." He was, he said, losing heart and interest in the education question as it was being dealt with by the present Government. They ought first of all to be just before generous. It was a great pity that Mr. Birrell, instead of stiffening his back, rather suggested he had got no grit about him, and that he was not prepared to stand to even the moderate proposals he had made. When would they, he asked, be able to restore the old position in the sense of a truly national education which had an opportunity of being free from the domination of the sects? There would then be something to fight for. In the present Bill there was nothing to fight for.

Mr. F. G. JACKSON seconded the resolution. Secular education, if they studied it closely and thoughtfully, would be found to be the only way out of the Educational difficulty.

The Rev. W. MELLOR rose to defend the resolution until it touched the secular question. Here, he disagreed. The secular position, he said, was quite out of the question in so far as the national education of this country was concerned. The people were against it by an overwhelming majority. He did not think it was to the credit of this nation to say that it could not agree upon some simple method of giving religious instruction in connection with their day schools. Personally, he held that the schools of this country should be conducted in the name and spirit of religion, and that religion should be distinctly recognised in one shape or another. "I am wholly against a purely secular education," he said as a final protest against the resolution, "but I am not prepared to move an amendment."

It was pointed out that the resolution was an exact copy of one adopted by the National Conference at Oxford.

The resolution was then put and carried without dissent.

Votes of thanks to the Northgate End Congregation for their hospitality, and to the Chairman for presiding, brought a very successful meeting to a close.

CARE OF THE FEEBLE MINDED.

THE INCORPORATED LANCASHIRE AND CHESHIRE SOCIETY FOR THE PERMANENT CARE OF THE FEEBLE-MINDED.

SIR,—May I ask your kind attention for the advertisement I sent for insertion in the INQUIRER this week? It has come to our knowledge that there are many children of defective intellect whose parents, while able to pay something for their support, are not able to find the fee which is generally asked for such cases as these. We have therefore set aside Warford Hall for boys who are to be received at a charge of sixty guineas a year. The school will be under the Board of Education, and will, I hope, be as great a success as those we are already conducting.

You have always been so good to us (you and your readers), that I am about to ask a favour again. Will you let me make it known to our friends that we want several things at Sandlebridge? Item: a piano for the new house. It will be opened directly. Item: any amount of clean old clothes. It is surprising how my children wear their clothes out; and if we can get old ones for everyday wear it lessens our clothing account very much. Item: (but this I am almost afraid to mention) a pony and trap. We have stabling now, but have so many large things to buy, for the farm and the garden, that it will be a long time

I fear, before we shall feel justified in spending money on these two very desirable things. If only someone would give us a nice steady pony, and someone else a nice strong trap, the saving of labour for some of us would be very great.

Hon. Sec.

MARTINEAU NOTES.

SIR,—I am glad Mr. Pike is making inquiries concerning the connection of Charles Dickens with the Little Portland-street Chapel. When in London during Whit-week I asked some friends who were likely to know the facts, and their opinion is that Dickens ceased to be an attendant before Mr. Martineau began his London ministry. The statement I made in my little biography has been made before, and I had not come across any contradiction of it.

In your criticism of June 2 it is stated:—"Then as to the Dublin settlement, if the invitation had been to become at once co-pastor with the Rev. Joseph Hutton the question of the Regium Donum would have had to be faced at the outset. Our impression is that Martineau went as assistant to his aged relative, Philip Taylor (though with all the work to do), and only became actually co-pastor with Mr. Hutton on the death of the senior pastor."

The point at issue is important, and after very careful consideration I came to the conclusion (1) that Martineau on accepting the invitation was imperfectly acquainted with the nature of Regium Donum (vide "Life," by Carpenter, p. 77); and (2) that between 1828 and 1831 the Eustace-street Chapel had three ministers, Taylor, Hutton, and Martineau. Taylor did not cease to be minister on Martineau's appointment (which was made by the congregation (vide "Life," by Drummond, p. 51), but he retired from active duty. This explains why the question of Donum had not to be faced at the outset. The Rev. Alexander Gordon has kindly furnished me with some valuable notes which will clear up the difficulty. "Only two recipients of Donum were allowed at most in any one congregation. As Taylor and Hutton had Donum (for life) Martineau could not have it till one of them had died. His position was 'colleague and successor' to Taylor in the ministry. 'Co-pastor' is quite correct, though not an 'Irish term'; neither is 'pastor' in use, though 'pastoral charge' is. . . . One Donum was allowed to one congregation ordinarily. Dublin Unitarians got two, because there were two congregations. A very few congregations had collegiate charges, entitling to two grants of Donum; at the moment I only recollect two instances of this, both in the North."

My two tasks in the little book were condensation and simplicity, and I decided that the words "co-pastor with the Rev. Joseph Hutton," the other active minister, would describe Mr. Martineau's position in the clearest and briefest way.

THE PUBLIC-HOUSE TRUST.

SIR,—It is most discouraging to some of us who are doing our best in carrying out the scheme of "The Public House Trust Association" to find that at the annual meeting of the National Unitarian Temperance Association, a resolution was carried to the effect that the promised measure of temperance reform should withhold "the option of disinterested management or the municipalisation of the drink traffic." "Unanswerable evidence" is said to have been given at the meeting in question of "the failure of the various management schemes," but no particulars of that evidence are given. Undoubtedly that association has uphill work, and the Act of 1904 has made it more difficult, but I hope that every person interested will send to the secretary (15, Dean's-yard, Westminster, S.W.) for a copy of the fifth report up to December 31, 1905, by which he will see what has been done, and what is going on at the present time.

It is quite true that the Surrey Trust, of which I am a director, has not yet paid a dividend; but our chairman, Lord Farrer, and my other colleagues are quite satisfied that the cause of temperance through the county has been greatly served by our action, and that both directly and indirectly good work has been done. Some time since all the public-houses in this division were visited and reported on by the magistrates, who spoke of one of the only two houses which we then managed as "the ideal of what a public-house ought to be," whereas it had previously been a curse to the neighbourhood and hardly reported on by the police. In our last report (for 1905) we say, "The accounts for the year 1905 show that the receipts from the sale of non-alcoholics and food together now equal those from the sale of alcoholic liquors."

The Surrey Trust has now seven houses, and several landowners have expressed their intention of leasing their public-houses to the Trust when the present tenancies fall in.

THE CONSUMER AND THE SWEATING PROBLEM.

SIR,—I should be glad if you would allow me to make, through your columns, a suggestion for dealing on a small scale with the sweating problem from the consumer's side. At the present time, those of us who feel any responsibility at all in the matter are really anxious to avoid purchasing any articles made by underpaid labour, or sold under evil conditions. On the other hand, those who are behind the scenes tell us that most sources are tainted with this evil, so that many of us hesitate to do any purchasing at all.

Now, in practice, it is almost impossible for the purchaser ever to ascertain the facts about the condition of production. The retailer, however, has far less difficulty, so that a simple and practical way of dealing with the problem is to start or take over retail shops or stores pledged to sell only articles made under proper conditions; it ought not to be difficult to form a small limited company financed for this purpose; and then we should soon see whether the public interest is real or only sentimental.

Probably most readers of this suggestion will greatly over-rate the difficulty of carrying out this proposal; but if the funds were provided I see no obstacles to putting it into operation either on a large or small scale, as may seem desirable.

My own experiences, though unimportant in themselves, may, in this connection, be worth mentioning, as I have been able, without any special influence or public support, to make several fairly successful attempts in dealing with evils by constructive experiment.

For example, some years ago, when the Factory Acts did not apply to laundries, and much of the work was carried on under miserable and unsanitary conditions, I suggested, and was subsequently able to carry out, a scheme for erecting a large laundry in which the conditions of the workers was made a matter of the first importance. The business was, from every point of view, extremely successful, and the laundry was subsequently taken as a model by the factory inspectors of the neighbourhood. Since then I have been connected with the organisation of two workshops into which we endeavoured with some success to import conditions very favourable to the workmen and to the production of good work; and, lastly, for seven years I have directed in London a show-room for the sale of work made by hand at a fair price and under conditions quite idealistic as compared with those prevailing in ordinary workshops. All of these ventures have been carried on on business lines, and are still going on; and even the last, though clearly far in advance of public opinion, has received a large amount of support.

Judging from the results of these experiments, I see little difficulty in making the experiment I am now suggesting.

The Industrial Co-operative Societies, with their widespread organisations, indicate the evils to be avoided, and suggest how the idea might develop if the support of the consumers were once obtained. Indeed, I see a possibility of creating an organisation free from at least the grosser evils that taint the transaction of the retail trade of England. Funds and the support of a section of the public is all that is required for the scheme, which might well act as a palliative until the present unfolding of spiritual life leads us to see more clearly the definite remedy for these and similar evils.

FROM THE KHASI HILLS.

THE following greeting from Mr. Nilmani Chakrabarti, the Brahmo Missionary in the Khasi Hills district, who writes from Cherraponjee, was not received in time to be included among those which we published on June 9:—"I am thankful to the committee," he writes, "for their kind and cordial invitation. I wish I were present at the anniversary meetings of the Association to meet face to face those Unitarian leaders and ministers who will assemble there, whom I have never had the good fortune to come in contact with, and yet several of whom I feel so near myself. But, as my people are not yet strong enough to take care of themselves, I must not at present indulge the idea of visiting a distant land. Although I have spent the last 17 years amongst them, they are still like little children, and require constant watching and a mother's care.

"When I first came to found this Mission in these hills, I found the people steeped in deep ignorance and gross superstition, and Calvinistic Methodism of the most bigoted type reigning supreme amongst those few who had had the advantage of an elementary education: But things have undergone a great change, and floods of light have poured in from different directions in the meantime; Spread of education and contact with civilised foreigners, supplemented by the influence exerted by both the Brahmo and the Unitarian missions, have widened the mental horizon of the Khasi Hills people, and held out a higher ideal of life before their eyes. In spite of all their attempts to shut the doors of their churches against this new light, the orthodox missionaries have found themselves quite unequal to the task and have begun readjusting their own household and adapting themselves to the present surroundings. By a happy chance the Brahmo and the Unitarian Missions have been started respectively in the two divisions of the hills, so that the spirit of the liberal religion has been working at different extremities for the leavening the people, the non-Christian Khasis preferring Brahmoism and those that have lost their faith in orthodox Christianity, showing an inclination towards the Unitarian faith: Although those who have joined our churches are only a few hundred in number, I know that there are a great many others of liberal faith outside them. I am not very fond of proselytism like the local orthodox missionaries, otherwise the number would have swelled by this time. I think that our portion is to let the light so shine before men that they can glorify our Father in heaven. It is for us only to work and pray, to watch and wait. It is our happy and highest privilege to be co-workers with God. It rests with Him to make our labours bear fruit in His own good time, and in the way He knows best. But I believe the future is full of promise. There was never a prayer of mine unanswered, never an expectation unrealised. And from this remote corner of India, isolated and single-handed as I am, I send a message of hope for the cause of our liberal religion to your great Anniversary Meetings."

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London Domestic Mission, Bell-street.—The Rev. S. H. Street writes on behalf of the Bell-street Summer Holiday and Excursion Fund:—"My funds for this purpose are very low indeed, and I have considerable expenses to meet. Our Sunday-school excursion takes place on Saturday, June 30, and the growth of the school makes this a more expensive item each year; and then we are hoping to send some eighty children away for a fortnight's holiday in the country later on, and, though we hope for generous help from the Sunday-school Society, there will still be a considerable balance that we shall have to find; in addition there are, of course, various smaller outings and other summer work that this fund is called upon to help. May I also add that our flower services take place on Sunday, June 24, and that gifts of flowers would be very welcome." Mr. Street may be addressed at the Bell-street Mission, Edgware-road, N.W.

Aberdeen.—The congregation are homeless at present, but the Rev. A. Webster speaks on the Broad Hill on Sunday afternoons and evenings. On the last two afternoons the audiences were over 500. The hearers mostly sit on the grassy slope and remain for the whole meeting. It is expected that the Church Hall will be ready early in July, and the use of it for worship will be quietly taken till the church is ready. The date of the opening of the church has been fixed. It is September 23 (the Sunday of the week in which the King will open the New Marischal College). The dedicatory services will be conducted by the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., Principal of Manchester New College, Oxford. On September 30 the Rev. John Glasco, D.D., Old Greyfriars Church, Edinburgh, will preach. After him, on October 3, the Rev. John Hunter, D.D., Glasgow, will continue the special opening services. On Oct. 7 some other well-known speaker will finish the series, which will illustrate the serviceable comprehension now happily possible in Scotland. The Rev. David Macrae hopes to preach in the new church soon after its opening. The building is being finished as speedily as possible, and promises to be suitable, comfortable, and beautiful. Invitations to the opening are being sent out, and it is hoped that there will be a large attendance of Southern friends.

Cefn Coed.—Sunday-school anniversary services, presided over by the superintendent, Mr. David Jones, were held at the old Meeting-house on Sunday, June 17, when two very successful programmes were gone through. In the afternoon sacred solos, recitations, &c., were given, and in the evening a Service of Song, "Jeremiah and his Times," was rendered. The Sunday-school choir, numbering over 100 voices, and conducted by Mr. John Lewis, was accompanied by the organ and string band belonging to the church. Good collections in aid of the funds were made at each meeting.

Croft.—The chapel and school sermons were preached on Sunday afternoon and evening at this little country place by the Rev. Dondy Agate. Friends gathered from Chowbent, Warrington (the choir of which rendered the music), Leigh, Park-lane, and other neighbouring congregations, and tea was served as usual in the hayshed of the nearest farm. The collections amounted to nearly £14.

Exeter.—The West of England Presbyterian Divines met on Wednesday, June 20, at George's Meeting, Exeter. The Divines were invited to tea by the Social Circle of George's Meeting. The Rev. W. Agar, of Sidmouth, was elected Moderator, and the Rev. J. Barron, of Tavistock, was re-elected Scribe.

Glossop.—The anniversary services were held at Fitzalan-street Church on Sunday, June 17, the preacher for the day being the Rev. E. L. H. Thomas, of Wilmslow. Special music was rendered by the choir, and the collections were a little over £40. This is very satisfactory, considering that at present the church is without a settled minister, and also that similar services were being held at four other places of worship in the town on the same day.

Halstead.—A very successful flower service was held in the Free Christian Church on Sunday evening conducted by Mr. George Ward (of Hither Green). The string band led the singing and played two classical pieces during the evening, which was much appreciated. The attendance was good and the collection satisfactory.

Leicester: Great Meeting.—Crowded congregations attended the annual Sunday-school sermons on Sunday, the pulpit both morning and evening being occupied by the Rev. J. Page Hopps, who in the morning preached from the words, "My Father worketh, and I work," and emphasised the gospel of loving service as embodying the whole essentials of Christian teaching. He gave the leaders of the Church of England credit for sincerity in their opposition to the Education Bill; yet, in addition to their desire to maintain the teaching of creeds and dogmas, there was a suspicion that if the Bill passed it would abolish the authority and ascendancy they had hitherto enjoyed.

Newcastle-on-Tyne.—On Trinity Sunday the Mayor, Ald. J. Baxter Ellis, J.P., attended morning service at the Church of the Divine Unity, in civic state, attended by Mr. Johnston Wallace, the Sheriff, the Deputy Mayor, the Chief Constable, the Under-Sheriff, and a large number of city councillors and leading citizens. The service was conducted by the Rev. Frank Walters, whose sermon on "The Holy City" was from the text Hebrews xii. 22: "Ye are come to the City of the Living God." It was, he said, erroneous to imagine that there was any hard and fast line where the divine operation stopped and the human labour began. God worked through man as his agent and vicegerent with a purpose as inevitable as that with which He worked in nature through the aeons of physical evolution. History, science, art, manufacture, trade, commerce—all these departments of enterprise had their place in the vast sweep of providential law. In this day we could regard the great city in which we lived as a sacred place. We could see, even in its imperfections, the struggling efforts of men to create a perfect form of social life and to establish on earth the city of the living God. And yet his hearers would pardon him, and understand his meaning, when he said that there were points of view from which it did seem almost like mockery to talk of any one of our modern cities as comparable, even in any distant fashion, to the city of God. "Cities of the devil!" some people felt inclined to cry as they heard the dreadful story that found its way into the newspapers—stories of sinks in iniquity, where children breathed vice from the womb, where the virtues of manliness were unknown, and the gracious modesties of womanliness were impossible—unclean altars upon which soul as well as body was sacrificed to shameful sin; dens of darkness where chastity sank into despair, and virtue seemed forsaken of her God. Pondering the conditions of the modern city, how could they fail to mingle their tears with those of the Saviour? Yet it was not those evils that had organised the community; it was the healthy, resilient energies of manhood which constituted our civic order, security, and progress. If the vices were to overbalance the tendencies to order and virtue, then our social life would perish in a catastrophe, compared with which the fall of Sodom and Gomorrah would seem like a merciful doom. The city continued a scene of order and industry and progress only in as far as the higher elements of human nature prevailed over the baser elements. After eulogising the work of General Booth, the preacher said by the visits of the city fathers to various places of worship, they recognised, and most wisely, that the great ideals of religion were corporate elements in the life of the vast community—a community whose interests they were so earnestly seeking to promote by the devotion of their time, thought, and enterprise. Theirs was often regarded as a purely secular enterprise. He did not so regard it. In their strenuous efforts for the welfare and progress of Newcastle, they were seeking to realise those ideal principles which the greatest teachers of mankind had always enunciated as the vital elements of social salvation and national stability. Every stage of secular amelioration meant that they achieved more than material welfare; it meant that they afforded new and larger opportunities for the expansion of moral, mental, and spiritual life. To them was entrusted the solemn duty of making the city the abode of wisdom, progress, and liberty—that liberty which came from loyal obedience to the highest law. Not alone in material wealth must they seek the progress of the people they served. Wealth was needed; but they must also remember that where wisdom was venerated, where pity extended her healing hand, where human sympathy envied the helpless and fallen with compassion, where Christian faith overshadowed the shadows of sin and sorrow and death, there was the Holy City, there we came to the city of the Living God. A collection was taken on behalf of the Fleming Memorial Hospital, for sick children.

Newchurch (Resignation).—The Rev. J. J. Shaw, having accepted an invitation to Wolverhampton, has resigned the pulpit to Bethlehem Church. His resignation has been received with great regret by the congregation.

Ringwood.—The Sunday-school anniversary sermons were preached, morning and evening, on Sunday, June 17, by the minister, the Rev. C. E. Reed. A flower service was held in the afternoon, the school children bringing tributes of garden and wild flowers; many of which were afterwards sent away to Aunt Amy. In the evening a goodly company, including some orthodox friends, assembled to hear a Service of Song, entitled "The Life of Elijah," which was very creditably rendered by the choir. Over fifty persons sat down to tea in the afternoon. The collections for the day were very satisfactory.

Sheffield: Stannington.—The anniversary sermons of Underbank Chapel, Stannington, were preached on Sunday, June 17, by the Rev. J. Ruddle, who commenced his ministry here, in succession to the late Rev. Iden Payne, in March last. The anniversary Sunday is an important day in the ecclesiastical year of Stannington. There was a large congregation at the afternoon service, and a very full one at the evening service, and the collections amounted to over £9. Special hymns were sung; an augmented choir was assisted by several instrumentalists, and notwithstanding the unfavourable weather, the day was thoroughly enjoyed. Mr. Ruddle preached in the afternoon on "The Abiding Presence of Christ," and in the evening on "Christian Friendliness."

Wolverhampton.—The Rev. J. J. Shaw, M.A., of Newchurch, has accepted a unanimous invitation to All Souls' Church, and proposes to enter upon his new duties in August.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE fifth Summer Session for Sunday School Teachers, which opened at Manchester College, Oxford, on Friday morning, and continues throughout the coming week, promises to be as successful as any yet held. Teachers from forty schools, among which both Ireland and Scotland are represented, are taking part in the session, ninety members having already entered their names. In the next two numbers of THE INQUIRER we hope to publish a full report of this session.

THE advertisement as to Warford Hall and the care of the Feeble-minded, to which Miss Mary Dendy referred in her letter of last week, was, by a misunderstanding, not put into that number, but only her advertisement for servants at Sandlebridge Boarding-schools. The advertisement of Warford Hall will be found in our present issue, and we would refer our readers again to Miss Dendy's letter with its offer of help in the new schools, and its statement of various things needed at Sandlebridge.

CONGRATULATIONS to our veteran friend, the Rev. J. K. Montgomery, of Chester, who last Saturday celebrated his 90th birthday! On that day the Chester Chronicle issued a special supplement with a portrait of "Chester's Oldest Citizen," and some notes, from which we learn that on the previous Tuesday he attended the annual prize distribution of the British schools, and still regularly attends the meetings of the Chester Education Committee. Born at Belfast in 1816, Mr. Montgomery came to Chester in 1860, and retired from active ministerial service ten years ago. He has been among the pioneers of popular education in the city of his adoption.

THE Newdigate Prize for English verse in the University of Oxford has been won this year by Mr. Geoffrey Scott, of New College, son of Mr. Russell Scott. "The Death of Shelley" is the subject of the poem. Mr. Scott, says the Oxford Chronicle, "hardly did himself justice, owing to nervousness, in his recital of the Newdigate," at the Encænion on Wednesday week; but a notice of the poem (which is published by A. H. Blackwell, of Oxford, 1s. net), speaks of it as possessing "both dignity of thought and melody of versification."

THE 138th anniversary of Cheshunt College has just been celebrated, but no longer, as was the case for well over a century, in the pleasant grounds of the old Hertfordshire village. This year has witnessed the change of location to Cambridge. We congratulate the professors and students and friends of the College on the good spirit with which they are able to view their experiment. First one and then another of our Theological Colleges finds its way to one of the old University towns, and in this instance, too, we note with satisfaction the good temper with which they are welcomed by the University authorities.

THE latest development of the Summer School idea is due to the initiative of the London Missionary Society. Two schools are to be held, one at Colwyn Bay and the other at Hastings. They are intended for Congregational ministers, Sunday-school teachers, and all such members of the churches as care to combine some instruction and much social stimulus in addition to less articulate teaching of the summer, sea, and shore. Morning and evening sessions are to be held for hearing lectures on Mission work, Mission methods and Mission principles.

THE social conscience of the Church of England is still busy making for itself little channels of expression. The new rivulet is to bear the name of the "Church Socialist League." This is not the first Church Socialist society, though it is the first to bear the name which was a short time ago such a rock of offence. The Guild of St. Matthew claims to be the earliest Socialist body in the country, and still continues a thrifty and unobtrusive existence, but it has been closely connected with high Sacramental observance. The new League is to be kept free from any extreme variety of Church practice or doctrine, and might be described as—within the establishment—a kind of "undenominationalism." The Christians Social Union will probably continue to attract more public attention than either the Guild or the League, but it is to be remembered that it is not a Socialist organisation. The new league will doubtless do active service for Social reform. Perhaps its immediate significance, however, lies in its having given to the term Socialism, which once was a term in ill repute, the impress of perfect propriety.

THE annual meetings of the Remonstrant Synod of Ulster, held in Belfast on June 19, and of the Association of Irish Nonsubscribing Presbyterians and other Free Christians on the following day, we must report next week. Also the annual meeting of the Winifred House "Invalid Children's Convalescent Hospital Home," held at University Hall on Monday afternoon.

PROVINCIAL ASSEMBLY OF LANCA-SHIRE AND CHESHIRE.—The following have been elected as the general committee for 1906-7.—The Revs. D. Agate, G. Evans, A. W. Fox, C. Peach, W. L. Schroeder, T. P. Spedding, S. A. Steintal, and J. J. Wright; and Messrs. J. R. Beard, H. P. Greg, P. Leigh, D. Little, J. H. Pimley, T. F. Robinson, G. W. R. Wood, and S. B. Worthington.

WILLASTON SCHOOL.—Mr. G. Lewis, M.A., the headmaster from the foundation of the school, has been appointed headmaster of the Mowbray School, Cape Town. The governors have appointed as his successor Mr. H. L. Jones, M.A. (Oxon), who has hitherto been the principal assistant master. Mr. Jones is a son of Mr. Arthur E. Jones, and nephew of Mr. Charles W. Jones, and the Rev. F. H. Jones.

BLACKFRIARS' MISSION.—The country home on Mitcham Common was reopened just before Whitsuntide, and arrangements are made for a constant succession of visitors during the summer. Mrs. David Martineau, 4, South-road, Clapham Park, S.W., will be glad to receive further contributions towards its maintenance.

It is essentially impossible to worship God spiritually unless we are drawn and led by forces internal to the soul itself.

F. W. Newman;

OUR NEW DOCTOR.

WE make our obeisance to Dr. Carpenter of the third generation, for on Thursday week, the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, M.A., son of Dr. W. B. Carpenter, grandson of Dr. Lant Carpenter, of Bristol, took his degree of D.Litt. in the University of Oxford. It is a quaint ceremony, this conferring of a degree. The Congregation, at which the Vice-Chancellor (Dr. Merry, Rector of Lincoln) presided, was held in the Sheldonian Theatre at 10 o'clock, when "J. E. Carpenter, Corpus Christi," took his place among the Masters, who were waiting to advance their status. There were three others first, a "D.D." first of all, and then he was led up to the Vice-Chancellor by the Regius Professor of Greek, and the necessary things said to him in Latin. As part of the ceremony, two officials, one on each side, make their paces down the floor and back again, and after the presentation the newly-made Doctor was conducted right out of the theatre, and having there outside changed his humbler robe into the gorgeous crimson gown of the D.Litt., came in again, preceded by the beadle with his silver mace, and the Vice-Chancellor, having shaken hands, courteously invited him to take his place among the Doctors. The degree, we may add, is not an honorary degree, such as was presented at the Encænæia on the previous day to the Chinese Ambassador and others; it is gained by application to the authorities and the presentation of works of original scholarship.

The ceremony was over in good time, and Dr. Carpenter was able to come in to the lecture-room at Manchester College for the Visitor's Address, not indeed in the crimson, which is only for very special and state occasions, but in the working robe of his new dignity, which is black and fittingly embroidered. He at once received the congratulations of his students and the assembled company of friends in hearty rounds of applause, congratulations repeated by the President at the subsequent meeting of trustees. Thus happily is the succession of the Doctors in the Principalship of Manchester College maintained.

GORDON COOPER'S CENTURY.

THE London Unitarian Ministers won a great victory last Saturday afternoon on the Essex Church Cricket Ground at Wormholt Farm, over the first eleven of the Laymen's Club. It was a glorious afternoon, and a goodly company of friends assembled to see the match. Mr. Harold Wade, the president, captained the Laymen, and Mr. Charlesworth the Ministerial Eleven. The latter won the toss, and sent in his champions, H. Rawlings and Gordon Cooper, first. Their prowess was astonishing. Cooper actually scored 121, and Rawlings 20. The captain himself added 18, while Freeston, Tarrant, Gow, and others did their part. The Ministers' total was 193. For the Laymen their captain made 27, Walter Odgers 21, and H. B. Lawford 15; but no century for them, and their total score stopped at 98. Hence the glory to the Ministers. It was a famous victory!

IS THERE ONLY "ONE THING NEEDFUL?"

V.

ST. PAUL left behind him groups of little congregations scattered over several provinces of the Roman Empire; full of zeal and enthusiasm, though subject from time to time to fearful persecutions, inspired above all by faith in a new ideal of manhood brought to them from one whom they called the Lord Jesus Christ, and eagerly watching for that stupendous crisis when their divine Leader would appear among them and all their enemies be scattered like chaff. We have seen how the mere existence of these communities in the Pagan world compelled Paul to arrange, to organise, even to compromise, but always for the sake of keeping pure the faith and enthusiasm which else might have spent itself in suicidal asceticism or in anarchical dreams.

The strenuous spirit of the great Apostle to the nations at length passed beyond the veil. Years came and went; but the expected end did not come. The first enthusiasm could not always live at its former level; more definition, more teaching, more regulation, were demanded as if by instinct, and most urgently were needed, since Christians were drawn from all ranks and occupations—in the imperial palace, among the officials, in the abodes of labour and the halls of learning, among slaves and freemen. Blindly, instinctively, or consciously, some change must needs be made. The first half of the second century covered the greatest crisis in the history of religion since the days that followed the crucifixion of Christ. Either must the primitive church withdraw further from the world, and vanish out of history, as other unworldly sects (the so-called Neo-Pythagoreans in Greece, the Essenes in Judea, the Montanists among the Christians themselves) were destined soon to vanish; or she must enter into the life of that world to which originally she had stood in such direct antagonism. Could she have entered into it to capture the world for Christ? What might have been, in that confused and distant age, is utterly beyond our knowledge; it is enough that we can discern what actually took place. "She marched through the open door into the Roman State," says Harnack, "and settled down there for a long career of activity, to Christianise the State along all its thoroughfares by imparting to it the word of the gospel, but at the same time leaving to it everything except its gods. On the other hand, she furnished herself with everything of value that could be taken over from the world without overstraining the elastic structure of the organisation which she now adopted. With the aid of its philosophy she created her new Christian theology; its polity furnished her with the most exact constitutional forms; its jurisprudence, its trade and commerce, its art and industry, were all taken into her service; and she borrowed some hints even from its religious worship. Thus we find the church in the third century endowed with all the resources which the State and its culture had to offer, entering into all the relationships of life, and ready for any compromise which did not affect the confession of her faith.

With this equipment she undertook, and carried through, a world-mission on a grand scale."

The church, however, became something more than what Weinel calls her (with reference to this great change), "a slightly modified world." For she grappled with some of the worst of the destructive forces at work in the world, and brought them under control. To this we referred at some length in our second paper. Here it is sufficient to say that the church enforced an ideal of self-mastery, understood at first with special reference to bodily purity, but capable of deeper and wider application; she severely condemned and finally succeeded in suppressing the practice of exposing infants; she brought about an effective abhorrence of the barbarism of gladiatorial combats; she produced an immediate moral mitigation of slavery and a strong encouragement to emancipation; and she greatly extended the charitable provision made for the sick and the poor. In general she made beneficence a form of divine service, and identified piety with pity—except where "heresy" was concerned!

It is time that our results were brought together. I started with the proposal to find the moral meaning of Christ's gospel by looking at the way in which the moral influence derived from him was applied by the early church to the world. The application to the world of what I have called Christ's moral influence, up to the middle of the second century at least, was not the conscious, deliberate application of precepts of non-resistance to violence, of unlimited yielding to exaction, of unlimited almsgiving, of the impropriety of prudence and forethought, of the evil of material possessions, as these stand written in the gospels; it was not the deliberate application of any code of moral laws at all; it was the working in the world of a spirit or life or inspiration expressing itself independently in moral precepts which are to be explained by the actual situation in which the Christians found themselves. These "secondary expressions" of Christ's moral influence (as we agreed to call them) are closely related to the gospel precepts, for they are the expression of the same spirit; but they are not simply the same as the gospel precepts, and indeed sometimes stand in contrast with the latter, for they are the expression of the same spirit working in new situations. Hence there is no single moral law which, from the Christian point of view, can be laid down as the one thing needful.*

I have said that the spirit or life which inspired the early Christian congregations defies analysis. But to a certain extent it can be described; and I think it could scarcely be better described than in a few impressive paragraphs which I quote from Mr. Howard Brown†:—

* These statements refer only to the first century and a half; afterwards, Christian morality became a code deliberately founded on the New Testament and the writings of the Fathers; and accordingly we find two degrees of morality worked out—a morality of perfection, and a morality for ordinary life: the former could not be realised except by withdrawing from the world. This is probably the most reasonable solution of the difficulty, if the gospels must be regarded as laying down a code of laws.

† Minister at King's Chapel, Boston, U.S.A.

"Perhaps we may say that Christ's love for men was unique, because it contained an element which he for the first time added to the philanthropic sentiment of spiritual humanity; that is, the element of profound reverence for every common soul. But whether or not this was absolutely new to the world in him does not so much signify, since through him it has been made for the first time a considerable force in human affairs. The immense significance of his reverential love for men may be indicated by saying that it is the only conceivable basis and source of what we now call an enthusiasm for humanity.

"Christ was the victim of no illusion whatever as to the character of men in general. He knew what was in their hearts; the dark as well as the brighter side of their existence. He understood perfectly the waywardness and folly, and sin that are in the common life. The foolish trust of many would-be reformers that, if only men could have opportunity, they would create at once an earthly paradise, he did not share. And yet he loved men, and trusted them none the less on this account, for he saw within this superficial weakness a deeper life, yet to be unfolded, of infinite promise and of priceless worth. He held every human being to be, at the real heart of him, a child of God, and taught that each one of us lives, inwardly and spiritually, out of that deathless, eternal source. The sin of the world may lie like a blight upon all the flower and fruitage of our earthly existence thus far; but there is this deeper divine root of our essential humanity, and that cannot be corrupted or killed. The prodigal may wander wide from his father's house, and dishonour his lineage by shameful deeds; but he cannot destroy the bond that makes him his father's son, and his father's love may be trusted to win him back at last from the sins and miseries in which he has involved himself.

"We can give no other explanation of the wondrous vitality of Christian institutions, and of their gradual unfolding into the higher forms of beneficent endeavour so reasonable as to say that this is the growing response of human nature everywhere to that mark of its high calling which his example has set before it. Multitudes of men and women, both inside and outside the recognised bounds of Christian fellowship, are now labouring for the world's good, sustained by a faith in some far-off result, little of which can as yet be seen. I know not how to account for such labour and faith, save on the assertion that Christ's feeling, as of something divine in the nature of man, has more and more crept into the common heart to inspire it for those sacrifices which even ordinary civic virtue now demands."

Here, at last, is the one thing needful! Not a fixed precept or command, but a living principle, demanding development in every new age into new practical applications; a belief in man, not for what he is, but for what he has in him to become—in the souls of the meanest and humblest of men, underneath any outward defacements, a spiritual possibility of boundless reach and infinite worth: It is the simple truth to say that Jesus of Nazareth made this conviction an effective moral force in the world:

This is the one principle that the Christian religion has to give to the social reformer to-day. In the light of this principle, all those social sources of human misery and disgrace, poisoning the spring of human life and crushing its possibilities—physical suffering and all that makes for physical suffering, unjust conditions of living and working, insanitary dwellings, inadequate or misdirected education, harsh or unequal laws, oppressive social conventions—stand in Christ's name condemned.

And yet (for there is no human statement, of evil or of good, without its "and yet"!) there comes a counter-stroke which in the eyes of the enthusiast will take away all the good of the declaration which we have just made. The purpose is one thing, the means of realising it another. The purpose is of Christ, is ever the same, and of eternal worth; the means vary from age to age, and even from one decade to another. No scheme of social betterment is, from the Christian point of view, an "end in itself," but is means to a further end; and no such scheme has any special or peculiar right to the name "Christian" as against other schemes. You, as an individual, may be convinced that there is a scheme which alone will fulfil the Christian aim of setting human nature free to grow, and so you may call that scheme "Christian"; but you gain nothing and lose much by refusing to think of the two things apart. There are others who may be sincerely unable to convince themselves that your scheme will do what you think it will; and because of this, you charge them with hypocrisy, or disloyalty to the Christian ideal, or, at least, with denying the social duty of the Christian Church. To deny the Christian ideal is not only un-Christian but in the end immoral; to differ about the means of realising it is neither un-Christian nor immoral; and such differences can be resolved only by intelligent inquiry and discussion.

Let us realise once for all that there is no such thing as "Christian sociology," or "Christian socialism (or individualism)"; that free trade and protection, free competition and compulsory co-operation, are not in themselves either Christian or the reverse; and that all these things require such study and analysis as will make clear to our intelligence what their results will be, not in the abstract but in the actual cases where they have become practical problems. This is not to cut off from social reform the inspiration of the Christian motive; it is to bring into social reform the guidance of intelligence and clear thinking.

Finally, by this interpretation of the one thing needful we are able to avoid one of the most deplorable delusions of the day—a delusion all the more so because it is so sincere, that social reform is the only practical Christianity, the only application of religion, which is any good. Social reform is of immense importance, and we have seen that the Christian ideal provides the only abiding justification for it. But in the name of reason let us not lose our heads so far as to suppose that we can only do good to men when we deal with them in the mass. Social reform deals with men in the mass, collectively; but who can tell how much of the world's healthy and purifying life has not sprung from the innumerable men and women who have blown no trumpets, nor made processions in the streets, but have quietly lived and worked, so as to leave their little portion of the world better than they found it?

It is well to remember this, when we look round and ask what are the ideals of England to-day. We see such things as bridge and motor-cars, horses and dogs, the objects of devotion to thousands of worshippers; we see it counted "bad form" to be enthusiastic, to be devoted, to care very much about anything, except the things that we happen to like; we see the very ideals of the day, where they exist, becoming party cries—sources of contention and strife; and out in the world we seem to hear the sound of men praising their idols of gold, and of silver, of brass, of iron, of wood, and of stone. If this were all the truth, then already the moving finger, that no man can stay, has written on the wall of our boasted strength the words that sentence us to shame and everlasting contempt. But it is only a part and not the whole of the truth; and on us, not in the mass only, but singly and one by one, is laid our share of the great charge: so to think and feel and act, that our work may go to swell the stream of pure and high and honourable human life, which by God's grace is still flowing in our midst.

S. H. MELLONE:

SUNDAY SCHOOLS.

WHEN a man concludes an article in such a periodical as the Nineteenth Century with a paragraph beginning "I have not exaggerated the condition of nine-tenths of the Sunday schools in England; and I might, without creating a false picture, have put in more shadows than I did," one naturally feels that the writer has been looking for darkness, and not for light, and one is inclined to add "how great is the darkness." To reach the nine-tenths' conclusion immediately brings us into touch with that stubborn prejudice which excludes all sympathy, that befogged criticism which begins with depreciation instead of appreciation, with the result that one is tempted to exclaim, "O thou great Public Opinion, deliver our darlings from this Daniel come to judgment." The writer has created a false picture, for the simple reason that he has been at great pains to exclude all the factors which are of the utmost artistic importance to the creating of a true representation of something which in its essence and spirit is among the loveliest and most attractive types of self-sacrifice and devotion. Every picture must of necessity be raw and crude which omits the play of light and warmth, and which is chiefly characterised by a stupid determination to make the shadows as heavy and thick as the body of the material will allow. And why this darkness? Because the painter has thought it well to take what one might term a cross-eyed and colour-blind position. His motive has thrown all things awry. He does not approach his subject with that open eye which is the bliss of happy criticism: His artificial pessimism makes one smile:

He is combating the idea that many people imagine the Sunday school teacher will be able to cover in half-an-hour the amount of definite religious instruction which has occupied the skill of the trained elementary teacher for two and a half hours each week! The position is preposterous and ridiculous. The average Sunday school teacher is a very practical, sensible person, and knows that the professional teacher, for whom he has the greatest respect, can always give him a lesson in class management, discipline, and instruction. The contention is one of those bogies set up for the sake of adding something to the pertinence of the argument, but so weak that it wobbles even while one is quizzing its appearance. This contention further leads the writer to a survey of Sunday schools as they are, and his evil genius makes ugly scare-crows for him all over the field. One is compelled to quote in order to justify this assertion: Notice then, for instance, his description of the Sunday school building: "This may, or may not be good, sanitary, well-lighted, well-ventilated." This may is immediately followed by "The buildings are, as a rule, fairly good." But the grey tone of "fairly good" is not deep enough, and so you get the blackness and the horror at the end: "Even now children are to be found in places which a sanitary inspector would condemn; and an epidemic of diphtheria or typhoid has before now been traced to an insanitary Sunday school."

From the buildings we proceed to teachers. The "fairly good" of the building is paralleled here by "a few brilliant exceptions;" and then the old black brush is produced to make the shadow entirely cover the struggling light. In this connection the best type of teacher to bring on the canvas for the desired effect is the amiable, insipid, ineffective teacher. And so the writer gives you a specimen of a goody-goody lady who meekly murmurs all the day, "Maggie Jones, be quiet," "Thomas Smith, sit still."

Incongruously comes in after all this the one unconscious touch of humour, and the one attempt at pathos in the whole of the paper: "The clergy and ministers cannot do much. They need their energies for the church and chapel. Indeed, many an empty seat bears silent witness to the overwrought state of the preacher." The humour taps one gently on the funny-bone, but the pathos makes one stare vacuously and ask,—What does it all mean?

Nobody can now be surprised to hear that to teach in Sunday schools is a work of supererogation; that for a child to be sent to Sunday school is waste of force; and that quite three-fourths of the children present in every Sunday school are there because the parents do not want them at home. Our author deals in big percentages, nothing less than seventy-five and ninety suits his purpose; but the ordinary everyday business man, and even the common-place Sunday school teacher, would like to know how he arrives at these huge conclusions. He is also particularly clever in his use of fine distinctions, so fine, indeed, that one is puzzled at the delicate discrimination subtly conveyed in the following: "Sunday is a day that seems to have been ordained for worship and rest, and not for instruction."

Then he goes on to make one wonder all the more: "And if one-twentieth part of the energy now put into Sunday schools were put into the organisation of children's services, there would probably be a wider and more satisfactory appreciation of worship than is now the case." We have simply had from him an instance of the Maggie Jones type of energy: divide this by twenty, and what do you get? It is already at zero, and so you are frozen up in the pole of nothingness. Children's services may be very good occasionally, if you are fortunate enough to seize the happy man who is gifted with the genius that can lead the worship of babes and youths and maidens for half an hour on a Sunday afternoon; but, please remember, all the time that your happy man must not attempt to insinuate—Sunday does not seem to have been ordained for instruction. What could Benjamin Waugh, J. J. Wright, and Thomas Robinson do under these restrictions? And hence our intense admiration for the fine distinction.

What does the writer omit in his review of Sunday schools as we know them? He omits everything which has made them worthy of our estimation:—their tone and temper, and the secret of their success. The very first thing that would strike a man with open vision and true sympathy, who happened to visit most of our Sunday schools in the North, would be the perfect brotherliness and homeliness of the preliminary gatherings. Sunday school begins with these fraternal greetings, and the minister is often found in the midst of them. A certain number of scholars, old and young, may be observed round the piano or harmonium trying over new tunes or listening to old favourites; another group may be seen near the library cupboard, peeping into the fresh additions to its stock; another may be heard discussing the ramble or the cricket match of the day before; while, near the platform, or in a separate class-room there may be found a man busy with money matters—savings' bank, clothing account, or book fund. The multiplicity of interests may strike the visitor as an extraordinary phenomenon; but in scores of schools something of this sort goes on every Sunday afternoon, and must be taken as an indication of the home-like atmosphere in which these people dwell together in unity. I wish our Nineteenth Century man could see it as we have seen it hundreds of times. It is a beautiful thing to remember when away on one's holidays, for it seems at the heart of it so much good comradeship, life and interest.

And how quickly the friendly confusion transforms itself into perfect order. From one of these groups a certain individual quietly emerges, and walks on to the platform. He may touch a bell or may call out "Places, please," or he may stand perfectly still "catching the eyes of speakers" in various places, who immediately understand what is wanted, and settle down at their different posts. The strength and dignity and modesty—the commanding attractiveness of a good superintendent, who is so readily obeyed by a noble band of voluntary workers, is the fact that would strike an outsider as something in itself worthy to be marked with an emphatic note of admiration.

The writer in the Nineteenth Century does not seem to know anything about this preliminary gathering, and the obedience given so readily to the leader of the school, an obedience which has often astonished the trained elementary teacher. It is an indication of something which cannot be summed up in the stern word discipline. The secret lies in the fact that the Sunday school in hundreds of instances is not an isolated institution, left severely alone in order that it may impart "religious instruction" of the driest possible order; it is a focussing of most of the societies connected with the church, chapel or mission; it is a warm, healthy organisation with many members, and those members find it a very bliss to be alive in its atmosphere. Cricket, football, lawn-tennis, rambles' swimming, botany, and book clubs, and others of that ilk, all find their secretaries and their committees in the Sunday school. It is not a sickly, sentimental indoor plant of changing hue, but a hardy, companionable, outdoor, help-me-all-through-the-week spirit and influence. Thousands of men owe the very gladness of their lives to the Sunday school, and worship the memories of their dead and gone teachers. A great proportion of the Labour Representatives in our present Parliament will tell you that. And that is the note which our writer misses. He wanted to play in the minor key, and so he kept hold of his weak Maggie Jones, and ignored our manly Tom Brown. He does not seem to know anything about our big senior classes, and how successful many of our schools have been in retaining youths and maidens over the most trying periods of their lives. Day school has finished with a boy when he reaches fourteen years of age. Sunday school never finishes with him, and the problem ever before the teacher is, "How to retain our elder scholars all through their lives," as teachers, superintendents, members of the choir, if not as actual scholars. Some schools even succeed in this, and Wales is particularly proud of its elder scholars' classes, where men from seventeen to seventy meet together as class-mates.

We have made this hurried sketch just to remind our readers that our Sunday schools are something more than gatherings of babies, and that we have been favoured with teachers of a different type from the "Maggie Jones" order. And now, after quickly covering this ground, let us accept the challenge of the Nineteenth Century writer. Suppose secular instruction were the order of the day in our elementary schools, would it be possible for us to do more than we are doing to meet any demand that might be put upon us for extended religious teaching? We think we could meet every demand, and would be only too glad to create a demand if we could. By "we" let us think of Nonconformists generally. We are not inclined to cry "The clergy and ministers cannot do much. They need their energies for the church and chapel," because we believe we are giving our energies to the church and chapel when we take these young souls within our care. We believe we are prepared and equipped to do this work if ever necessity imposes it upon us. In the meantime, Nonconformity has a right to be proud of its Sunday schools, and a sympathetic visitor coming among us would find many things to admire. He would find not only that the scholars have had wholesome, ethical and religious teaching on the Sunday, but that they have been followed to their homes, their health and physical welfare attended to, their holidays helped and arranged: he would find youths and maidens looking upon these chapels and missions as their second homes; he would find a band of workers constant, true, and devoted in their voluntary task, and begin to ask himself the question we have asked ourselves over and over again "What would England be without its Sunday schools?"

THE EDUCATION BILL.

SIR,—As one of those who took part in the recent discussion on the Education Bill, at Essex Hall, I take advantage of your kind invitation to continue it in your columns. While the conclusion arrived at was satisfactory, as expressing the sense of the meeting, I should, nevertheless, like to use the opportunity you give me to support the amendment of Mr. Richard Robinson, with which, although I had been the mover of the original resolution, I was in hearty concurrence. The aim of the Bill is to remove the eternal religious difficulty, and to terminate the melancholy exhibition of religious strife between the churches in relation to the education of the children of the people.

No one who values either education or the good name and fame of the churches can witness, without a feeling of despair, the long wrangle which has done more than anything else to put back the clock of popular education in England, and, at the same time, has given cause to many who watch the struggle to condemn a religion which bears such fruits. In the interest of education and religion alike, it is a vital matter that the strife should cease.

The fine speech in which Mr. Birrell introduced his Bill was inspired from beginning to end with the motive of putting a term to this suicidal war, waged for the custody of the children. His offer to the denominationalists was generous to a fault on the financial side, giving them rent while saving them from the expenditure of a single farthing on their buildings, and, at the same time, leaving these in their hands out of school hours for all their church purposes. It was equally generous religiously; it not only enabled them, in the agreements for the transfer of their schools to the local authority which was a fundamental requisite for their continuance under the Bill, to secure in Clause 3 on two mornings a week, the right of teaching their own special doctrines, at their own cost, by teachers appointed by themselves, other than those on the staff; but in urban districts of 5,000 and upwards, the local authority were empowered to grant extended facilities under Clause 4 to owners of transferred schools to have their special form of religion taught at their own expense by the school staff on every day in the week, subject to the parents of four-fifths of the children demanding it, and to there being room in schools not under Clause 4 for the other children. Moreover, Mr. Birrell has publicly stated more than once that the intention of this Clause is that the denominational schools, with the requisite four-fifths, should go on just as they are now. This means that the teachers, if they are to give this instruction, will have to stand a religious test, and that, consequently, of the two vital principles of the Bill, public control and abolition of tests, the latter goes by the board. It means, in fact, that under Clause 4, in all districts of 5,000 and upwards, denominationalism pure and simple may be re-established. This is a large order, it puts a tremendous strain on the consciences of the great body of Nonconformists; in fact, it strains them beyond the point that they can endure without sacrifice of principle.

Personally, I would go to the utmost possible length to bury the hatchet, and smoke the pipe of peace with denominationalists, but I cannot go so far as this clause asks me to go. I have not a particle of jealousy of any church in the land; I feel no antagonism towards Catholics, Jews, or Anglicans, and wish them all God speed in their sacred tasks, but I abhor sectarianising the nation's schools. It is disastrous in its influence; nor is it the nation's business to levy rates and taxes to maintain nurseries for the churches. It is the churches' business to gather their own children into their embrace, and they have my utmost sympathy and goodwill when they do it, but I long to see the nation's schools the common meeting ground for the children of all sects, and an end put for ever to all schools in which sect is divided from sect, and boys and girls are penned up in separate folds, to be reared in the mutual ignorance and suspicion that breed lifelong sectarian antagonism, instead of in school friendships which last to the latest breath and are rich in charity between man and man. The schools for which the nation pays, and which the nation controls, should be citizen schools, uniting and not dividing the rising generation; accordingly, far as I would go to make peace with the churches, too much is asked of me in Clause 4. What, then, is the alternative way of securing peace?

Now, if I look for the origin of Clause 4, I find it in the introduction of Cowper-Temple teaching into the transferred schools. It is sometimes asked by supporters of the Bill as it stands, 'Why should there be such a sudden outcry against the Cowper-Temple teaching that, since 1870, has been quietly accepted in Board Schools by its present opponents?' It is easy to give the answer. When the churches were teaching their own religion in their own schools at the public cost, till 1902 supported by the taxes, since 1902 by the rates as well, they had small grievance; others shared their own privileges, that was all. But it is a very different situation that is proposed under the Bill: If it becomes law as it stands, apart from Clause 4, what may happen? The Cowper-Temple teaching may be daily given by the staff in every transferred school at the cost of the nation as part of the curriculum, while in no single Anglican or Catholic or Jewish or other voluntary school may the special religious teaching of the owners be so given. The owners under Clause 3 can only send in other teachers than those on the staff, at their own cost, to give it at the request of parents. Here is a disestablishment of themselves in their own schools to make way for the possible establishment of religious teaching that many Anglicans and all Roman Catholics and Jews object to. You may say that Anglicans have no reason for their objection, but their conscience is theirs and not yours, and is as sacred as yours. Look what you will have done, moreover, in the establishment, subject to local option, of Cowper-Temple teaching in the nation's schools if this Bill passes as it stands. You will have given new admission to the principle of the responsibility of the nation for placing in its curriculum and paying for religious teaching. By so doing you give afresh to every sort of religious teaching the support of an argument you will find it hard to answer; in point of fact, Clause 4 is about the least you can give to those who object to Cowper-Temple, simple Bible, or fundamental Christian teaching, as it is variously called, if they are to have that fair play which is a jewel. There is, in short, only one way to get rid of Clause 4, and that is to first get rid of the Cowper-Temple teaching which has made the clause almost a necessity. There is only one way to turn out of the schools the religious difficulty of which the nation is sick to death, and that is to confine the teaching at the nation's cost, and by the nation's teachers, to secular instruction. I am absolutely certain that you will be vainly crying 'peace' where there is no peace from this miserable controversy, till you end it by leaving religious teaching to the churches, the Sunday schools, and the parents, and taking it once for all out of the State-paid curriculum of the schools. Do you say this is to leave the children outside the influence of religion in them? Will it be so if the teachers are good men and women, with religion deep-seated in their hearts and breathing in their lives? Children may be altogether untouched by lessons labelled with religion's name, but they are never untouched by the presence with them of men and women whose characters speak of a religion that is their very life. The turning out from the curriculum of a religious syllabus will only turn out religion when you expel with the syllabus religious teachers; and these will be as plentiful without the syllabus as with it. The first thing to do to make peace is to eject the teaching of religion from the curriculum of the nation's schools. Personally I should be content to leave it so, and to trust the churches, the Sunday schools, and the parents to rise to the fulfilment of the new responsibility which, in this most sacred matter, would be handed over to them. But I am not considering what suits me, content when I am satisfied; that is not the way of peace. The great churches of England and Rome after the Act of 1902 were contented, the Nonconformists went to jail. I don't want that evil story retold, mutatis mutandis. Such an issue would only mean another swing of the pendulum and a new Education Bill after it had swung; it might mean "back to 1902," and worse. Let us, if we can, not only scotch but kill the demon of this hateful religious difficulty that poisons the air we breathe.

Although, personally, I do not like universal right of entry, I regard it as the second item in the only alternative to Cowper-Templeism and Clause 4. All schools treated alike, all religions treated alike, no religion established and endowed, every religion taught by the churches through their own teachers at their own expense, all this involves no breach of Nonconformist principles, it is, indeed, in complete accordance with Nonconformist principles. Moreover, I believe it can make peace. What is it? It is only extending Clause 3 to all schools, every distinction between them gone for good and all; that is to say, that on two mornings a week, if the time-table drawn up by the local body permit it, teachers paid and appointed by the churches other than those on the staff may give such special religious instruction as the parents desire, with the proviso that, during the time at which it is given, attendance is not compulsory. This is a large and generous gift to the churches inasmuch as they would, for the first time, subject to the option of the local authority, have access with their own special religious teaching not alone to their own transferred schools but to all the late Board and present Council schools hitherto beyond their reach. At their own charges, and by their own teachers, they might thus have the opportunity of teaching their own children if parents desired it.

It is just because it is a large and generous gift that it is one worth making with the real hope of its being the harbinger of peace. What I dislike about it is, that it divides the scholars into sects in the schools; but that is only for half an hour or so on certain mornings a week, leaving them all together the rest of the school time, and is much better than separating them into distinct sectarian schools. Moreover, I do not fear that all sects would make separate entry and break up the scholars into a number of different pens. I am confident that it would not be so; the Roman Catholics and Jews, as now, would keep themselves to themselves, and the great body of Nonconformists, satisfied as they are with Cowper-Temple teaching, would, if they made use of their right of entry, I have little doubt, carry on teaching under similar syllabuses to those in the present Council schools by teachers whom they would collectively appoint and pay.

THE SPRINGS OF INSPIRATION.

SIR,—Kindly allow me space for a few remarks on your article, "The Springs of Inspiration," in THE INQUIRER of June 23. While we, in our calm, philosophic way, are trying "not to secure a victory for our name, or for our own opinions, but to deepen and clarify religious thought and feeling," what is happening to the first congregations which came into fellowship with our denomination in more virile times? They are smouldering. Their pews are half-filled. Some of their people are putting into practice what they have been taught, and are endeavouring "to extend pure and free religion" by joining other denominations, and leaving their own. Others of their adherents are "encouraging brotherhood, righteousness, and peace" by founding or endowing educational or charitable institutions, which soon become virtually the property of less liberal denominations, because there is no outlet for the philanthropy of our own people within their denomination. Their ministers despond; they feel the heartlessness of work against great odds; they wonder why they are unpopular; they are so crushed by their poverty and their surroundings that they are incapable of planning or inaugurating any line of action likely to give them a hold on the people; all simply because no decent business-like effort has ever been made to make the cause a growing and popular and prosperous one. If our opinions are of any value to the world, they are worthy of being spread by every legitimate means. "Strenuous faithfulness in our own place" is but part of our duty. With it we must combine strenuous activity as far reaching as possible. By exercising our powers for spiritual and moral good upon our own people we will best place a practical example before other men. The strenuous dreamer in his corner will be admitted by the world to be a good fellow, though a bit queer, but the world will pass him by. It will not sit down and dream with him. When the dreamer dies the reality of the dream is gone. When the worker dies his work remains to be carried on by other hands. Let our dreamers and our workers unite. The world has need of both. Let us form a religious body approaching as near as may be to the ideals which Christ has given us. We have leavened the intellectual Christianity of the world. Let us now leaven the world with practical Christianity. Others may have "the true doctrine of practical Godliness" as well as we, but, where they are trammelled we are free. The first move is, therefore, with us.

We like, sir, your idea of faithfulness for each man in his "own place of duty," but still we want to hear your slogan cry ringing out over the whole country, that we may unite and follow you to victory.

JOHN CAMPBELL.

CONSISTENCY.

SIR,—The Bishop of London deserves our unbounded thanks. He is reported in Wednesday's Daily News as saying on the previous evening at the annual meeting of the Association of Lay Helpers for the Diocese that "Nothing gave him more trouble in London than the marriage question. But in this, as far as he could, he stood by the law of the Church as it had been handed down to them. He had been asked quite recently to consent to the marriage of two American Unitarians in one of their churches, and he had unhesitatingly come to the conclusion that it would be an act of hypocrisy on the part of the clergyman performing the service and an act of hypocrisy on the part of the consenting parties. The marriage service was permeated with the Trinitarian doctrine, and they must see that the service was used only for those who were baptised in the Christian Church." This looks illegal, but it is logical, and it goes much farther than the marriage service. It is a call to Unitarian and rational people of all kinds to straighten their backs, open their eyes, and think. It is a most useful object lesson.

OBITUARY.

MRS. EDMUND MILLS.

On Friday, June 22, Mrs. Mills, widow of the late Edmund Mills, of Accrington, and mother of the Rev. H. V. Mills, of Kendal, passed peacefully away. She was in her seventy-sixth year, and had been ailing for some time, but she maintained her interest in the Oxford-street Unitarian Church to the last. Her husband, who predeceased her five years, was one of the founders of that church, and a very energetic supporter of it till his death, having for several years filled the offices of president and treasurer of the congregation and superintendent of the Sunday-school. Mrs. Mills also was a faithful and earnest supporter, and memories of the good work she did in her quiet and unostentatious manner will be long cherished by those who knew her beautiful and serene Christian life. The interment took place on the 25th at the Burnley-road cemetery, the service being conducted by the Rev. J. Islan Jones.

MR. JOSEPH GREENWOOD.

By the death of Mr. Joseph Greenwood, on Wednesday, June 20, the congregation at Stalybridge have suffered a heavy loss. The deceased, who was in his seventieth year, was one of the founders of the Canal-street Church. Originally a worshipper and worker at the Old Chapel, Dukinfield, in the Sunday-school of which he had been a scholar, he was one of an enthusiastic band of young men and women, who, in the year 1866, left the Church on the hill and established for themselves a new spiritual home nearer their own doors in the valley. From that time until the end came his connection with the Church has been marked by the rarest loyalty and devotion. Regular in his attendance at worship, as far as his enfeebled health would permit, he was also in the habit of paying frequent visits of inspection to the church during the week time, and down to the smallest details connected with its management his interest was almost paternal.

Joseph Greenwood, who had a name for the strictest integrity in all his dealings, was a fairly prosperous tradesman. Out of his modest substance he gave liberally and willingly both to his church and to the poor of the town, irrespective of creed, and a beautiful feature of his generosity was his habit of giving secretly, and his unaffected dislike of being discovered and thanked.

Though never a strong man physically he was always of a cheerful disposition—the mark under such circumstances of a truly religious spirit—and, although he attained to three score years and ten, none of his acquaintances thought of him as an old man.

Mr. Greenwood never married, but gave himself in a fine spirit of chivalry to the claims of his mother and sister, the latter being left to mourn his loss. In the church at Canal-street, where he was much beloved, his death has made a great void. On Sunday morning, June 24, a memorial service took place, when a large congregation of his fellow-worshippers sang a few of his favourite hymns together, and sought consolation from the faith which had sustained him. The funeral took place on the following day at St. Paul's Church, Stalybridge, in the presence of a large gathering of relatives and friends.

ESSAYS IN RESTATEMENT.

VII.—THE WORD OF GOD.

WORD is spoken thought, and, in its fullest sense, everything is word which makes thought known. "The voice of the Lord is upon the waters, the voice of the Lord cleaveth the flames of fire." Every sign of Power, every revelation of Right, every example of Beauty, is a word of God. His thought finds utterance in the material, in the moral, in the spiritual world; in every intimation of Himself there speaks a word.

A word of God spoken in and through man is said to be inspired. The time has gone by for fighting over definitions of inspiration and the exact degree in which a word of God may be said to be inspired; we know now that the action of the Spirit of God on the mind of man is not definable; nor can we distinguish the inspiration of the sacred writer from the inspiration of the poet and the artist, except by saying that the difference is a difference of level, and tendency and effect.

Inspiration may well be claimed in an exceptional degree for the Bible, but no church has ever laid down a strict theory of its inspiration, or guaranteed its literal accuracy. Our own Reformed Church insists only on the "sufficiency" of Holy Scripture. It was the supposed necessity of finding a counterpoise to the authority of the Church that led to Calvinistic insistence on the authority of the Bible. Hence the forced elaborations of the doctrine of inspiration peculiar to Protestantism.

Inspired words, committed to writing, become literature, and are subject to those risks and blunders to which literature is exposed. But the deliverances of God's true messages cannot really hang on the hazards of memory, or on the fate of documents, or on the formation of a Canon. A rigid theory of Scripturalism would be dishonouring to Him. It would wrap up the secrets of His dealings with men in strips and fragments cast out to all the accidents of time and tampering hands, unattested, unsecured, unrenowned. A true view is that which regards scripture as the record of revelation already given—a revelation which is over disclosing itself in the heart of man, and finds in experience its witness and verification.

THE CHILDREN'S COLUMN.

THE CHILDREN'S THANK-OFFERING.

IN the beautiful city of Venice, where her broad water-way, with its palaces on either side, joins the lagoon, rise the two domes of the large and stately Church of Santa Maria della Salute, broad marble steps leading from the sunny water of the lagoon to the portico of the sacred building.

This great church was built more than two hundred years since by the citizens of Venice, as a thank-offering when that dreaded disease, the plague, left their city. And well might they feel thankful! For many long weeks Venice had been given over to fear, suffering, and death; the plague had entered alike the palaces of the rich on the Grand Canal and the houses of the poor overhanging the narrower waterways of the city. Men, women, and little children, when stricken by the disease, had died after a few hours.

At last, the dreadful time was over; the plague left, and the city felt safe again. Then it was that the thankful Venetians gave of their best for the building and adorning of the great church. And surely a worthy thank-offering it was, for prayer and thanksgiving would rise to God from numberless worshippers within the sanctuary; in difficulty or sorrow, men and women would seek help or comfort there, and little children, kneeling, would there receive a blessing. Possibly a stranger within the city might "do a bit of thanksgiving" beneath the great dome for the wonderful beauty of the light at sunset-time over the lagoon and the distant Paduan hills, and upon the domes and palaces of Venice!

Many have been the thank-offerings made at different times and in various lands for some special blessing, or when some great difficulty or trouble has passed away. In the older days of Greece and Rome thank-offerings were made to the many gods worshipped there, of the fruits of the earth, of the finest of the flocks and herds. A man would offer what he had helped to produce or to tend—a vine-grower his grapes, and a shepherd the firstborn of his flock. The priest laid the offering upon the altar, while hymns were sung telling of the goodness of the gods to man. Among the Jews thank-offerings were made to the One God worshipped by the Hebrew nation of the flesh of animals, of "cakes mingled with oil," and of "cakes of fine flour."

In Christian times men had learnt that the offering of animals upon God's altar could not be pleasing to Him, but that kindness to all His creatures is for ever acceptable in His sight. They had learnt, too, that in loving and helping one another they were bringing a richer thank-offering to Him than all the finest fruits of the earth.

In the spirit of the Founder of Christianity, who, in the Jewish Temple, brought the Scribe to confess that "to love his neighbour as himself is more than all whole burnt offerings and sacrifices," churches are built as thank-offerings, and institutions to help those who cannot help themselves, and cots are placed in the hospital wards where suffering children may be tenderly nursed.

The yearly Festival when the birth of Jesus Christ is kept in special remembrance, and when from ancient custom there is merry-making throughout the land, is responsible for many a thank-offering, in acts of kindness and goodwill. The once hard-hearted Scrooge, in "The Christmas Carol," after he had dreamt of the good, kind Christmas Spirit, and had learnt of it, went out on Christmas morning and sent off the "prize turkey" to his clerk's poor household, and became a second father to "tiny Tim, who bore a little crutch, and had his limbs supported by an iron frame."

Now, what can you happy boys and girls offer in thanksgiving to God for all your blessings? For sunny days through all the hours of which love and care are round about you; for shelter, as far as that may be, from all harm; for the comfort that surrounds you from morning to night; for all the happiness and all the pleasure which make the days seem all too short?

I think the answer is this: You can strive to be good and true and kind each day. This will make those who love you most happier and richer than anything else could; this is your thank-offering to them, and to God Himself, and a royal offering it is!

You know who it is that does so much for your comfort each day, who it is that makes your bed so snug and comfortable for you when you are tired at night. You know who it is that has been busy preparing your breakfast or dinner for you when you come in hungry after your lessons or your games. How can you show your thankfulness? I think you can show it by remembering to be kind and courteous at all times to those who serve you in any way.

Those travellers who are obliged to cross a part of the great African desert sometimes come suddenly upon a little green spot in the midst of the sand, where they find a spring of water and the shade of a palm-tree. Here the hot and tired traveller can rest and refresh himself and his camel before he starts again upon his journey across the sandy plain.

For all your happiness, can you not sometimes make an offering which may help and make happier, for a time at least, some poor children who perhaps have no one to love them; who are hungry, but cannot get enough food; who have no snug bed to lie upon? Though you may not be able to change the lives of these children, you can brighten their lives sometimes by a bit of kindness, some little surprise-present or other pleasure, which may make the rough way they have to tread seem a little less rough for some way further on, as the oasis in the desert helps the traveller in his journey across the hot dry sand. These are some of the thank-offerings which you happy boys and girls may make for all your blessings. And these are worthy to stand side by side with the grateful Venetians' offering of the beautiful and stately church, for they, too, are dedicated to God's Holy Service.

LIFE'S FRUITION.

WE have hardly room for more than a word on the proceedings at the close of the Manchester College session at Oxford, fully reported here; but that report bears its own testimony, especially in the speeches made by Dr. DRUMMOND and Dr. ODGERS on their retirement from active connection with the work of the College, and the speeches of friends in grateful recognition of what the College owes to these two teachers. Both were students of the College, and Dr. DRUMMOND has now completed thirty-seven years in its service; for though he only went up to London and began teaching early in 1870, he was appointed to his chair in 1869, and preparation for that work would begin at once, if indeed it is not more true to say that his whole previous life of study and consecration to the ministry had been in preparation for it. We have already spoken, in THE INQUIRER of Nov. 4, 1905, and Jan. 27 of this year, of what Dr. DRUMMOND's connection with the College has been and is to us, and only repeat here our thankfulness that his presence is to remain with us at Oxford, and our hope for rich fruits from the leisure on which he now has entered. Of Dr. ODGERS, Mr. WICKSTED at the Trustees' meeting spoke true and beautiful words, and of his leisure also we shall cherish a like hope. The supreme thing in either case is in the personality of the teacher and friend, in whose presence we become aware of the strong and deep things of the Spirit. We ask of both fresh gifts in the interpretation of that diviner life on which they have so sure a hold, and in which they have such power of ministry.

Of Dr. CARPENTER's new task as Principal of Manchester College there is more to say, but for this we must take another occasion. The speeches on Thursday week gave much food for reflection as to how the College may more perfectly accomplish its true mission.

MANCHESTER COLLEGE, OXFORD.

CLOSE OF THE SESSION.

THE annual proceedings at the close of the session took place at the College on Thursday, June 21, and were of unusual significance and interest in the history of the College, as they marked the retirement of Dr. Drummond from the Chair of Divinity, to which he was appointed in 1869, and the Principalship of the College, which he has held for twenty-one years; and also the retirement of Dr. J. Edwin Odgers from the Hibbert Lectureship on Ecclesiastical History, which he has held for the past twelve years. Resolutions in acknowledgment of the eminent services of these two teachers were passed at the Trustees' Meeting, and in the evening, as none of the students had completed their course, and there was therefore no Valedictory Service, Dr. Drummond's old students gave an At Home, when his portrait, by Sir George Reid, was presented to the College.

It was a happy coincidence that on the morning of that same day, at a congregation of the University, in the Sheldonian Theatre, the degree of D.Litt. was conferred on the Rev. J. Estlin Carpenter, who now becomes Principal of Manchester College.

The College proceedings began with a brief devotional service in the chapel, and a sermon by Mr. M. Rowe, B.A. Then after the reading in the lecture-room of some passages from essays by other students, a second sermon was preached by Mr. Stanley Mellor, B.A., the senior student, and this was followed by the Visitor's Address, by the Rev. Charles C. Coe, F.R.G.S.

A report of the Visitor's Address we are obliged to hold over until next week.

THE TRUSTEES' MEETING.

The annual summer meeting of Trustees was held in the afternoon, in the library, the President, the Rev. S. A. Steinthal, in the chair. The other Trustees present were Dr. Drummond (Principal), Dr. Carpenter, Dr. Odgers, the Revs. C. B. Upton, W. Addis, and L. P. Jacks (of the Teaching Staff), the Revs. C. C. Coe and P. H. Wicksted (Visitors), the Rev. H. Enfield Dowson (chairman of committee), Mrs. Carpenter and Mrs. Jacks, Messrs. Russell Scott, R. Harrop, W. Long, Grosvenor Talbot, G. H. Leigh, J. Harrison, A. W. Worthington, H. P. Greg, and F. W. Monks; the Revs. C. Hargrove, C. T. Poynting, P. M. Higginson, Jeffery Worthington, J. Collins Odgers, W. G. Tarrant, R. T. Herford, F. K. Freeston, Gordon Cooper, and V. D. Davis; Mr. A. H. Worthington and the Rev. H. Gow (hon. secretaries), and Mr. E. W. Marshall (assistant secretary).

The minutes of the last meeting of Trustees were read and confirmed, and the catch-words of minutes of subsequent meetings of the committee were read, and questions asked as to those concerning new appointments.

The PRESIDENT said that meeting could not be as pleasant as they might desire, for they had to bid farewell to two of those who had worked with the College in such a way as to have won the affectionate respect and regard of all the Trustees and all connected with the College. And since their last meeting death had also been busy in their ranks. The resolution of the Committee on the death of Mr. David Ainsworth had been read. He and his brothers were students of the College, and the one representative of the family who remained was one of the few lay-students who was still in connection with them. They grieved over the loss of Mr. David Ainsworth, because in so many ways, with perfect love of the College and enthusiasm for its objects, he served them faithfully for many years. And in the last few days they had lost one who was a very factor of the College, who had done rich service, not merely in the precious gift of that organ which added so much to the beauty of their services, but who in her kind sympathy and gentle character won the affection of their students and the reverent regard of all who were privileged to know her. They missed Mrs. Buckton's presence there, and he could not take the business of the meeting without giving some expression to what they felt. On the other hand, he referred to one thing that must gladden them. He heard with great pleasure that the University had that day conferred on their future Principal the degree of D.Litt., an honour well deserved, and one which they trusted Dr. Carpenter would long rejoice to wear.

Mr. RUSSELL SCOTT proposed, and the Rev. W. G. TARRANT seconded, the resolution of grateful acknowledgment to the Principal, Professors, and Lecturers, and Dr. DRUMMOND spoke in response.

The Rev. C. T. POYNTING moved, and the Rev. R. T. HERFORD seconded, the resolution of thanks to the visitors, and of special thanks to Mr. Coe for his address, with a request that he would allow it to be published; to which, in responding, he consented.

The students then came in, and the President distributed the essay prizes and Daniel Jones grants. Messrs. Stanley Mellor, Felix Holt, F. Sinclair, M. Rowe, J. C. Ballantyne, and Charles Raffay were the recipients of prizes. The Russell Martineau prize for Hebrew was not this year awarded.

Dr. Drummond's Retirement.

The Rev. H. ENFIELD DOWSON moved:—

"That the trustees of Manchester College in recording the resignation of the Rev. James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., D.Litt., the revered Professor of Divinity for thirty-six years and Principal for twenty-one years, desire to convey to him their heartfelt regret that the time has come for the severance of a connection consecrated on his part by services which have been rendered with such true devotion, and tender to him the warmest assurances of their esteem and affection. They wish at once to express their deep sense of the value of his life and work to the College, and its students, and to many beyond its walls, their gratitude for his unflinching allegiance to its principles, their admiration for his scholarship, their reverence for his saintly life, and their hope that he may long be spared to advance by his writings that Catholic and spiritual religion of Christ which during his long tenure of his chair and of the Principalship he has served with so constant a fidelity."

It was, he said, as a life-long friend of Dr. Drummond's that he moved that resolution. When in 1857 he went up to Manchester New College in London it was his privilege to be brought under many high and noble personal influences, not alone of the great teachers who inspired so many, but of fellow-students, James Drummond, Charles Barnes Upton, Edwin Odgers, Estlin Carpenter, Richard Armstrong, Philip Wicksteed—a galaxy of college friends, all happily, with the exception of Mr. Armstrong, still living. From the first day that he saw Dr. Drummond's face and heard his voice, his noble spirit and high moral elevation had been one of the great influences of his life. As Professor, Dr. Drummond had worthily filled the chair held by great and good men before him. He had won recognition far beyond the College, of which his high scholarship was one of the greatest assets, while his life in their midst had been a constant inspiration, a great personal influence. He had a living power over the young men who came under his touch which they would never forget. And he bore testimony to the admirable spirit in which Dr. Drummond had filled the office of Principal. On many public occasions it had been his duty to represent the College before the world, and a more thorough grasp of its principles no man ever had. They honoured him for the manner in which, when occasion arose, he vindicated those principles and embodied the spirit of their Alma Mater. Though that was the last occasion on which they would have Dr. Drummond with them as their Principal he would be with them in sympathy as long as he lived, and their hearts would follow him through the remainder of his life. They hoped long to have the support of his noble Christian character and lofty spirit, leading many lives higher and higher, as in the past, into something like his own spiritual insight, and nearer to his own spiritual faith.

Mr. WILLIAM LONG seconded the resolution, and heartily joined in the expressions of affection and admiration for Dr. Drummond.

Dr. CARPENTER said that it would be most acceptable to Dr. Drummond on that occasion that words should be few, but it was impossible to have worked with him during his long term of service in the College, and not wish to give some utterance to their deep sense of affection and respect. When he himself reached Manchester College in 1860, Dr. Drummond was already in the service of the ministry in Manchester, but it was impossible not to feel the presence of the spirit he had left behind; and when nine years later he accepted the New Testament chair in the college, and published the volume of his sermons on "Spiritual Religion," he revealed to those who had not the opportunity of making his personal acquaintance the secret of that influence he had so long exercised there. For thirty-one happy years Mr. Upton and he had been Dr. Drummond's colleagues, and for twenty-one of those years he was Principal. Everyone in Oxford knew what the college had owed to Dr. Drummond since its establishment there, at the gates of the University, both on account of his learning, which was of a character peculiarly fitted to win the esteem of Oxford scholars, and from his devotion to the principles of the College, of which he had so firm a grasp, and which he expounded with such lucidity and force. That grasp of its conception of truth, liberty, and religion, which marked his public utterances, marked also his treatment of his colleagues. No one would say that they were all alike either in temperament, or way of thinking, or ecclesiastical sympathy, but they found their harmony in Dr. Drummond. He desired that they should have the same freedom which he exercised, and the fullest share in the work of administration. He was their adviser and trusted friend. Of his private support in dark hours of sudden trial, he could not speak. Dr. Drummond had been to them all a helper and a stay, and whatever success had attended the work of the College since they came to Oxford started first and chiefly from the Principal who had served it so well. While such a parting must bring sorrow, they rejoiced that Dr. Drummond would still be in their midst, always ready to give them the advice and help they would surely need. And they hoped that his ripe scholarship, which had not yet produced its fullest fruits (for there were books written but not published, and books planned but not yet written), would now have its opportunity, and that in future years Dr. Drummond would have strength to give those books to the world, and so leave his final bequest to the students of the College and the larger world of theological inquirers, which was learning at last to know his worth—a bequest that would preserve his memory, and make his spirit still operative in their lives.

The PRESIDENT, in putting the resolution, referred to other friends in the North, who were with them in sympathy on that occasion, for Dr. Drummond's work as minister of Cross-street Chapel would not soon be forgotten, and in the old school at Lower Mosley-street his name was still not infrequently spoken with that reverent love which he had so fully earned. At the President's call the whole meeting rose to signify acceptance of the resolution, of which he then handed to Dr. Drummond an engrossed copy.

Dr. DRUMMOND, in responding, said it was difficult for him to speak on such an occasion. It was impossible to appropriate all the kind things that had been said, for while they in the generosity of their hearts might see the good and appreciate it, he knew there was much evil, which must seriously qualify the picture as it presented itself to his own eyes. Yet he might sincerely claim to have tried to do his duty as a professor in that College, and he claimed no more. At such a time thought naturally strayed back to the past, and he recalled the memory of those with whom he had been happily associated, when as a young man he went up to London: first Dr. Martineau, his Principal, who for all the years in which they were closely connected, treated him with unvarying kindness and consideration; and his son, Russell Martineau, who was not so widely known as he should have been; and among the visitors, Mr. Gaskell, to whom he had gone as a young colleague in Manchester, and Mr. Thom, with his deep spiritual thought and his earnest and impressive speech, and Dr. Sadler, whose ministry at Hampstead his family attended for so many years, a man of wide reading, simple character, and deepest devotional feeling. Of the secretaries of the College he recalled Dr. Charles Beard, with his high ideals and his eloquent tongue, distinguished not only by depth and earnestness of character and large attainments, but by the buoyancy of his rich and rejoicing spirit. Another secretary, Mr. Darbishire, was still among them, and he must not speak of the living; but they knew what he had done and was. During his principalship the chief event was the coming to Oxford. On that he would say a word or two, for he understood that there was considerable dissatisfaction with the result of their Oxford movement. If that was so, there must have been some who had exaggerated expectations impossible to realise. Their reception and the position they had gradually established was beyond anything they had any right to expect. The dissatisfaction arose perhaps from the fact that from a variety of causes their undergraduates had not taken so high a place in the University as they would like. But many of them came up seriously handicapped in competition with public-school men, and he thought they had done exceedingly creditably. And it should be remembered that whereas in London the undergraduates, while studying at University College, were in close relations with their own professors, who read with them in various subjects, they were now in no way responsible for the success or ill-success of the undergraduates who were preparing to come to them. Until they had their degrees the men were responsible to the Oxford college they joined, or to the Delegacy. At the same time there was a certain disadvantage in the present arrangement, if the College was regarded as a seminary for the training of ministers for a particular Nonconformist denomination, for at Oxford the men were thrown into circumstances adverse to their future career, and were cut off from the active life of the churches they intended to serve. They did not have, as in London, the natural association with those churches. Though they did what they could through vacation work, the other influence could not be altogether counterbalanced.

In conclusion, he expressed great gratitude for the kindness with which he had always been treated, and especially by his colleagues. It did not require any balancing force on his part, for there was never any trace of want of harmony. They knew that every man must have his own thought, and as thought was limited it must vary; and the very growth of thought depended on variation. But under it all there was the same simple devotion to duty, the same profound homage to the Christian spirit, the same earnest desire that whatever they might think or say, or do, they should be in conformity with that spirit, and nothing in their teaching should have any faintest touch of insincerity; nor would they require any man to accept their opinions except as he was led by his own thought and study to do so. Because that spirit was in their very constitution, the idea of difficulty never occurred. They worked together as brothers, and that, he was assured, would be the future spirit of the College. And now he gladly handed over his office to his dear friend, Dr. Carpenter, who treasured all the high ideals and traditions of the College, to his large scholarship, and earnest devotedness to all the interests of the College, which would ensure for it a great and blessed future.

Dr. Odgers' Retirement.

The Rev. PHILIP H. WICKSTEED then moved:—

"That in receiving the announcement of Dr. Odgers' resignation of the Hibbert Lectureship on Ecclesiastical History, which he has held for twelve years, the Trustees of Manchester College desire to express their great regret at losing from the teaching staff of the College one who, by his great abilities, and high scholarship, and rich stores of knowledge on the subject entrusted to him, lent distinction to his Chair.

"While cordially thanking him for the services which he has rendered in fulfilment of its duties, the Trustees are also deeply grateful to him for all that he has done to aid the settlement of the College at Oxford. They feel that he has always been a most wise and trusted counsellor, whose judgment and influence have been invaluable to the College, and who has contributed much, both by his learning and his personality, to strengthen the position of the College and to make its principles understood and appreciated in its new home."

No one, he said, had a better right than he, on the ground of long, intimate, and affectionate friendship, and of cordial, early-born and ever cherished admiration, to move that resolution. It was an afternoon of reminiscences, and his first acquaintance with Dr. Odgers was in their undergraduate days, which at that time were part of the college life. In those days, Edwin Odgers was seldom detected in the act of acquiring knowledge; he was invariably found in the state of having acquired it. He was the amazement and the ideal of the younger men. He set them a standard which gave elasticity and elation to their sense of what scholarship was. And all the time he had been an inspiration and a strength to them. He never had an hour's chat with Dr. Odgers without feeling amid the great stores of his knowledge the formative touch of a master. Then there was a time when, not only as a scholar but as a seer, he was a light in the same sphere in which shone the pure beauty of the soul of John Hamilton Thom. In that same sphere his light shone, not murky or obscure or common-place.

They felt that in him there were flashes of insight; no one could be brought into communion with him without a deepening of soul and enrichment in knowledge. He trusted that neither they nor the College were severing their connection with Dr. Odgers, but that in the years to come they would see an increasing stream of the expressed and formulated knowledge and wisdom, which they had drawn so often from the living source.

Mr. H. P. GREG, who seconded, said he wished he could express the deep gratitude the Trustees felt towards Dr. Odgers for the many services he had rendered the College. But for his guidance and intimate knowledge of university affairs, they would have had much greater difficulty than they had in the settlement at Oxford, and he had rendered invaluable services as secretary of the Board of Studies. He had shown very keen business capacity, and, what was more valuable, an enormous amount of common-sense. With regard to his influence on the students, every one of them to whom he had spoken agreed that he was a very human man indeed, to whom they could go in any difficulty, and find in him a friend, broad-minded, and one who, if there was need, would reprove in a thoroughly earnest manner. His keen sense of humour had been a great help in understanding and getting to the heart of the students. His interest in the College had been of the keenest, and he was sure that while his direct connection as a lecturer was ceasing they would always have, as long as his life lasted, his encouragement and help.

The resolution was very cordially passed, and an engrossed copy of it was handed to Dr. Odgers by the President.

Dr. ODGERS, in responding, said he knew that would be a time of formal leave-taking, and he thought he could bear the language of the resolution they had just passed. But they would understand that there had been introduced into the formal words, and into the official communication, an element of personal feeling, which he must reciprocate so deeply that he could not speak of it. There was nothing that smote one more hardly than eulogy one felt not to have deserved. And few things that made an occasion like that memorable could be compared with the sense that one lived more than one had ever thought in the heart and life of others. He knew not how to thank them for words which seemed to have brought him face to face with an old self, which had become to him almost a forgotten ideal. It was solemnising in the last degree; but now he must put that away, for he could not speak of it. And he would say what he had meant to hold on to, as the cheering thought that was going to take him through the crisis of that day. It was good that those changes should come. It was good that they should hand on the torch to fresh and keener runners; good that they should, before they must, hand on the trusts and responsibilities of life. And he was thankful for what work he had been able to do. He was thankful for the connections into which it had brought him with old and young; he was thankful to God for what ability growing responsibility and growing effort had trained in him. He hoped there might still be some fruit off the old tree. But, above all, he would assure them that as in the years that were gone, so in those that remained, whatever he could do would still be absolutely at the disposal of Manchester College. He thanked them most heartily, those who had spoken of him and to him, in a way that had been one of the solemn surprises of his life, for what they had said and what he had felt.

Dr. DRUMMOND having announced that the new session would begin on Saturday, October 13, when the students would be expected to attend at 9 A.M., moved a cordial vote of thanks to the President. This was seconded by Dr. ODGERS, and passed with acclamation.

The PRESIDENT, in responding, spoke of his recollections of the College, which went back a little over sixty-one years. Every year his admiration for its principles deepened in intensity. Changes came, and men passed away, but the College remained, and they who were old students were prouder of it than ever to-day. The longer they lived the more deeply they felt their indebtedness to it.

OLD STUDENTS' "AT HOME." PRESENTATION OF THE PORTRAIT OF DR. DRUMMOND.

In the evening an "At Home" was given at the College by Dr. Drummond's old students, their senior, the Rev. J. Collins Odgers, of Liverpool, and Mrs. Odgers, receiving the guests in the Library. The occasion was taken to present to the College a portrait of Dr. Drummond, by Sir George Reid, R.S.A., and at the same time a framed photograph of the portrait to Mrs. Drummond, and an engrossed address to Dr. Drummond himself. These gifts were made by seventy-three old students and 104 other friends. The photograph was by the Berlin Photographic Company, the address was bound in morocco by Zaehnsdorf. Of the portrait, which was placed on an easel in the library, various opinions were expressed, but while one or two were strongly adverse, others were very warm in approval, and the prevailing judgment was that it was a striking portrait and a powerful work of art, which would certainly grow upon one with time.

There were about a hundred guests, including a number of old students and other donors to the portrait, but many were kept away by distance and other causes, and sent letters of regret and warm sympathy with the occasion. Among these were Miss Gertrude and Miss Edith Martineau, Mrs. Russell Martineau, the Misses Gaskell, Mrs. Ashton, Mrs. H. R. Greg, Mrs. George Holt, Mrs. Aspland, Mrs. Enfield, Mr. W. Colfox, Mr. W. B. Bowring, Mr. F. Nettlefold, Mr. John Harrison, Mr. Harrop, Mr. Montefiore, Mr. J. H. Brooks, and Mr. Rayner Wood. Among other friends who sent letters of regret for absence were the Master of Balliol and Mrs. Card and Professor James Seth, of Edinburgh. Mr. Sukhtankar sent a telegram of greeting from Bonn.

The Rev. J. COLLINS ODGERS took the chair at nine o'clock, and speaking as one who had felt the inspiration of Dr. Drummond's teaching and the force of his personal example, dwelt upon the debt of gratitude they owed to him. Dr. Drummond had taught them the value of exact scholarship, and in his reading, especially of the Pauline Epistles, they had received from him an intellectual regeneration, and at the same time a moral quickening. They learnt much from the earnestness, the enthusiasm, the whole-hearted devotion which he brought to bear on all the daily duties at college. He never spared himself or slackened his devotion to their benefit. And he allowed them to encroach on his valuable leisure on Saturday afternoons by walks with him, and having them at his house afterwards. "But we received something more," Mr. Odgers concluded; "I believe I may say that it is true that no student could attend his lectures without receiving a spiritual regeneration as well. I remember the wonderful manner in which he unfolded to us the deep spiritual meaning of the Pauline Epistles. Before that time they had been for the most part unintelligible to me; it required a mind of deep spiritual perception to give us the interpretation thereof, and that mind we found in our teacher. I suppose every one of Dr. Drummond's students treasures in his library a volume of sermons, entitled 'Spiritual Religion,' preached at Cross-street Chapel, before he was called to London. In that book the ordinary reader may find expressed in choicest language some of those great spiritual truths which found an echo in our minds in the lecture-room at University Hall, truths which may be regarded as summed up in the verse from the Epistle to the Galatians which is printed on the title-page, and which chanced to be the very text of one of the discourses we heard this morning:—Χριστῷ συνεσταύρωμαι ζῶ δέ, οὐκ ἐγὼ ζῶ, ὁ Χρὶς δὲ ἐν ἐμοὶ Χριστός. ['I am crucified with Christ: nevertheless I live; yet not I, but Christ liveth in me.'] On the last page of the last sermon preached at the close of 1869 at Cross-street Chapel, there are words of spiritual significance which more than once have helped me in despondent moods. And I quote them now, not only because they have helped me, and may help many another when entering on his duties as a Christian minister, but also because I regard them as illustrations of the spiritual help and impetus which we derived in the old days from our revered teacher:—"With such an ideal"—that of Christ living and reigning in the soul—"one almost wonders at the presumption which can undertake so great an office as that of the Christian ministry. But it is not for us, when once the design of Providence is clear to our conviction, to measure our own powers, but humbly to accept, with all our sins and deficiencies, the work which God assigns us. Our treasure is in earthen vessels, that the excellency of the power may be of God and not of us. It is He who lights the ideal before our thought, and keeps it so far above us that pride may not come in and spoil our efforts. Following with such faltering steps, and with such inconsistent will, the divine leading, we can only give thanks to God for whatever good we may achieve and implore his pardon for the ill. And when any one with any loftiness of purpose looks back on an attempt to realise the dream of his boyhood, and the aspirations which the mercy of heaven has kindled in his heart, he can only rest in the long-suffering love of his Father and own how blessed is he whose transgression is forgiven, whose sin is covered. But forgetting the failures of the past, and retaining only the humility and wisdom which they may have taught, let us look hopefully to the future, and commit ourselves in trust to each new task which God appoints us, believing that he who has led us hitherto will lead us still." Friends, in this last evening of the College session, in this final parting of the ways, what words could I quote more in harmony with what I feel sure is in all our hearts this night?"

The Rev. V. D. DAVIS, who had acted as secretary to the portrait committee, then read the address as follows, and handed it to Dr. Drummond.—

THE ADDRESS.

To the Rev. James Drummond, M.A., LL.D., Litt.D., Principal of Manchester College, Oxford.

DEAR DR. DRUMMOND,—

Your old students, together with a number of other friends, are thankful to be allowed to present your portrait, by Sir George Reid, to the College, and at the same time to ask Mrs. Drummond's acceptance of a print of the portrait.

We asked to be allowed to secure this portrait for the College in connection with the congratulations in which we joined on your seventieth birthday, when your old students sent you a letter of greeting "out of the heart of our gratitude and of the affectionate regard and high honour in which we hold you, as our teacher and friend."

We spoke then of your long association with the College as adding fresh lustre to its roll of teachers, and recalled the memory of John James Tayler, to whose chair you succeeded, and of James Martineau, whom you followed as Principal. We did not know then that your retirement from active service was so near, but now that this presentation of your portrait coincides with the close of your Principalship and of the thirty-seven years during which your life has been devoted to the College, it is with yet deeper feelings of affection and of grateful recognition of what the College has owed to you, that we repeat these words of our birthday letter:—

"We do not attempt here even to enumerate your achievements as a Christian scholar, still less to appraise their high worth. We desire simply to acknowledge the priceless gifts we have received from you in the noble ideal of scholarship you have set before us, in the passion of pure loyalty to truth, in your deep insight into the mind of Christ and the conditions of a true discipleship, your demonstration to us of the abiding truths of spiritual religion, and, if we may be permitted to say so, their manifestation in the graces of a beautiful character."

And this earnest hope, with which our letter closed, "that strength may still be granted you in peaceful years, that we may receive from you fresh gifts out of the stores of your ripe experience and wisdom, for the further enrichment of Christian scholarship and the devout literature of a living faith."

The names are here added, first of the other friends who have joined in this gift to the College, and then of your old students, who also join in the gift.

The Rev. EDGAR I. FRIPP then spoke, as Dr. Drummond's first senior student after he became Principal, a fact, he said, of which he was not sure that Dr. Drummond was quite so proud as he was. He recalled the old days when Dr. Martineau and Dr. Drummond were working together at University Hall, and spoke of his own feeling that Dr. Martineau did not seem to realise on the social side the implications of his own noble philosophy. Such a discrepancy they never felt in Dr. Drummond. He could recall debate after debate in which Dr. Drummond almost invariably differed from his chief in taking, as they thought, the side of liberty, righteousness, and pity towards the oppressed, and he knew their hearts as young men went out to him in gratitude for the way in which he spoke, and the manner in which he led them in the direction of reform and justice in the land. Those who only knew Dr. Drummond in the study or the lecture room would perhaps be surprised if they saw him on a political platform. Perhaps some of them might remember—and as it happened twenty years ago he might be permitted to refer to it—a meeting in favour of Home Rule that was held in London. Those who were present and heard the magnificent speech Dr. Drummond made on behalf of what he deemed justice for the Irish people would never forget it. Dr. Drummond seemed to combine some of the finest qualities of the Teuton with those of the Celt. His carefulness, his earnestness, his microscopic accuracy of workmanship, combined with high dreams and prophetic passion, were elements mingled in his nature, the Conservative and the Radical, the balance of mind and high dreams for mankind. He had often thought it a pity that Dr. Drummond had not the liberty to go up and down the country preaching in their pulpits. He believed that if they had his fervour and deep religiousness in their work many of their churches would not be sinking into the decrepitude which seemed to be their fate. And, furthermore, there was no man who had been such a champion as Dr. Drummond had been for their catholic principles; he had been faithful among the faithful to the traditions that came down to them from Baxter and their Presbyterian forefathers; and so long as he lived the sectarian spirit among them would never dare to raise its head very high. Of Dr. Drummond's scholarship it was not for him to speak. Their libraries were enriched by his writings. His "Jewish Messiah," his "Philo-Judæus," his Hibbert Lectures, his study of the Fourth Gospel, his commentaries on St. Paul's writings and other works had given him a European reputation.

But if he might venture to specify one subject in which he thought he excelled, it was as the interpreter of the Apostle Paul. It seemed to him, and he believed there was a consensus of feeling amongst them on this point, that Dr. Drummond was the foremost interpreter of the mind of the great Apostle, the foremost living interpreter. They were all proud of him; they recognised in him at once all that made a great scholar and noble Christian—unflinching industry, high ideals, spiritual passion, self-effacement and modesty—he had lived in a rare atmosphere among those things, in the language of his beloved Apostle, that were true and venerable, just and pure and lovely and of good report, and they gratefully and gladly laid that night their homage at his feet.

Mr. A. H. WORTHINGTON, speaking as one of the donors who was not an old student, said that though he was incapable of saying what he felt on that occasion, he yielded to none in the homage he felt towards the character and life and work of Dr. Drummond. His first recollection of Dr. Drummond was as a boy of somewhere between six and ten attending the Bible-class on Sunday mornings in Cross-street Chapel. Among the vivid recollections of his childhood and among the real impressions made upon his life he classed the work which Dr. Drummond did in that Bible-class. He also remembered Dr. Drummond's face in the Cross-street pulpit before he came to Manchester College; he did not understand his sermons, but he did remember how he looked, and he could wish there was more of that look on the face in the portrait. He also remembered the way his father and mother spoke in his childhood and had always spoken, and his father spoke to that day, of their debt to his ministry at Cross-street. That was not an occasion in which the College appeared except as a recipient, but he could not pass by the opportunity without saying a word or two about the connection that he as one of the humble officers of the College, had with Dr. Drummond in various ways. During his term of office the unfailing courtesy, the absolute soundness of judgment, the rectitude of purpose which had always characterised Dr. Drummond's official and unofficial acts had been of the most striking and perfect nature. How fully he had grasped the principles for which the College stood, how nobly he had stood forth, and how faithfully he had served them, must be in the minds of everybody who knew anything about Manchester College. Dr. Drummond's whole life had been a living witness to those principles. If one wanted to find what the College aimed at, what the College strove in its humble way to promote and to serve, one could not do better than go to the various addresses Dr. Drummond had delivered on various occasions, at the opening of the College, at the Martineau Cen'enary, or on those critical occasions when in times of difficulty he had to speak and to show the students and professors, and the Trustees, what was the only possible line for the College to take. In all soberness, and without any rhetoric, for he had none, without exaggeration he believed the name of James Drummond would be added to the roll of principals of the College, which, looking backwards, started with Martineau, Tayler, Kenrick, Wellbeloved, Barnes, and, to go somewhat into the ancestry of the College, Frankland, and would stand worthily on that roll. The ideals that he had received from their hands he had not let grow dim, and he handed them on to his successor untarnished. No one of them could foresee what the future of the College might be, but he could not help feeling that, if anything was certain, the principles and the ideals for which Dr. Drummond had laboured unceasingly would endure to the end.

Dr. DRUMMOND, in acknowledging the gifts, said he could not be but very profoundly touched by all the kind words which had been spoken that evening and by the beautiful present which had been handed to him, and the copy of the portrait which had been given to his wife. It would be treason to doubt for one moment the perfect sincerity of all that had been said, but it did not rouse in him any feelings of vanity or any claim for himself. It only proved the truth of what he had always held since he was himself a student of the College, that there was in the human heart that which could be reached, and the susceptible mind of youth would always be open to teaching which was simple and genuine. Great ideals which floated before one's mind were none of one's own creation, but came to one with an imperative claim, revealing themselves in some way in spite of all unfaithfulness and shortcomings. He could have no greater blessing in retiring from the office which he had held so long than to know, as he now knew, how much the students had felt they had derived from his teaching, and that they were brought into some higher realm of thought and feeling. There was one point to which he would like to refer that had been spoken of as an act of self-denial on his part, and which he would like to assure them was nothing of the kind. The Saturday walks and talks were amongst the delightful parts of his life in London, and he would have felt very grievously cut off if he had been confined to the class room and never been brought into the close intimate union with his students which he had always desired. He could not to this day feel very much older than his students. His heart was altogether in sympathy with young men; he always rejoiced to know their thoughts, to see their efforts and aspirations, and to do as much as he could to encourage what was best in themselves, not following their teachers in any slavish imitation, but simply being themselves, and devoting all their powers to the realisation of the highest ideals that God might reveal in their souls. And now in regard to the College itself, and the principles for which it had always stood. Did they know that its origin was the Act of Uniformity? Their forefathers were driven out of the ancient seats of learning, and efforts were made to destroy their learning among them. It was a crime to teach, but they were determined to provide for themselves University education. That was an ideal conception —the ideal that had run through all these academies for the last two hundred years or more, to provide University learning, especially for the ministry and the Nonconformist churches. In doing that their forefathers formed a very distinct conception of what University learning meant. Of course, it meant scholarship and everything taught at the Universities, but it meant a great deal more. It seemed to them that the ancient seats of learning were untrue to the University idea, that they constituted themselves into a sect; they drove out all who did not conform to the sect, and they usurped and appropriated all knowledge and learning to themselves. Their forefathers, on the contrary, decided that a University must be absolutely unlimited in regard to the exercise of thought. They had suffered from restrictions which were imposed upon them, and they determined not to impose similar restrictions on others, and, therefore, these academies were really public institutions, founded on public principles and aiming at a public constituency. They sought to set the old Universities a model of what a University ought to be both in learning and in spirit, that had come down to the present day, and he thought the College had always been true to that. They had recognised the simple fact that men of equally good intentions, of equally high motives, had differed from one another, and often fundamentally on difficult theological questions; therefore, as these differences arose in the normal and necessary exercise of human intelligence, they allowed for such variation; they encouraged it, and believed that the absolute truth could be reached not by following any single line, but by the united efforts of mankind they would bring to a focus all the various efforts of the highest intellectual and spiritual powers, hoping in that way they would move along converging lines, and by looking to the great central and eternal light, would continually approach one another and at last, it might be, arrive at complete mental unity. But in carrying out this ideal it had come to pass that they had been practically confined, not absolutely, but with comparatively small exceptions, to a single denomination; and that denomination had resolutely refused to lay down denominational lines. It had been composed simply of men excluded from other denominations, religious and thinking men with theology of their own. But a university education implied more than learning and teaching, however broad and free. He thought every University man would feel that a very large part, perhaps the most valuable part, of University influences had been the association of men with one another who had had a different bringing up, who had belonged to different denominations, and yet met as equals to discuss with perfect frankness, and express all their doubts and all their beliefs, and to find everywhere the same respect and the same good fellowship as long as character was sound and aim was high. Now that kind of University education they had not yet succeeded in perfectly attaining. He believed they had always wished it, and the ancient college of a similar foundation in Carmarthen had in practice carried it out more fully than they had, because, perhaps, Welsh people were less sectarian than English people, but at all events so it was. He could not but look forward to the future. He thought the idea of the College would never be reached until they had brought together in the same class-room men of different theologies, of different denominations, who would mix freely with one another, and who in their own thought would be able to appreciate one another's position. That was attained in living intercourse with men far more easily and fully than from books. It might be done through books to a large extent, but he had always felt that with a teacher of theology, what was wanted above all, was a basis of complete catholicity of religious spirit. By catholicity he meant nothing vague and indefinite, but a fulness of religious nature, not one-sided, not partially developed, but branching out in all directions, and appreciating sympathetically at least, if not in actual practice, all that had been genuinely felt and believed by the men and women about them. He had always felt that could not be secured fully except by living intercourse, and he had always felt it to be a deep defect that he was excluded from this living religious intercourse with men differing from himself. It was so still. He found himself with members of other denominations perfectly friendly as friends, but if they got to the deeper religious questions they were immediately silent. They rested no confidence in him, or they believed he would have no confidence in them, and in this way he thought they cut off, not by their own fault, but in spite of their desires, very valuable sources of religious influence. His hope was that it would be less and less so in that College. In order that they might attain their ideal, which was pressed upon them more and more by their presence in Oxford, he thought in their future appointments, they must go into the wide world and appoint the very best men that they could find, regardless of their ecclesiastical or theological differences of belief. It would, no doubt, be necessary that in appointing such men, they should appoint those who recognised the right of this freedom, and both desired it for themselves and were prepared to give it to others, because it would be a violation of the old principle of their College if a hot proselytiser came in and insisted on his own views being adopted by his students. But as long as a man came with his own profound convictions, while he fully admitted the value and the genuineness of other people's profound convictions, while he encouraged the young men who came under him to think for themselves and required them only to be faithful and true in their thought and their learning, then they should go into the world and find the very best men they could attract to their ranks; and only in this way would it be possible to secure for their students that wide association which he thought was the one thing they needed. Now they spoke, or they must speak, of bringing up students for their own particular group of churches as ministers. He admitted at once that was a very prominent aim, a right and noble aim in the College, but he contended also that they would not bring up men with all the privileges they ought to have if they did not give them the full breadth at which this College aimed, unless they associated them with men in some way who had been brought up under quite different influences, and who had a different way of looking at the great religious questions. It was in this way their own Nonconformist ministry would become not only a learned but a profoundly religious one, with wise and generous sympathies, and with deep spiritual insight. They needed men, above all, of this kind. He was quite sure there never was a time yet in Christian history in which such men could find a more ready hearing. There were multitudes of men in all the churches who were thirsting for the simple, strong, spiritual word; they cared comparatively little about the minutiae of theology, but they did care profoundly about a religion which they could believe and by which they could live. If they were able to send forth men into the Nonconformist pulpits from their College with that large and generous feeling towards all, and with their hearts burning with a religious enthusiasm, they would see a brighter time dawning on those ancient churches than they had seen for some time. He had often longed that they could see the beginnings of that higher state of things, as it seemed to him, in their College. He had seen the beginning of it. He saw it now in his dear friend Mr. Addis—he was devoted to the true interests of their students, he spared no pains in his teaching, he did not seek to proselytise. He hoped Mr. Addis did exert a very deep religious influence upon them, and although he differed from most of them—he supposed more than the other professors—theologically and ecclesiastically, he did not differ in this, in believing that of the three great Christian virtues the greatest was love, and in believing that love lifted up their thoughts to the Eternal Throne from whence it came down, and was distributed into the hearts of God's children. Unity of the spirit was a simple present fact, which they ought to acknowledge, and which they ought to encourage, and he ventured to say that their dear friend, Mr. Addis, was ready to give his whole devotion to the best interests of the College if the College would give its whole-hearted allegiance to him. As to the future, he hoped if he lived long enough he might see some further advance towards real practical breadth such as had been established as a practical fact at Harvard. But meanwhile he simply climbed the mount, and looked from that over the Land of Promise. He still looked forward, and not backward. The ideals were all in front; the golden age had yet to come, and he hoped and believed that in God's good time some strong Joshua would come who would lead their people into the Promised Land, and that at last they would not only realise the high catholic aims of that College, but they would lead towards the true catholic church in which the fulness of God's Spirit should dwell and which should speak to the world the needed words of righteousness, to the bringing in of the golden age of the Kingdom of God. And now, in conclusion, let him thank, from his very heart, all his old students, not only for their generous words and gift, but for the frankness and gentleness and kindness with which they had treated him during all those years. If ever any man had an absolutely happy life, with hardly a break or ruffle, he thought that man was himself, and he ascribed it to the high qualities, the fine true Christian feeling of the men who in succession had come to be enrolled in the ranks of their students, and he was very grateful to them. If he had taught something to them they had also taught something to him, and helped him forward towards his closing years, and he should always look back gratefully and affectionately to that farewell meeting.

The Rev. S. A. STEINTHAL, as President, then said a few words, accepting the portrait on behalf of the College. He referred to the many portraits already on their walls, of men who had done so much for the true religious advancement of the world, and for those principles which Dr. Drummond had just expounded with such clearness and power. He wondered where the new portrait, which they so gladly accepted, would be hung. And he could not refrain from saying that there was another Emeritus professor whose portrait he longed to see there also. (A suggestion which was warmly received by the audience.) He had told Dr. Drummond that he regretted that meeting could not be one of perfect pleasure to them, but he felt that in after years they would look back upon that evening and remember with gratitude that they had been able to express to Dr. Drummond something of the deep reverence and affection which filled their hearts.

NEWS FROM THE CHURCHES.

[Notices and Reports for this Department should be as brief as possible, and be sent in by Wednesday, or Thursday Morning at latest.]

APPEAL.

London: George's Row Mission.—The Rev. F. Summers writes:—"Will you be kind enough to allow me to appeal for assistance to take our Sunday-school children, nearly 400 in number, for their annual day in the country? It is always a time of great delight, especially in so poor and so crowded a district as this is. Donations, which will be thankfully received, may be sent either to 4, Durley-road, Stamford-hill, N., or to the Domestic Mission, George's-row, St. Luke's, E.C."

Altrincham (Presentation).—For nearly a quarter of a century Mr. A. E. Paterson has been the indefatigable and loyal secretary and treasurer of the Dunham-road congregation, and on Thursday, June 21, they marked their high appreciation of his services by the presentation of a handsome tea and coffee service and tray, all of solid silver. After a reception and a short musical programme, a bouquet was presented to Mrs. Paterson, and Mr. Godfrey Worthington took the chair, supported by the Rev. Dendy Agate and Mr. David Little, chairman of the committee. At the opening of the proceedings the chairman gave a brief history of the congregation. Their first chapel was opened in 1814 in Shaw-lane, and in its establishment the chairman's great-grandfather, Mr. John Worthington, had a part. The present chapel was opened in 1872. It was in 1859 that the congregation first appointed a committee, and on Mr. Paterson's father served. He himself joined the committee in 1879, and three years later became secretary and treasurer. Both the chairman and Mr. Agate bore warm testimony to the value of Mr. Paterson's services, and his constant tact and kindness. Mr. Little said that the response to the testimonial fund had been very general and spontaneous. Mr. Paterson acknowledged the gift with much feeling, and gave some interesting reminiscences of his connection both with Shaw-lane and the present chapel. There was a large gathering of the congregation and other friends including several neighbouring ministers.

Belfast: Mountpottinger.—The annual floral services were held on June 24, the Rev. J. Worthington, resident minister, preaching in the morning, and being assisted at a special afternoon service by the Rev. W. King, of Newtownards.

Darlington (Appointment).—The Rev. S. S. Brettell, M.A., has received and accepted the unanimous invitation from the members of the Unitarian Church to become their minister. He will commence his ministry on the first Sunday in October.

Halifax.—On Sunday morning the Rev. P. E. Richards closed his ministry as assistant to the Rev. F. E. Millson, at Northgate-end Chapel, making a slight reference to the occasion at the beginning of his sermon. There was a good attendance. In the evening the Rev. F. E. Millson closed his ministry of thirty-four years. The sermon touched deeply on the calls on a minister in connection with such recurring events as anniversaries, Congregational and school meetings, weddings, burials, &c., and the mutual ties these cemented between minister and people. Mr. Millson spoke of his own habit of keeping an open eye for the good qualities of other churches than our own, noting especially his long series of Sunday evening sermons on "Good Men and Women of various Churches"—and of no church. Mr. Millson said that in his sermons his main object had been to preach to the hearts of his people, not forgetting the intellect. The sermon was listened to with the greatest attention by a large congregation. Many of those present who had listened to Mr. Millson for many years were moved by the charm, the beauty, the simplicity, and the tenderness of this closing sermon. The service was in perfect accord with the occasion. On Monday evening Mr. Millson met the congregation, and gave them a friendly talk about his settlement at Northgate-end in 1872, noting many of the names of old members now passed away, his early attempts at visiting the congregation of that time, his suggestions of alterations in the service from time to time, the introduction of the service book now in use, many notes relating to the Sunday-school, references to ministers who have taken services at Northgate-end during his ministry, the whole proving a most interesting review of persons and events the audience could readily follow. A resolution thanking Mr. Millson for his address was spoken to by members and heartily carried. A resolution in very cordial terms was passed to the Rev. P. E. Richards, for his services to the congregation and the Sunday-school, and Mr. Richards replied, referring to his happy connection with Mr. Millson during the past four years, and also with the congregation and the school. At the annual meeting of the congregation, a few weeks ago, a very hearty resolution was passed to Mr. Millson for his long service.

Heywood.—On June 23 and 24 the congregation worshipping at the Britain Hill Unitarian Chapel, celebrated the fifteenth anniversary of the preaching of Unitarianism in the town. For some time extensive alterations have been made to [the fabric] of church and schools, and on Saturday a reunion of past and present worshippers took place at which 400 friends were present. At this reunion, in addition to the laymen prominently identified to-day with the chapel, several of the old founders were present and spoke. Three of the four ministers of the church addressed the meeting—the Rev. John Fox, of Leeds, J. E. Stead, of Mossley, and T. Bowen Evans, the present minister; the second minister, the late Rev. William Bennett, being represented by his respected widow. On Sunday two appropriate and inspiring sermons were delivered by the Rev. Douglas Walmsley, the Heywood Unitarian Temperance band giving a musical service in the afternoon. Large congregations assembled at all the meetings, which proved most stimulating and helpful.

Huddersfield (Farewell Meeting).—A meeting to bid farewell to the Rev. W. Mellor at the close of his ministry of nearly eight years at the Fitzwilliam-street Church was held on Wednesday evening, June 20. Alderman O. Balmforth, J.P., presided, and spoke highly of the services both of Mr. and Mrs. Mellor. Mr. N. Culley, on behalf of the Church and School Guild, of which Mr. Mellor was the founder, presented to him an illuminated address, and other members of the congregation added expressions of gratitude and regard. Both Mr. and Mrs. Mellor responded, the former giving an interesting address on the chief aims he had set before himself in his ministry. On Sunday, June 24, Mr. Mellor preached his farewell sermons to good congregations, especially in the evening. In the morning the subject was "An Unrealised Ideal—a Free Church," and in the evening "A Parting Commendation." The services and sermons were very moving and impressive, minister and congregation alike being deeply touched by the parting.

London: Bermondsey.—The Sunday School excursion took place on June 26. The party, numbering four-score and two, enjoyed a delightful summer's day on Dartford Heath. Kind contributions from H.C.C., H.E., D.M., F.N., O.N., and Mrs. A.

London: Essex Church.—The Hospital Sunday collection amounted to £213 11s. 9d.

London: Highgate (Presentation).—On Tuesday evening, June 26, a presentation of a time-piece was made to Mr. T. J. Manwell, "by grateful readers, in recognition of seventeen years' devoted services as hon. librarian of the Highgate-hill Free Library." Mr. Withall presided, and both he and Mr. H. G. Chancellor, who made the presentation, bore warm testimony to the great value of Mr. Manwell's services. The old library, readers will remember, has now been handed over to the new public library in Manor-gardens.

London: Stratford.—On three evenings last week the West Ham Lane Temperance Guild and Band of Hope gave successful performances of the cantata "Too Bad."

Moneyrea.—A service for the installation of the Rev. G. J. Slipper as minister, in succession to the late Richard Lyttle, was held on Saturday afternoon, June 23, and was largely attended. The Rev. J. A. Kelly conducted the opening part of the service, and the installation prayer was offered by the Rev. T. Dunkerley. Principal Gordon gave the charge to the minister, and the Rev. W. H. Drummond to the congregation. In the evening a social meeting was held to welcome Mr. and Mrs. Slipper, Mr. A. Spence presiding. Affectionate tribute was paid to the memory of Mr. Lyttle, and good hope expressed for the new ministry. The Rev. Charles Peach, as an old friend of Mr. Lyttle's, Principal Gordon, and the Rev. T. Dunkerley were among the speakers.

Mottram.—Mr. Ernest W. Smith, son of the Rev. H. B. Smith, has taken honours in the final B.Sc. examination in the Victoria University of Manchester.

Sheffield District Sunday-School Union.—On Saturday, June 23, a picnic of teachers and friends was held at Stannington, five schools being represented, and after tea the Rev. C. J. Street gave an interesting address on the hillside on "Religion in the State Schools and in the Sunday-school." Referring to the Government Education Bill, he expressed great disappointment at the course it was taking, and pointed out the growing importance of the religious teaching given in Sunday-schools. A discussion followed, and Mr. Street was heartily thanked for his address, on the motion of Miss A. Wragg, seconded by the Rev. A. H. Dolphin.

Walmsley.—The annual congregational sermons were preached on Sunday June 24. The Rev. H. E. Haycock, of Halliwell-road, Bolton, conducted the morning service, and gave an admirable address to the scholars. The Rev. C. C. Coe, of Bournemouth, preached in the afternoon and evening, and the chapel was so crowded that a large number were unable to gain admission. The choir rendered two special anthems, and the singing of the children at each service was of a very pleasing character. The collections amounted to £56, an increase on last year. The memorial stone of the new school buildings, to be raised at a cost of about £1,000, was laid on Saturday, June 2, by Mrs. Arthur Grog. There was then already about £700 in hand towards the cost.

Yorkshire Unitarian Club.—A meeting of the committee recently appointed to consider the question of this proposed club was held in the committee-room, Priestley Hall, Leeds, on Saturday, June 23, Mr. Henry Lupton presiding. A circular drawn up by a sub-committee, giving particulars relative to the proposed organisation and methods of working, was read and, with a few alterations, approved. It was resolved to send the same out to members of all Unitarian churches within a reasonable distance of Leeds and to request their attendance at a meeting at the commencement of the autumn, when the scheme will be fully considered. A sub-committee, consisting of Rev. John Ellis and Messrs. C. H. Boyle, J. Thornton, F. G. Jackson, and A. Simpson was appointed to make arrangements for this meeting, particulars of which will be announced in due course.

THE wise and good of every age have variously struggled to express in adequate terms the solemnity of human obligation; but all the strivings of their thoughts have culminated in this: "The word of conscience is the voice of God."—James Martineau.

NOTES OF THE WEEK.

THE Session of the Unitarian Home Missionary College closed on Tuesday with the Visitor's address and the Valedictory Service, and a garden party at Summerville, on Wednesday. A report of the proceedings and of the Missionary Conference on the following day we hope to publish next week.

THE Presbyterian College at Carmarthen has this year two students who have secured their B.D. in the University of Wales. This being the fourth successive year in which the College has sent up successful candidates for this degree it will now be admitted as an Associated College of the University, with two representatives on the Theological Board. The proceedings at the close of the session on June 27 we hope to report next week.

ANOTHER University distinction at Oxford we should have noted last week with Mr. Geoffrey Scott's winning of the Newdigate. Mr. Raymond V. Holt, of Lincoln College, son of the Rev. Peter Holt, of Astley, and an external student of Manchester College, won the Stanhope Historical Essay Prize. "Robert Stewart, second Marquis of Londonderry (Viscount Castlereagh)" was the subject of Mr. Holt's essay, which, among the other prizewinners, he had to read at the Encaenia, in the Sheldonian Theatre.

A Times correspondent telegraphs an instructive communication from a prelate in the office of the Papal Secretary of State. The purport of the communication is partly to elevate the secretary, Cardinal Rampolla, and partly to give the view of the French separation law current in Anti-Papal Catholic circles. It throws a queer light on the policy of the Church. "With the new Pope great virtues ascended the throne of St. Peter. Ardent piety, sincere faith, and absolute humility are giving a living example to the whole Christian world. For Pius X. is a saint. But you know that pliability and diplomacy are not the qualities of a saint." His reign is described as a mischievous anachronism. The terrible monks, with the Jesuits at their head, are said to be taking advantage of the candour of the Holy Father. As a result "the Christian democrats are condemned, ostracised, persecuted, and are becoming rebels. The Bishops who encourage them with their sympathy are mercilessly punished," and an alarming number of episcopal resignations follows. "Hence it is revolt which rumbles in the distance." Should the Pope reject the Separation law the French priests, we are told, will not follow his orders. It is a little difficult to see how they can, since the vast majority have already, in a measure, submitted to it, no less than 34,286 out of the 38,000 French clerics having applied for the Government pensions. But the chief condition attached to these pensions is submission. And what will be the end of the hard struggle of France to deliver itself from Rome is difficult to foresee.

THIS year's exhibit of the British School of Archaeology in Egypt is perhaps less striking from a merely spectacular point of view than is sometimes the case. Yet there is much to interest us in these upper rooms at University College whenever we turn in there on these July afternoons. We are attracted by some small bottles of graceful shape made of blue paste, and described as being "for New Year's presents." Here, too, are necklaces of beads or of shells, testifying to the same love of personal adornment in the people of bygone millenniums as beats in the feminine heart to-day. A much corroded dagger dug up from one of the ancient tombs shows how old, if not praiseworthy, is the instinct of slaughter. Yet these vanished races, native Egyptians, or members of the invading Shepherd tribes were in appearance grotesquely unlike us. We know not which thought comes uppermost. In essential things of the mind we change little and slowly, in the affairs of transitory fashion the dissimilarity is great. Whether we would entertain an hour with thoughts of progress, or moralise on the stationary condition of humanity, we find apt illustration in these relics of last winter's work of Professor Petrie and his colleagues.

IN historical importance the present exhibition yields to none that have preceded it, and its educational value is enhanced, for the ignorant—and who is not ignorant in Egyptian archaeology—by the models which Professor Petrie has prepared. These models are explained in an informal, but most interesting, fashion daily at 11 and 3. There are two of them, one represents the temple and site of the city of Onias, the Jewish High Priest, who fled from the persecution of Antiochus Epiphanes in the middle of the second century, B.C. In Egypt, some twenty miles from Cairo, he founded his New Jerusalem. The model shows what ingenious methods were adopted by which the temple built on a sandy plain should bear some resemblance to the temple on the rocky hills of Judæa. Amongst other features of interest we note the justification afforded by the recent excavations to the correctness of some suspected pages in Josephus.
